This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. THE

WEEKLY REPORTER,

1890-91.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. June 16; July 29.

MILLS v. CHARLESWORTH. (a.)

Bill of sale—Pledge—Transference of property, but not of possession—Document regulating terms of holding.

The goods of A. having been seized by the sheriff under a fi. fa., the defendant agreed to pay out the sheriff and to hold the goods as a security for the advance, and that the sheriff's officer should remain in possession of the goods on his behalf. This agreement was reduced into writing and signed by the defendant. The sheriff acquiesced in the terms, and his officer remained in possession of the goods. A. having subsequently executed a bill of sale of the same goods to the plaintiff,

Held, by Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ. (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), that the agreement, being essential for the proof of the defendant's title to the goods, was a bill of sale, and therefore void for want of registration.

Appeal from the decision of Day, J.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of Lindley, L.J.

One Wilson was the owner of goods which were seized by the sheriff under a fi. fa. The bailiff in possession was a man named Bristowe. Dickinson was the person who acted for the sheriff, and who gave instructions to Bristowe. On Friday, the 9th of December, 1887, Wilson applied to Charlesworth, an auctioneer, to pay the sheriff out, and Charlesworth agreed to do so, provided that the goods seized were worth the money to be advanced, and provided that Charlesworth had possession of the goods. Charlesworth, having satisfied himself as to the value of the goods, paid Dickinson the amount claimed by the sheriff, and it was agreed between Wilson, Dickinson, and Charlesworth that Bristowe should continue in possession for Charlesworth. Dickinson signed and gave Charlesworth a receipt for £62 15s. 1d., and Wilson signed and gave Charlesworth a letter, which was as follows:—

"December 9, 1887.

"Mr. Charlesworth, Auctioneer, Hull.

"Sir,—In consideration of your paying the sheriff's officer the amount on Townsend's writ and expenses, viz., £62 15s. 1d., I hereby authorize and request you to hold possession of all my furniture and effects now on the premises, No. 2, Pendrill-street, Hull, and to sell the whole by auction as soon as convenient, and, after deducting the above amount and your charges, pay over the balance, if any, to me.—Yours truly,

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

All this was done at one time on the evening of the 9th of December. On the 10th of December Bristowe, who had been told on the 9th by Charlesworth that he was going to pay the sheriff out, was instructed to remain in possession for Charlesworth, and he did remain in possession accordingly for some days. Wilson continued to reside with his family in the house where Bristowe and the goods in his charge were, and, owing to the illness of one of Wilson's children, the goods remained undisturbed for a fortnight or so. On the 10th of December Wilson executed a bill of sale to the plaintiff, who knew nothing of the seizure by the sheriff, nor of the arrangement with Charlesworth, nor of the fact that Bristowe had charge of the goods. The plaintiff's bill of sale was duly registered, and on Charlesworth discovering its existence he moved and sold the goods. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action against him to recover their value, and Day, J., who tried the case without a jury, decided that the goods passed to the plaintiff under his bill of sale, and gave judgment for him accordingly.

From this decision the defendant appealed.

Henn Collins, Q.C., Cyril Dodd, Q.C., and H. T. Kemp, for the appellant.—The goods passed to Charlesworth as a pledge by oral agreement: Reeves v. Capper, 5 Bing. N. C. 136. The possession had already passed when the document was drawn up, and therefore it is not a bill of sale, and does not require registration: Ex parte Hubbard, 35 W. R. 2 17 Q. B. D 690.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Arnold Statham, for the respondent.—The case falls within Ex parte Parsons, 34 W R. 329, 16 Q. B. D. 532, and not within Ex parte Hubbard.

Henn Collins, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff had obtained a bill of sale, and the defendant contended that the goods mentioned in the bill of sale were already his, and, therefore, that the bill of sale was of no effect. The sole question was whether the defendant had really before the execution of that bill of sale got the property in the goods. Wilson's goods were seized by the sheriff's officer under an execution. He wished to get the sheriff out, and applied to the defendant, who was an auctioneer, to advance him money for this purpose. The defendant agreed to do this, and, after examining the goods and thinking them sufficient, it was agreed that the defendant should advance the money on the condition that the sheriff's officer, who was then in possession of Wilson's goods, should remain in possession of them, not for the sheriff, but for Charlesworth. The sheriff's officer agreed to this, and accordingly the sheriff was paid out, and the document in question was drawn up. The sheriff's officer remained in possession of the goods, and Wilson also remained in the house because he had a sick child there. It is plain that there was no joint possession, because the possession of this bailiff and the possession of Wilson were adverse. I think Wilson was not in possession at all, but that the sheriff's officer was in possession on behalf of the defendant. At the trial Day, J., took that for granted.

The question, therefore, is whether the document which was signed at the same time that the money was lent and the possession of the goods was given, was a bill of sale within the Bills of Sale Acts. If the transaction was one of pledge, Ex parte Hubbard shows that it does not fall within those Acts. Was it a pledge, then? A pledge in the ordinary sense of the term is when money is advanced on goods or chattels which are given into the possession of the person who advances money on them.

A bill of sale in its ordinary meaning is the document which is given where the legal property in goods passes to the person who lends money on them, but the possession does not pass.

But then comes in the interpretation clause of the Bills of Sale Acts, and says that a document which is a licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for any debt is to be considered a bill of sale. But if the document only regulates what is to be done as regards a pledged object after it has been pledged, as in the case of a pawn-ticket, then Ex parte Hubbard shows that it is not a bill of sale. If, however, the document creates a right to take possession, and it was given before the possession was taken, then it is a bill of sale within the case of Ex parte Parsons. These two cases determine the limits of what is and what is not a bill of sale, and I think that we ought to stand by them. Applying those limits to the present case, I think that, on the facts, this was not a licence to take possession, but was a document relating to possession already taken, and, therefore, that it was not a bill of sale. In my opinion the judgment of Day, J., was wrong, and this appeal ought to be allowed.

The following judgment was read by:—

Lindley, L.J. (after stating the facts as above).—The main ground of the appeal was that what took place between Wilson, Charlesworth, and Dickinson on the 9th of December amounted to a pledge of the goods by Wilson to Charlesworth, and that the pledge could be proved without having recourse to Wilson's letter of December 9, and that the form of that letter and the non-registration under the Bills of Sale Act did not invalidate such pledge. In support of this contention reliance was placed on the decision of this court in Ex parte Hubbard. It is, however, to be observed that in that case there was a physical change of possession of the goods; and the court held that the pledge there effected could be proved without reference to any written document; and that the pledge so proved was not invalidated by the non-registration of a contemporaneous document, which was viewed by the court as at most a record of what had taken place, and as regulating the rights of the pledgee under a pledge created and proved by parol.

In this case, however, there was no physical change of possession of the goods. In point of law, possession of goods may be changed by agreement without any physical change in their position, or in the position of the person who actually guards them. The right to possession may be transferred by agreement, and the character in which the custodian holds them may be changed by attornment. This was established by Reeves v. Capper, Meyerstein v. Barber, 18 W. R. 1041, L. R. 4 H. L. 317, and Hilton v. Tucker, 36 W. R. 762, 39 Ch. D. 669, and, in my opinion, that which took place on the 9th did amount in point of law to a change of possession of the goods; and that whereas before the agreement for the change Bristowe held for the sheriff, after that agreement Bristowe held for Charlesworth. But the agreement by which this change in possession was effected was reduced into writing, and cannot be proved apart from the writing. Without the writing Charlesworth cannot prove his right to possess as against Wilson, the owner of the goods. This at once makes the letter essential to the proof of Charlesworth's title, and brings the letter within the definition of a bill of sale. The reasoning of the court in Newlove v. Shrewsbury, 36 W. R. 835, 21 Q. B. D. 41, is applicable to this case. Charlesworth's title would, I think, have prevailed at common law; but his title is rendered invalid by the Bills of Sale Act.

The expression "to hold" in the letter is appropriate having regard to the fact that the sheriff had already seized the goods, and that no fresh taking was necessary. To hold for the lender is equivalent to giving up possession to the borrower and retaking for the lender.

If the decision in Ex parte Hubbard is extended to cases of pledges created by agreement, and without any physical change in the custody of the goods, the Bills of Sale Act will become of little if any use. Nothing will be easier than to evade it. I cannot construe the Act so as to make it inapplicable to such a transaction as this, or, in other words, to such an agreement in writing as the court has to deal with in the present case.

I am therefore of opinion that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—I agree with the judgment of my brother Lindley, and am unable to agree with that of the Master of the Rolls. I think this case is altogether distinguishable from that of Ex parte Hubbard. In that case it was held that where goods are pledged as security for a loan and delivered to the pledgee, a document that merely records the transaction and regulates the rights of the pledgee is not a bill of sale. The document is merely a record of the transaction. Here the document is an essential part of the transaction, which could not be proved by parol without reference to it. Ex parte Hubbard is therefore distinguishable, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Bill of exchange—Acceptance—Qualified or general—Negotiability of bill—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 19.

A bill of exchange was drawn by one Flipo payable to himself and directed to the defendants as drawees. The defendants accepted the bill as follows :—"In favour of Flipo only. Accepted payable at Alliance Bank, London." The words "In favour of Flipo only" were in writing, and underneath them the rest of the acceptance was impressed with an ordinary stamp.

Held, that the acceptance was a general, and not a qualified, one, and did not restrict the negotiability of the bill.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ.), in favour of the defendants upon a special case.

The action was brought by bankers in France, as indorsees of a bill of exchange against the defendants, who carried on business in London, as acceptors. The defence was that the bill was on its face not negotiable, and that the plaintiffs were, therefore, not entitled to recover. The bill was drawn by one Flipo, a merchant in France, upon the defendants as follows :—"On the 31st of October after date pay to order, Mr. L. Delobbel Flipo, £778 4s. 2d." The defendants struck out the word "order," and accepted the bill as follows :—"In favour of Mr. L. Delobbel Flipo only. Accepted payable at Alliance Bank, London, for H. Meyer & Co., Limited; B. Manning, Arthur Manning, directors; Arthur Manning, secretary." The words "In favour of L. Delobbel Flipo only," were in writing, and underneath these words the rest of the acceptance, except the signatures of the directors and secretary, was impressed with a stamp. After the acceptance Flipo indorsed the bill to plaintiffs to be discounted, and the plaintiffs, not noticing that the acceptance was in any unusual form, discounted it, and placed the amount to the credit of Flipo. The bill upon presentation was dishonoured upon instructions from the defendants.

The Divisional Court held that the acceptance was a qualified acceptance rendering the bill not negotiable, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the plaintiffs.—This acceptance did not make the bill not negotiable. The words "in favour of Flipo only" are surplusage. Every acceptance is in favour of the payee. The words mean payable to Flipo or order. The acceptance was not a qualified one within section 19 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

They referred to the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, ss. 8 (sub-sections 1, 4, 5), 17, 19, 36; Steele v. McKinlay, 29 W. R. 17, 5 App. Cas. 754.

Horne Payne, Q.C., and G. S. Bower, for the defendants.—Either this is no acceptance in the proper sense at all, or it is an acceptance prohibiting negotiation of the bill. It is a qualified acceptance within section 19 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Before that Act a bill drawn in favour of a specified person without the word "order" or "bearer" was not negotiable, but was valid as between the original parties, Byles on Bills, 9th ed., 80. Hence, though that Act rendered the insertion of the word "order" immaterial, still the word "order" being struck out by the acceptors showed that they intended to restrict the negotiability of the bill. The acceptance "in favour of Flipo only" clearly shows that the bill was not to be negotiable. A bill may be indorsed "pay A. only," when, under section 35, sub-section 1, of the Act, it would not be negotiable. This acceptance has the same effect.

They referred to Rowe v. Young, 2 Brod. & Bing. 165.

Finlay, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This instrument was drawn by a foreigner in France upon merchants in London. The bill was drawn since the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and therefore that Act applies. The defendants, when the bill was presented to them for acceptance, wrote their names across it. When a person to whom a bill is presented for acceptance writes his name across it he has primâ facie accepted it according to its legal tenour and effect. He is entitled, however, to qualify his acceptance. What was the legal tenour and effect of this bill? It seems to me that even without the assistance of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the bill was payable to Flipo or order. But, however that may be, it is clear that since that Act, by section 8, sub-section 4, the bill must be read as if the word "order" was in it. In either case the bill is drawn payable to Flipo or order. The defendants accepted that bill. It may be that they intended to make their acceptance a qualified one. The question, however, is whether they have effectually done so. It was said that striking out the word "order" in the bill showed the intention of the defendants to qualify their acceptance. It seems to me that the striking out of that word was an improper act. An acceptor has no right to alter the bill. He must accept it or refuse to accept it as it is drawn. If he wishes to qualify his acceptance he must do so by the acceptance. I should be inclined to think that by the mercantile law the improper erasure of the word "order" would have no effect upon the bill, and that unless the acceptance itself is a qualified one the acceptor must be taken to have accepted the bill as drawn. But, however that may be under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the erasure of the word "order" does not affect the negotiability of the bill, though it may be a fact to be taken into consideration in seeing what the intention of the acceptor is. We must therefore look at the acceptance to see whether it is a qualified one or not. Primâ facie, a person must be taken to have accepted a bill generally. If he desires to make his acceptance restrictive, he must do so in clear and express terms. If he leaves the matter in doubt he must be taken to have accepted generally. The acceptance in the present case is "in favour of Flipo only." What is the meaning in mercantile language of the words "in favour of" in a bill of exchange? If a person says that he has drawn a bill in your favour, he means that he has drawn a bill to your order, you being named as the payee. The addition of the word "only" means that you are the only payee. That being so, the meaning of those words in an acceptance is that the acceptor has accepted the bill in which you are the only payee. The words, therefore, do not restrict the acceptance. They have no effect upon the bill as drawn. If they were held to qualify the acceptance, they would be a trap to catch innocent indorsees. Reading the acceptance in that way, it is obvious that the defendants have not carried out in appropriate language their intention of making a qualified acceptance. The bill, in its origin, was negotiable, and the acceptance has not restricted its negotiability. The bill was complete without the acceptance, as is seen from the definition of a bill given in the Act, and therefore the acceptance is no part of the bill. Section 19 gives instances of qualified acceptances, which are not exhaustive, but are only instances; but any qualification of an acceptance must be made in express terms. I do not think that the defendants have by this acceptance altered the effect of the bill, and therefore this acceptance must be taken to be a general one. The appeal must accordingly be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case seems to me to be one of some difficulty. The principle stated by the Master of the Rolls seems to me to be a sound one, that an acceptance must be taken most strongly against the acceptor. The defendants have used ambiguous words, and not words clearly qualifying their acceptance. They ought not to have used words that might be a trap for unwary indorsees. The true view to take in this case is that the defendants have not qualified the acceptance in clear terms, and on that ground I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is of the highest importance in mercantile business that qualifications of acceptances should be construed strongly against the acceptors. It is clear that this was meant to be an acceptance. If a merchant does not wish to accept a bill having a certain tenour and effect, why does he write his name across it? If he wishes to qualify his acceptance he ought to qualify it in clear terms, so that he who runs may read. If any authority were needed for that proposition plenty can be found, and in particular I would refer to the case of Smith v. Vertue, 9 W. R. 146, 30 L. J. C. P. 56. Is, then, this a qualified acceptance? If it is it is most misleading. The drawer is a foreigner in France, and the bill is sent back to him with the words "in favour of Flipo only" written at the top of the acceptance, and the ordinary acceptance stamped on the bill below those words. That would be a most misleading thing to do if the bill were intended to be not negotiable. Why should the bill be accepted payable at a particular bank if it was intended to be payable only to a particular person and not to be negotiable? How unintelligible such language would be if that was the intention. But, further, if a qualified acceptance was intended, the proper and ordinary place to insert the qualification would be in the stamped part of the acceptance. Instead of doing so, the defendants write above the stamped acceptance the words "in favour of Flipo only." A person into whose hands the bill might come would have to construe those words to see what they meant. I do not attach much importance to the erasure of the word "order" in the body of the bill, as the effect of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, is to re-insert that word in the bill. To my mind those words mean, payable to Flipo or order. The addition of the word "only" does not render that meaning different. It does not restrict the negotiability of the bill. It may perhaps be that if the words used had been "payable to Flipo only," the case would have been different. The acceptors have overshot their mark, and I cannot be sorry that they are held bound by the ambiguous language they have used, inserted, as it is, in an ambiguous place. The defendants, therefore, have not properly qualified their acceptance, and if we came to any other conclusion I feel convinced that we should be running counter to what any business man in the City of London would say was the right construction of the document.

Appeal allowed.

Will — Construction — Annuity — Gift over on death without "leaving" child.

A testator gave to L. an annuity during her life, payable out of the rents of leaseholds, and directed that after L.'s death the annuity should be payable to and among such of L.'s children as, being sons, should attain twenty-one, or, being daughters, should attain that age or marry; and, in the event of the death of L. "without leaving" any such child, then over. L. survived the testator, and had one child only, who attained twenty-one and died in L.'s lifetime.

Held, that the gift over took effect, the annuity being a personal provision for the annuitant and her children.

Adjourned summons.

A testator, who died in 1872, gave to his daughter Lucy an annuity during her life, payable half-yearly out of the rents of leasehold property held for an unexpired term of about sixty years, and directed that after the death of his said daughter the annuity should be payable half-yearly to and among such of her children as, being sons, should attain twenty-one, or, being daughters, should attain that age or marry, and if there should be but one such child, should be payable to such only child, and in the event of the death of his said daughter "without leaving" any such child the testator gave the annuity which should fail by such death unto and among the survivors of the testator's children and grandchildren. Lucy survived the testator, and had one child only, who attained twenty-one, but died in her lifetime. The question was whether on the decease of Lucy the gift of the annuity took effect in favour of her child, or whether the annuity passed under the gift over.

Theobald, for the representative of the child of Lucy.—The annuitant died without leaving a child; "leaving" must be construed "having had" according to the rule of Howgrave v. Cartier, 3 V. & B. 79; Traharne v. Layton, 23 W. R. 799, L. R. 10 Q. B. 459.

W. H. Gover, for persons interested under the ultimate gift.—The direction that the annuity shall be payable by half-yearly instalments to and among the children is not a direct gift to them; the children did not take vested interests, and the rule of Howgrave v. Cartier does not apply: In re Hamlet, Stephen v. Cunningham, 37 W. R. 245, 39 Ch. D. 426; In re Jackson's Will, 28 W. R. 209, 13 Ch. D. 189.

Kay, J.—The question is whether the court can in this case depart from the natural meaning of the words of this will and construe "leaving" as "having had." This has been done when there was a previous vested interest given, which the words of the will strictly construed would defeat. No authority has been adduced to show that a gift of an annuity is governed by the same rule; an annuity, ex vi termini, has the character of a personal provision, and differs considerably from a gift of a lump sum.

This annuity is charged upon leasehold property which the testator directs shall not be sold. There is no gift in words to the children of Lucy, but her annuity is to be payable half-yearly to and among her children. These words, coupled with the fact that the bequest is an annuity which cannot be anticipated, show that the testator intended to make a personal provision for his daughter Lucy for her life and for her children after her death. Since the only child of Lucy which attained twenty-one died in Lucy's lifetime, there was no child to whom the annuity could be paid; the annuity therefore failed upon Lucy's death, because there was no child to receive it. In my opinion that is what the testator intended, and, therefore, the representative of Lucy's child will take nothing.

Petition.

This was a petition by the liquidator in the voluntary winding up of the above company for the decision of the court as to the distribution of the surplus assets of the company amongst the shareholders after payment of the debts of the company.

The company was registered in 1857 as a limited company under the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856, with a capital of £40,000, the shares being of the value of £10 each. 2,917 of the shares issued were fully paid up. By special resolutions passed in 1861 to increase the capital by the creation of 2,016 additional shares of the nominal value of £10, and as an inducement to subscribe this additional capital, the directorate was authorized to issue these shares as fully paid up in consideration of the sum of £3 per share.

For a certain number of years the new shareholders were to receive certain guaranteed interest, and they were also to share dividends with the other shareholders equally. 1,631 shares were issued on these terms, and the shares had been for years treated in every way as on the same footing as the original shares, and there was nothing on the certificate or otherwise to show any distinction between the shares. The surplus assets distributable among the shareholders was £25,000.

Chadwyck Healey, for the liquidator.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Mulligan, for the fully-paid shareholders.—The issue of shares at a discount is illegal: In re Almado and Tirito Co., 36 W. R. 593, 38 Ch. D. 415. The new shareholders must be treated as only having paid £3 per share. The surplus assets must be applied in repaying the fully-paid shareholders the sum of £7 per share, and the balance should be then divided between all the shareholders equally: In re Hodge's Distillery Co., 19 W. R. 113, L. R. 6 Ch. 51.

They also cited In re Railway Time Tables Publishing Co., 37 W. R. 531, 42 Ch. D 98; In re London Celluloid Co., 36 W. R. 673 39 Ch. D. 190; In re Newtownards Gas Co., 15 L. R. Ir. 51, 33 W. R. Dig. 39; In re Vulcan Ironworks Co., W. N., 1885, p. 120.

Hardy, Q.C., and W. B. Heath, for the discount shareholders.—The issue of shares at a discount may be illegal and void as regards creditors, but the question here is what was the agreement between the contributories. The original shareholders have received the benefit of the contract, by the use of the new capital brought in, and it must be assumed that they had acquiesced in the arrangement. The surplus should be distributed between all the shareholders equally: In re Bangor and Portmadoc Slate and Slab Co., 23 W. R. 785, L. R. 20 Eq. 59.

Higgins, Q.C., in reply.

NORTH, J.—I have no doubt that in this case the holders of the discount shares cannot, after the lapse of time that has taken place, repudiate their position as shareholders. They applied for shares and agreed with the company that in consideration of £3 per share they should receive a fully paid-up £10 share. Now it has been held, after remaining in doubt for a considerable time, that such a contract is illegal, and the case of In re Almado and Tirito Co., which has been cited in the argument, is an authority to that effect. In my opinion the shares must be treated as having only £3 paid up. Mr. Hardy says that though the issue of the shares at a discount is illegal as between shareholders and creditors of the company, there is nothing to make it illegal as between the shareholders themselves. I cannot however see how every shareholder could be held to have assented to the issue of the shares at a discount, and though some might be bound by acquiescence, I cannot hold that the whole class is bound. I am bound by the authority of the case of In re Hodge's Distillery Co., which has been frequently followed, and the authority of which has been recognized in the House of Lords in Birch v. Cropper, 38 W. R. 401, 14 App. Cas. 525, and on the principle there laid down I direct that the surplus assets should be applied first in repaying to each of the original shareholders the sum of £7 on each share, levelling them down to what has been paid by the discount shareholders, and then the balance must be divided equally between all the shareholders alike.

ALDEN v. BECKLEY & CO. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Partnership—Service on manager of firm—Subsequent service on partner—Judgment signed against firm before expiration of eight days from service on partner—Right of partner to set aside such judgment—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 42, r. 10.

If a writ of summons be served on a partner in a firm after having been served on the manager of the firm, judgment ought not to be signed against the firm until after the expiration of eight days from the last service, and if judgment be signed against the firm before the expiration of eight days from the service on the partner, though after the expiration of eight days from the service on the firm, such judgment is premature, and will, on the application of the partner, be set aside.

Application to set aside a judgment.

Appeal from an order made by Day, J., at chambers, affirming an order of a master setting aside a judgment which had been entered against the firm of H. Beckley & Co.

The plaintiff brought an action on certain bills of exchange against the firm of H. Beckley & Co.

Service of the writ of summons in the action was effected on the firm on the 29th of May, 1890, by serving the manager of the firm on that day. H. Beckley & Co. did not enter any defence.

On the 3rd of June service of the writ was also effected on one H. J. Denison, who was alleged to be a partner in the firm of H. Beckley & Co., and who was served as a partner, though he denied that he was a partner.

After the expiration of eight days from the service on the firm on the 29th of May, judgment was signed on the 6th of June against the firm of H. Beckley & Co., and it was this judgment which it was now sought to set aside.

Execution having issued on the 9th of June, Denison entered an appearance as follows—"Enter an appearance for H. J. Denison"—without stating whether he was or was not a partner.

Judgment having thus been signed against the firm on the 6th of June, Denison, who had been served with the writ on the 3rd of June, took out a summons at chambers to set aside the judgment signed against the firm of H. Beckley & Co., on the ground that it was prematurely signed, as, by ord. 42, r. 10, such judgment might affect him by execution issuing against his goods as an alleged partner, whereas he contended that no judgment to affect him personally could be be signed until the expiration of eight days from the date of the service on him on the 3rd of June.

On this ground the master made an order setting aside the judgment signed on the 6th of June against the firm of H. Beckley & Co., and on appeal Day, J., upheld the master's order, being of opinion that the plaintiff, having served the alleged partner, Denison, as well as the manager of the firm, could not sign judgment against the firm until the expiration of eight days after the last service.

The plaintiff appealed.

A. Powell, for the plaintiff.—The judgment signed on the 6th of June against the firm of H. Beckley & Co. was properly and regularly signed, as it was not signed until the expiration of eight days from the service on the firm; it was, therefore, not prematurely signed. The plaintiff had a right to sign that judgment, as he had a right to serve the manager of the firm, and he did not sign the judgment for eight days after the service on the manager. The judgment against the firm being regularly and properly signed, the subsequent service on Denison on the 3rd of June does not invalidate the judgment.

Gore, for the defendant Denison, was stopped.

REG. v. SOUTTER. (a.)

*Local government—Vestry—Quo warranto—Election of vestryman—Right to question election by* quo warranto —Qualification—Occupation of club premises as secretary—Sufficiency of Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 6.

The procedure by quo warranto is applicable to question the validity of the election of a vestryman elected under the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855.

The qualification of a candidate for the office of a vestryman was that he was rated in respect of the house which he occupied at £19 a year, and he was jointly rated with another person in respect of certain club premises at £55 a year, he being the secretary of the club, and occupying for his own business the ground and first floors of the club from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Held, that he was a mere licensee, and was not an occupier, and was not rated in respect of the club premises so as to bring up his qualification to the £25 per annum required by section 6 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855; that his qualification was insufficient; and that, therefore, he was not duly elected.

Rule calling on Francis William Soutter to show cause why an information in the nature of a quo warranto should not be exhibited against him, to show by what authority he claims to exercise the office or franchise of a vestyman for Ward No. 4 in the parish of St. Mary Magdalene, Bermondsey, in the County of Surrey.

The ground of the rule was that the said Francis William Soutter is not qualified to act as a vestryman for the said ward, as he is not rated or assessed to the relief of the poor of the said parish upon a rental of not less than £25 per annum of premises of which he is the bonâ fide occupier.

Section 6 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), lays down the qualification for a vestryman in parishes coming within its operation as the being rated or assessed to the relief of the poor upon a rental (in the case of the present parish) exceeding £25 per annum in respect of the occupation of a house, lands, tenements, or hereditaments within such parish, and the section provides that a joint rating and a joint occupation of any such premises shall be sufficient to qualify each joint occupier in case the amount of rental on which all such occupiers are jointly rated will, when divided by the number of occupiers, give for each such occupier a sum not less than the sum hereinbefore required.

On the 14th of May, 1890, an election took place to fill three vacancies in the vestry. There were six candidates, and Mr. Soutter and Mr. Shand were two of the candidates. As the result of the polling Mr. Soutter was at the head of the poll, and Mr. Shand was the fourth on the list, and was the first unsuccessful candidate.

Mr. Shand now said that Mr. Soutter was not qualified to be a vestryman, by reason of insufficient rating, that, therefore, he was not properly elected and he (Mr. Shand) claimed the seat, and it was at his instance that the above rule was obtained.

The question now, therefore, was whether Mr. Soutter was rented or assessed in respect of a house, lands, &c., within the parish to the requisite amount of £25 per annum. The qualification of Mr. Soutter as to rating and assessment was, that he was rated at £19 per annum in respect of the house which he occupied, and where he resided; that he was also rated and assessed jointly with one other person in respect of certain club premises, the rateable value of which was £55 per annum. The question arose as to this latter rating in respect of the club premises.

The entry in the rate book, as to these club premises, was that the name of the occupier was put down as "The Southwark Club, by its nominees, H. Quelch and Francis William Soutter"; the premises were described as a club, and the rateable value as £55 per annum.

It appeared by the affidavit of Mr. Soutter that he was the secretary of the club; that he was the bonâ fide occupier of part of the club premises, which he occupied for the purpose of carrying on his business of a coal merchant; that he actually did carry on his business there, having an office there for the purpose of that business; that he had from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. the exclusive use of the ground floor and first floor of the club premises; that he was entitled to use the whole of this part of the premises for the purposes of his business, paying rent for the same to the club; that his tenancy of that part of the club premises was a yearly tenancy, and could only be determined by a resolution of the club and a six months' notice to quit; that the members of the club were not entitled to use that part of the premises before 6 p.m.

He also said that he was jointly responsible for the payment of the rates levied or assessed in respect of the club, and that he had personally given a written undertaking to pay such rates, and, if such rates were not paid, and if there were no sufficient distress on the premises, he was liable to be imprisoned for failing to pay them; that by virtue of this qualification in respect of these club premises he had for some years voted at parliamentary, school board, and vestry elections; and that his two predecessors, in respect of the same qualification of the same premises, had for some years been vestrymen of the parish.

The inspectors of votes were equally divided as to whether Mr. Soutter was qualified, and the umpire was of opinion that he was qualified, though he (the umpire) did not, until it was too late, sign the required declaration that Mr. Soutter was duly elected.

Mr. Soutter took his seat, and acted and voted as a vestryman.

The present rule was obtained on behalf of Mr. Shand to test the validity of the election.

Cluer, showed cause.—There is a preliminary objection that quo warranto will not lie to question the election of a vestryman, or, if it will, it is a matter within the discretion of the court, and ought not to be granted in this case. The rule as to quo warranto is laid down in Darley v. The Queen, 12 Cl. & F. 520. Since the earliest times there has been no application of this kind with regard to a vestryman. The remedy here was not by quo warranto, but under section 54 of the Act for penalties.

Lynden Bell, in support of the rule.—I have not been able to find any case in which quo warranto has been held to apply to a vestryman, but my contention is that it does apply, as a vestry is a public body, and the office is a public office. A vestry is now, whatever it may have been formerly, a creature of statute, and therefore quo warranto applies. [GRANTHAM, J.—It has been held that a town councillor is subject to quo warranto.]

Cluer replied.

GRANTHAM, J.—I think very strongly that this is a case where quo warranto applies.

POLLOCK, B.—I think so too, and I think it the most convenient form to raise the question.

Objection overruled.

The case was then heard as to the sufficiency of the rating.

Cluer.—The rating here is sufficient, as there is a rating of £19 a year in respect of the house and a joint rating in respect of the club premises of £55 a a year. The rental may be made up of tenements separately held, so that if there be two distinct qualifications each under £25 you can add the two together to form the qualification: The King v. The Churchwardens of St. Pancras, 1 A. & E. 80; Reg. v. Kirby, 10 W. R. 13. It is not necessary to have exclusive occupation to be rated: Goodhew v. Williams, 26 W. R. 107, 3 C. P. D. 382. Mr. Soutter is occupier for one place, and he is rated or assessed in respect of another place, and that is sufficient.

Lynden Bell referred to Inman v. Assessment Committee of West Derby Union, 22 W. R. 330, L. R. 9 Q. B. 180, and Mogg v. Clark, 34 W. R. 66, 16 Q. B. D. 79, but was not called upon.

POLLOCK, B.—This proceeding is by quo warranto, calling on Mr. Soutter to show by what authority he claims to exercise the office of a vestryman.

Now there has been a preliminary point taken of some importance, that this is the first time that a quo warranto has ever been raised in the case of a vestryman. Upon that point it seems to me quite clear that the present vestry, which is elected under the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) is a different body from the old common-law vestry. This Act for the first time created a new body, with new duties, and, therefore, this is a case where quo warranto applies.

Now, coming to the merits of the case, I may observe that section 6 of the Act lays down the qualification for a vestryman.

In accordance with all the known laws as to rating, Mr. Soutter does not occupy, and is not rated as occupier, in respect of these club premises at all. His occupation is of a duplex character; he occupies as secretary of the club; the premises are used entirely by the club, and in so far as he occupies at all it is not his occupation. The distinction always observed in these cases is this, does he occupy by himself, or merely as a servant, as a coachman occupies his master's stable, or as a gamekeeper occupies a lodge. In all these cases the occupation is for the purpose of performing his duties, and in those cases there is no occupation at all. Here, Mr. Soutter was allowed to occupy a part of the premises from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m., and with regard to those premises he was not an occupier, he was a mere licensee. It seems to me that, with regard to that occupation, he does not come within the section, and I think this rule should be made absolute.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite clear that the occupation was an occupation as secretary of the club, and not an occupation for himself. Mr. Soutter is not an occupier, and not rated to a sufficient amount, and, therefore, this rule must be made absolute.

REG. v. VESTRY OF ST. MARY, ISLINGTON. (a.)

Burial ground — Maintenance and repair — Churchwardens — Right to be repaid costs and expenses— Certificate—Burial Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 128), s. 18.

By section 18 of the Burial Act, 1855, which provides for the maintenance and repair of disused burial grounds by the burial board or churchwardens, it is enacted that "the costs and expenses shall be repaid by the overseers upon the certificate of the burial board or churchwardens, as the case may be, out of the rate made for the relief of the poor of the parish." A churchwarden had, with the authority of the vestry, received tenders for repairs to the wall of a burial ground, but had not actually paid any sum of money in respect thereof.

Held, that his written request for payment was a sufficient certificate within the section, and that he was entitled to a mandamus ordering the vestry to pay him on account, a sum which was within the estimated cost of the repairs.

In this case the vestry showed cause against a rule nisi obtained by G. S. Elliot, the senior churchwarden of the parish, for a writ of mandamus directed to the vestry commanding them to pay to the said G. S. Elliot the sum of £500, being the amount of a precept made on the 1st of February, 1890, upon the accounts committee of the vestry, in respect of expenses incurred by the churchwardens by virtue of their office, and, if necessary, to make and levy a rate for that purpose.

The churchyard of St. Mary, Islington, and the burial ground of the Chapel of Ease were closed by an Order in Council under the provisions of the Burial Acts, 1852 to 1881. The churchwardens were, by virtue of the Burial Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 128), s. 18, bound to do the necessary repair of the walls and other fences; that section also provides that "the costs and expenses shall be repaid by the overseers upon the certificate of the burial board or churchwardens, as the case may be, out of the rate made for the relief of the poor of the parish."

At a meeting of the vestry held on the 30th of October, 1874, it was resolved (b) that the churchwardens maintain the closed churchyards or burial grounds of the parish in decent order and do the necessary repairs of the walls and other fences thereof, and that the expenses incurred by them be paid by this vestry through the accounts committee on their requisition and charged to the poor rate, and (c) as to the recreation ground at the Chapel of Ease, that the amount necessary to meet the expense of keeping the same up be paid by the accounts committee periodically to the senior churchwarden upon his requisition and receipt.

At an extraordinary meeting of the vestry, held on the 15th of January, 1890, the vestry adopted a recommendation of their committee, which was as follows:—"That the senior churchwarden be asked to invite tenders for taking down the wall at present surrounding the Chapel of Ease ground, erecting new iron railings in lieu thereof, and carrying out such other works in connection therewith as may be necessary." The cost of these works was estimated by the committee at £580. Mr. Elliot, the senior churchwarden, thereupon invited tenders, and in the month of March signed contracts with two firms for carrying out the works. Prior to the signing of the contracts Mr. Elliot wrote to the accounts committee of the vestry the following letter, which was the precept referred to in the rule:—

"Gentlemen,—On behalf of my churchwardens I request you to pay me the sum of (500£) five hundred pounds pursuant to the several resolutions of the vestry.

"Dated 30th October, 1874.

"Signed, G. S. ELLIOT,

"£500 0 0." "Senior Churchwarden.

The vestry declined to pay the £500 as requested, and Mr. Elliot obtained this rule.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and J. V. Austin, for the vestry, showed cause.—The word used in section 18 is "repaid." In the present case the churchwarden has not paid anything, and the vestry is not bound to pay him until he has spent money upon the works. His precept is not a sufficient certificate within the section.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (R. A. McCall with him), supported the rule.

POLLOCK, B.—In this case the court is called upon to make absolute a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus commanding the Vestry of St. Mary, Islington, to pay to the senior churchwarden of the parish a sum of £500 to meet the expenses of certain repairs done to the wall surrounding the Chapel of Ease in that parish. Mr. Elliot has no doubt become liable in respect of these repairs for a considerable sum.

On the 1st of February, before the contracts had been signed, Mr. Elliot, in accordance with the practice which had obtained for some time in this vestry, sent in his precept. [His lordship read the letter above set out, and continued:—] The Act says that a certificate from the churchwardens is necessary. When we come to consider what is meant by the word "certificate" we must take it in a reasonable sense. Section 18 casts upon the churchwardens the duty of maintaining the burial ground and of doing the necessary repair of the walls and other fences, and the expenses are to be repaid by the overseers upon the certificate of the churchwardens. The first objection taken was that the word is "re-paid," and that, therefore, it is a condition precedent to the money being paid to the churchwarden that he has paid it away himself. There is something to be said for that view, but, taking the subject-matter into consideration, it seems to me to be reasonable to hold that expenses to be repaid include expenses for which the churchwarden is liable, although he has not yet paid them. Then it is said there must be a certificate. But now that I have heard the whole case, and appreciate the subject-matter in respect of which the certificate is to be given, I think that the provision of the Act as to the certificate is amply satisfied by the precept of the churchwarden. I think, therefore, that the mandamus should go.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A. L. SMITH, J.—This is an application by Mr. Elliot, the senior churchwarden of the parish of St. Mary, Islington, that the vestry should be ordered to honour his request to them to pay him a certain sum of money. The facts are very short. Mr. Elliot was appointed churchwarden and took over a sum of £8 1s. 9d. from his predecessor; a question arose as to whether the wall of this burial ground, which has been turned into a recreation ground, should be rebuilt or whether an alteration should be made and part of it turned into a railing. The vestry duly sanctioned the making of the alteration, and clearly authorized Mr. Elliot to receive tenders for the work. On the faith of the resolutions of the vestry Mr. Elliot entered into contracts, and before the work was executed he asked the vestry for £500 on account. That sum was well within the mark of what he lawfully made himself liable for. He sent in his application and it was not met. He therefore comes to this court for a mandamus. It is said that upon the true construction of the Act no mandamus can go unless the churchwarden has actually paid out of his pocket the sum for which he asks. If we were to construe the section in that way, what a heavy responsibility we should cast upon the churchwarden; he would be obliged to incur all sorts of expenses before he could ask the vestry to pay him. I agree that the custom of a vestry cannot alter an Act of Parliament, but it may be that the custom is reasonable and agrees with the statute. [His lordship then read section 18, and continued:—] Do the words "costs and expenses" mean sums actually expended? I think they mean costs and expenses which have to be paid—that is the reasonable and business-like construction. Then it is said a certificate is required. I think that an allegation in writing, a precept in writing, a request to pay in writing satisfy that word, and I think that the requirement is met by this document of the 1st of February. Such a document had always been honoured by this vestry before; in fact, two similar precepts sent by Mr. Elliot himself had been met. The points taken by the vestry will not avail them. Assuming that Mr. Elliot were to misappropriate this money when he gets it, he would be surcharged when he goes out of office, and the amount would be carried over to his successor. I think that this application is improperly resisted by the vestry; they have no morals on their side and no law.

Rule absolute.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF LONDON.
Ex parte FULHAM VESTRY. (a.)

Justices—Appeal—Dismissal of complaint by magistrate—Right of appeal by complainant against acquittal—Party "aggrieved"—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 105.

There is no right of appeal against the dismissal of a complaint under the Highway Act, 1835, for obstructing a highway, as the words of section 105 of that Act, which give a right of appeal to the quarter sessions to any person who shall think himself aggrieved by any order, conviction, or judgment, or determination made, or by any matter or thing done by a justice of the peace in pursuance of the Act, apply only to the case of a conviction, and do not give any right of appeal in case of an acquittal.

Rule calling on the justices of London to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, directed to them, commanding them to hear and determine a certain appeal at the instance of the Vestry of Fulham, upon the appeal of the vestry against the judgment or determination of A. C. Plowden, metropolitan police magistrate, upon the hearing of an information or complaint preferred by the vestry against one Cockerell, for unlawfully and wilfully obstructing the free passage of a certain highway, called Vereker-road, by erecting a fence across the highway. Vereker-road was a road used from time to time by the vestry for the purpose of carting materials from one part of the parish to another for repairing roads; and if it were closed the vestry would be put to additional expense by having to cart their materials by a longer route. For that reason the vestry desired to keep up their right to the road as a highway.

Cockerell, as agent for the owners, put up a fence across the road, to obstruct the road, and to prevent its becoming a highway.

Thereupon the vestry took proceedings against Cockerell, by a summons before a police magistrate, under the Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. c. 50), for unlawfully and wilfully obstructing the highway.

The magistrate dismissed the complaint, as he was not satisfied that the road was a public highway, and the vestry were ordered to pay three guineas costs.

The vestry then appealed to the quarter sessions against this acquittal, but the court of quarter sessions refused to hear the appeal, holding that there was no appeal from such acquittal.

Thereupon the vestry, the complainants in the case, obtained the present rule for a mandamus to the justices of London to compel them to hear and determine the appeal.

The question now argued was whether, under section 105 of the Highway Act, 1835, there is an appeal against a dismissal of the complaint, as well as against a conviction.

Section 105 enacts:—"If any person shall think himself aggrieved by any rate made under or in pursuance of this Act, or by any order, conviction, judgment, or determination made, or by any matter or thing done, by any justice or other person in pursuance of this Act, and for which no particular method of relief hath been already appointed, such person may appeal to the justices at the next general or quarter sessions of the peace to be held for the county, division, riding, or place wherein the cause of complaint shall arise."

Candy, Q.C., and Meates, showed cause.—There can be no appeal by a complainant against a dismissal of a complaint by a magistrate. The section only gives an appeal to a person "aggrieved," and a complainant whose complaint is dismissed is not a person "aggrieved" within the meaning of the section. Moreover, such a case does not come within the section, as it is not an order, or a conviction, or a judgment, or determination made by a justice. Therefore the section gives no right of appeal. No case can be cited where it has been held that there can be an appeal in case of an acquittal.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and Macaskie, in support of the rule.—There is a right of appeal in such cases, as the words of the section are wide enough to include appeals against acquittals as well as appeals against convictions. The words, "determin[illegible] the section include a dismissal of a complaint as well as a conviction, and a person whose complaint is dismissed is a person "aggrieved" by a "determination made" by a magistrate, and he therefore comes within the section, and is entitled to bring an appeal against such dismissal.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am not aware of any case which distinctly decides the question before us; but it is to be observed that this is the year 1890, and we ought also to observe that we are now asked to decide this point for the first time on the Act of 1835, an Act which has been in operation from 1835 down to the present time, and there is no case of a similar kind under that statute which can be pointed out to us. There must have been thousands of acquittals under that Act, which must have annoyed the persons affected by them, and yet there is no case during all that time of such an appeal as the present. I agree that this is a "determination made," and I do not know that it is not "a thing done by a justice in pursuance of the Act," but I do not think that is the way to look at a section of this sort. Generally, the principle of law is that if a man is acquitted, he is not to be tried a second time. Looked at broadly and looked at reasonably, this section does not give an appeal unless in case of conviction. Is a person who fails to get a conviction a person "aggrieved"? Is he, in the ordinary sense of the word, aggrieved because somebody has been held not to have done something wrong?

It appears to me that this section does not give an appeal unless when something has been done, some order made against a person. This rule, therefore, must be discharged.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I should like to add that, in my judgment, this is distinctly a criminal matter. I think that is so within the decision of the Court of Appeal and the principles laid down by the judges of that court. In form it is a fine, and imprisonment may follow, and therefore it is a criminal matter. I should like to add that this legislation took place in 1835, but analogous words have been found in very much earlier Acts than this, many scores of years before 1835, and yet there is no instance in the books in which, under similar words, an appeal has been successfully prosecuted on an acquittal. The appellant is generally a person who has been convicted, or something analogous to that. I cannot find a trace of any case under the Highway Acts where there has been an appeal in case of an acquittal, although there have, undoubtedly, been such cases under other Acts.

Rule discharged.

COLTMAN v. CHAMBERLAIN. (a.)

Mortgage of fishing boat—"Ship and appurtenances"—Articles included in mortgage—Articles put on board subsequently to mortgage—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 66, 70, 469, 484.

Under the word "ship" in the mortgage of "a ship, with its appurtenances," in the statutory form under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), all articles and materials, whether stored or in use, necessary for the accomplishment of its voyage, and on board at the date of the mortgage, will pass to the mortgagee; and all articles and materials substituted for such articles and materials subsequently to the date of the mortgage will also pass.

The construction of the word "ship" in section 1 of 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, as laid down in Gale v. Laurie, 5 B. & C. 156, is applicable to the same word in the present statutory form of mortgage.

Interpleader issue referred by Lawrance, J., at chambers on appeal from an order of Master Johnson.

In this case the claimant, Woodger, claimed certain goods on a ship under a mortgage to him by the defendant, of a ship, The Freedom, and its appurtenances, registered under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854.

At the instance of the plaintiff, as execution creditor, the sheriff had seized all the goods upon the ship. Some of the goods seized, were on board as stores at the date of the mortgage, while others had been substituted since for goods and appurtenances originally upon the ship at that date.

The material clause of the mortgage, which was in the statutory form, ran as follows:—"And for the purpose of better securing to the said mortgagee the payment of such sums as aforesaid, I, the said mortgagor, do hereby mortgage to the said mortgagee the 64 shares of which I (the mortgagor) am the owner in the ship above described, and in her boats, guns, ammunition, small arms, and appurtenances."

The ship Freedom was a trawler trading as a fishing smack, for the trade of which Woodger was agent and fish salesman. The articles seized, and now claimed as having passed under the words, "the ship and its appurtenances," were admitted to be as follows:—"A trawl beam and halyard mainsail (new in November, 1888, but not used until 1889), mizen-sail, maintop and stay-sails, big fore-sail, four jibs, one jib (new), mizen and stay-sails (stored in forecastle, other sails being in use on vessel), wire trawl warp, 180 fathoms of tackle, rope, twine balls, boat, two tea kettles, one kettle, one saucepan, three main-sails replaced, two mizen replaced, clock, lamp, lantern halyards, two compasses, one chart, baking tin, two coppers, side-lights, two masthead lights, and sundries (including a small steam-engine for raising nets)."

The following of the above articles had been admittedly supplied to and put on board The Freedom since the date of the claimant's mortgage:—"New main-sail, one stay-sail, one new jib, one mizen-sail, trawling warp, rope, twine, boat, tea kettles, kettle, saucepan, clock, lamp, lanterns, chart, baking tin, plates, and sundries."

"The above sails, trawling warp, boat, and other articles specified (except the chart, which the plaintiff claimed to except, but to which exception the claimant demurred) had all been supplied since the said date in the place of similar sails, warp, boat, and other articles which had worn out or been removed, lost, or destroyed."

Montague Lush and O'Neill, for the plaintiff, the execution creditor.—Articles added or substituted since the date of the mortgage cannot be deemed to pass under it, in default of any provisions respecting after-acquired articles to be put on board. If all loose articles on board ship were intended to be secured, the document must be held to be a security on chattels requiring to be registered as a bill of sale. The appurtenances ought to have been enumerated in a schedule. Many of these articles cannot be classed as appurtenances—i.e., necessaries of a ship;

Lano v. Neale, 2 Starkie, 105; Salmon v. Wood, Ex parte Gould, 2 Morrell's Bank. Cas. 137.

Aspinall, for the claimant, the mortgagee.—Anything on board ship for the purpose of an ordinary voyage passes under this mortgage, as also anything coming under that description substituted for any article on board at the date of the mortgage. All utensils and necessary outfit for a voyage are included. The word "ship" covers everything on board for the purposes of the trade in which the ship is engaged: Gale v. Laurie, 5 B. & C. 156; Woods v. Russell, 5 B. & Ald. 942. Many of these articles on ship board are analogous to trade fixtures: Batchelor v. Yates, 36 W. R. 563, 38 Ch. D. 112; Climie v. Wood, L. R. 3 Ex. 257, 16 W. R C. L. Dig. 72.

Grantham, for the sheriff, was not called upon.

O'Neill replied.

CHARLES, J.—This case results out of a contest between an execution creditor and the executor of a mortgagee of a ship. The question is, whether certain articles admittedly on board a ship called Freedom passed to the mortgagee under the mortgage or were liable to be seized by the sheriff at the instance of the execution creditor? The articles are of two classes Those on board the ship at the date of the mortgage and those put on board since the mortgage. As to the articles on board at the time of the mortgage, including, amongst other things, certain mizen-sails stowed away, and not in actual use, two compasses, lights, and steam-engine for the purpose of lifting the fishing gear when in use, the first question as to these things is, did they pass? and, if so, under what denomination? The mortgage purports to convey the sixty-four shares of the ship Freedom, of which the mortgagor was owner, together with guns, &c., "and apputenances." The ship was a trawler fishing-smack. It is clear that the masts and rigging would pass under the mortgage within the term "ship," and I am of opinion that all the first class of articles on board at the time of the mortgage would pass under that term, and, having regard to the authorities, not under the word "appurtenances." That I take to be the effect of Gale v. Laurie. It is true that decision turns on section 1 of 53 Geo. 3, c. 159; but it was held that the words "the value of a ship" in that statute was meant the tackle and apparel of the ship. A writ of prohibition was moved for against the Court of Admiralty entertaining a claim over the ship Dundee, because the claim included her fishing tackle and apparel. Lord Tenterden, then Chief Justice Abbott, says, "The sentence of the Court of Admiralty was against the plaintiff, both as to the value of the ship and the value of these stores and implements. It was contended that the plaintiff was not answerable in respect of the value of the latter, and on that ground a prohibition was applied for. The case was argued before us after a special verdict had been found, and we are of opinion that the present plaintiff, the owner of The Dundee, is responsible to the value of the fishing stores." The Chief Justice then goes on to read the section referred to and says, "In this section the word 'ship' only is used, but in the following sections the phrase 'the value of the ship and her appurtenances' occurs not less than ten times. The same phrase occurs in the 1st section of 7 Geo. 2, c. 15 and of 26 Geo. 3, c. 86. The three Acts are all in pari materiâ, and there can be no doubt that the first section of the Act on which this question arises is to be understood as if the words, 'with all her appurtenances,' were used therein, supposing those words would make any difference in the sense." That decision amounts to this in reference to the present case, that the word "ship" undoubtedly covers all fishing stores on board needful for the accomplishment of the object of the voyage, and though given in reference to another statute, not before us, it is instructive as to what the word "ship" may properly be held to include.

In the other case of Salmon v. Wood, Ex parte Gould, the evidence went to show that there was nothing to identify any particular nets as belonging to any particular boats, and upon that the court held that fishing gear did not pass under the word "ship" as referred to in section 72 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, but Wills, J., in his judgment says, "It has been argued that 'ship' is equivalent to 'ship and its appurtenances,' and to a certain extent that is doubtless so. It would include spare sails, duplicate anchors, anything, in fact, which it would not be prudent to send a ship to sea without." Taking, then, the definition of the materials on board this ship at the time of the mortgage as the necessary machinery or gear of a ship, being either articles necessary for steering the ship, lights for lighting it, and sails for sailing it, I think all such things passed in the mortgage under the word "ship." So far, such a construction gives no meaning to the word "appurtenances," but I have no doubt that there might be certain things which would more appropriately come under that description. Such a construction virtually settles the second question as well as the first—namely, as to articles put on board subsequent to the mortgage. This second class of articles were, beyond doubt, substituted for former similar articles, and come under the same definition. Though this is not admitted as to all, the true conclusion from the affidavits is that they were really put on board in substitution for articles which, being originally there, passed under the mortgage. It is said that there are no words in the mortgage professing to give to the mortgagee any interest in after-acquired articles. But no such words were necessary, because these articles are substituted for materials essential to the ship in question, as a ship. Such an argument would apply to any alteration in the ship itself, such as the replacement of its hull. The ship as repaired would undoubtedly belong to the mortgagee. Or, again, in the instance of a new mast, the same result would follow. We can draw no distinction, that I can see, between masts and sails such as are here the subject of dispute. If the original articles passed under the mortgage it seems to us that the articles substituted for these must equally pass. If so, there was no necessity for the registration of the mortgage as a bill of sale under the Act, and that objection fails.

obligation to pay demurrage for delay is absolute, although the unloading is the joint act of the ship and the consignee, unless the delay can be traced to the shipowner; so that, where a strike occurred, which prevented both the master and the charterer from doing their respective parts in unloading the ship, it was held that the charterer was liable.

Motion for judgment.

This was an action tried at Bristol before Cave, J., and a jury.

The plaintiffs, who were indorsees of the bill of lading for a cargo of barley shipped on board the defendants' ship Fairfield," sought to recover from the defendants the sum of £147 15s. 11d. which they had paid by way of demurrage to the defendants under protest in order to obtain their cargo.

By the bill of lading the shippers or their assigns agreed to pay freight and demurrage, "all conditions as per charter-party." By the charter-party the cargo was to be brought and taken from alongside the steamer at freighters' expense and risk, but the ship's crew were to render all customary assistance in hauling lighters alongside, and "thirteen running days, Sundays excepted," were to be allowed the charterers for sending the cargo alongside and unloading, but in no case should more than seven days be allowable for unloading; demurrage over and above the "lay days" at fourpence per ton on the steamer's gross register tonnage per running day—and "the freighters' liability was to cease when the cargo was shipped, the owner or his agent having an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, demurrage, lighterage at port of discharge, and average." The lay days were all consumed in loading, but the shippers agreed to allow six more days for unloading. The bill of lading contained the usual exemptions; but neither the bill of lading nor the charter-party contained any reference to strikes.

The Fairfield was ordered to Bristol, where she arrived on Monday, November 25, and unloading at once commenced. The mode of proceeding was this. The shipowners employed certain stevedores to do their part of the work (which by the custom of the port belonged both to the ship and to the consignees), and the consignees certain other stevedores to do their part. For the first three days the unloading proceeded without delay, but on Thursday, November 28, the dock labourers employed by the stevedores of both parties struck work, and nothing was done or capable of being done with the cargo till December 4. It then recommenced and was concluded on December 5. The defendants claimed demurrage from November 30, and exercised their lien on the cargo in respect of the amount claimed. By consent the question left to the jury was, "Were the shipowners ready and willing to do their part of that which it was customary for them to do?" The jury answered "No."

The judge left the parties to move for judgment.

Bucknill, Q.C., and J. V. Austin, for the defendants.—The defendants are entitled to judgment on the authority of Thiess v. Byers, 24 W. R. 611, 1 Q. B. D. 244. The only distinction between that case and this is that in Thiess v. Byers the cause which prevented both parties from doing their share of the work was bad weather, instead of strikes. No exception was made in that case as to weather, no exception is made in this as to strikes, and in both the number of lay days was fixed.

Cohen, Q.C., and Pyke (E. V. Bullen with them), for the plaintiffs.—This case is distinguishable from Thiess v. Byers because the shipowners are here in default, and their default was part of the cause of delay. The shipowners had not got the men ready to do their part of the work in unloading, whereas in Thiess v. Byers the men were there, and it was only vis major which prevented them from fulfilling their part of the bargain. All the cases assume the readiness and willingness of the shipowner to do his part which in this case is negatived by the verdict of the jury. In Nelson v. Dahl, 28 W. R., at p. 61, 12 Ch. D., at p. 583, Brett, M. R., says, "The ship must be ready so far as she is concerned to unload." In Mackay v. Dick, 29 W. R. 542, 6 App. Cas., at p. 263, Lord Blackburn says: "I think I may safely say, as a general rule, that where in a written contract it appears that both parties have agreed that something shall be done which cannot effectually be done unless both concur in doing it, the construction of the contract is that each agrees to do all that is necessary to be done on his part for the carrying out of that thing, though there may be no express words to that effect." Here the shipowner agreed to have sufficient labourers to do his part of the unloading, and as he failed to do so he cannot sue the charterers for the delay which is partly caused by himself. The liability of the charterers is absolute with one exception—namely, when the delay is traceable, as in this case, to the shipowner himself.

Bucknill, Q.C., in reply.

The judgment of the COURT was read by

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The question in this case is, whether, under the circumstances of it, the shipowner is entitled to charge demurrage. The shipowner refused to give up the goods of the plaintiff unless the demurrage claimed was paid, and the plaintiff, having paid under protest, seeks to recover what he paid in this action.

The facts of the case are these:—

The plaintiffs chartered the steamer Fairfield under a charter-party, whereunder the plaintiffs were allowed thirteen running days, Sundays excepted, for sending the cargo alongside and unloading, but in no case should more than seven running days, Sundays excepted, be allowed for unloading, and agreed to pay the demurrage over and above the said lay days at 4d. per ton on the steamer's gross register tonnage per running day.

By the charter-party the master undertook to deliver the cargo from alongside. By the custom of the port of Bristol the unloading of the cargo is the joint act of the ship and the consignee. In the case of a grain cargo the first act done is that the consignee sends on board men with shovels and bushels and sacks. These men measure the grain and place it in sacks. Then the master nominally (but the stevedores, in fact, as his agents) raises the sacks from the hold and brings them to the bulwarks ready to deliver over the side to the consignee or his agents—viz., in the port of Bristol the stevedores employed by the dock company.

The ship in question arrived on the 23rd day of November, and the unloading was begun on Monday, the 25th, but in the midst of the unloading, on the 28th, the dockers and stevedores struck, as well those employed by the dock company as those employed by the ship, and the result of this was that neither was the master in such a position that he could deliver nor the consignees in such a position that they could receive or otherwise do their part in the unloading.

The jury were, by agreement of the parties, asked the following question—viz., Was the shipowner ready and willing to do his part of that which it was customary for him to do? The answer of the jury was "No." The learned judge, in the course of his summing-up, in answer to a juror, said that if the master was not able to do his part, he was not ready and willing. The question is, For whom judgment ought to be entered under the circumstances?

It is said by the plaintiff that readiness and willingness of the master to deliver the cargo to the consignee is a condition precedent, the non-existence of which, according to the finding of the jury, disentitles the master from claiming this demurrage; and it is further said that, even though readiness and willingness to deliver the cargo may not be a condition precedent, it is something which the master has to do on his part, concurrently with the part which the consignee has to take in the unloading of the ship, and that, therefore, on the well-known principle established by the cases cited in the notes to Peeters v. Opie, 2 Wm. Saunders, 346, and Armitage v. Insole, 14 Q. B. 728, and many other cases, the master cannot demand performance by the consignee of his part without averring readiness and willingness, if not a tender of performance, of the conditions concurrent due from him which, for the purpose of effectively making the demand on the consignee, become conditions precedent. While approving of this contention, so far as it relates to conditions precedent, we are of opinion that they are not applicable to the present case, and, therefore, afford no ground for holding that the master was not entitled to claim demurrage. The fact is, that the obligation of the consignee to pay demurrage is "absolute," as was decided in Thiess v. Byers.

The readiness and willingness of the master to make delivery is not the consideration of, or condition precedent to, the undertaking to pay demurrage for the detention of the ship, and, this being so, it is not sufficient to relieve the consignee of the obligation to pay demurrage that he should show that the master was unable to perform some obligation undertaken by him in the charter-party, but it must appear that the consignee was prevented from discharging the ship within the time allowed for unloading by the act of the master or those for whom he was responsible. If this were not so the master would not have been entitled to recover demurrage in the cases of Thiess v. Byers; Porteus v. Watney; Straker v. Kidd; for in each of these cases it is plain from the facts that the master was not ready and willing to make delivery because he was prevented in the one case by the weather, and in the other two cases by the non-removal by third persons of the superincumbent cargo. It is quite true that in Straker v. Kidd Lush, J., speaks of an implied condition that the shipowner shall be "ready and willing to deliver," but his meaning is made plain by the next sentence in his judgment, where he says, "if he (the master) wrongfully refuses to give over the goods, or if, by reason of any default of his, or of any obstacle for which he is responsible, the consignee is unable to get his goods, this would afford a good answer to the claim"; and again, after stating that the contract is absolute and not conditional, the learned judge says: "The defendants are therefore liable unless they can show that some act or default of the owner, or of someone for whom he is responsible, prevented them from performing their contract."

In the present case the plaintiffs were not prevented from performing their contract by any default of the shipowner or those for whom he was responsible. It was the action of the stevedores and dockers which alike prevented the plaintiffs and defendants from doing their part in the unloading.

This in no way relieves the charterer or consignee from the absolute contract to pay demurrage for delay and detention of the ship during unloading. If the strike of the stevedores had resulted from unreasonable conduct of the master in refusing reasonable wages asked by the stevedores, the case might have been different, for then, perhaps, it might have been said that the shipowner prevented the charterer performing the contract, and that the act of the shipowner was the causa causans preventing the charterer; but even in such a case the charterer would, in our opinion, have to show that he was actually prevented by the default of the shipowner, i.e., that there were no available means of performing the contract, notwithstanding the default of the shipowner: Alston v. Herring, 11 Ex. 822. If such means were available, the charterer must avail himself of them to discharge the ship, and take his remedy by suing the shipowner for breach of contract, or he will be liable to demurrage. The result in the present case is that judgment must be entered for defendants, with costs of action and of this motion.

County court—Motion by trustee against high bailiff of county court—Formal notice—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 53, 54, 186—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 45.

Where a motion made in the county court by the trustee in the bankruptcy for an order declaring that he was entitled to certain property of the bankrupt which had been seized by the high bailiff under a writ of execution, was dismissed by the county court judge on the preliminary objection being taken that formal notice of the motion had not been given.

Held, that the provisions of section 53 of the County Courts Act, 1888, by which, before an action is commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of the Act, formal notice in writing must be given to the defendant, do not apply to a motion made in a bankruptcy; and that the case must go back to the county court judge to be heard upon the merits.

Appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Owen, in the county court at Cardiff, allowing a preliminary objection which was taken to an application made by the trustee in the bankruptcy.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case raised an important point of practice under sections 53 and 54 of the County Courts Act, 1888, by which certain formalities, including a notice in writing to the defendant, must be complied with before any action can be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of that Act.

Previous to the receiving order being made against the debtor two executions had been levied by the high bailiff of the Cardiff County Court against the debtor, and some intimation having been given that a petition for a receiving order was about to be filed, the goods were sold at 10 o'clock on the morning of February 4, 1890. The bankruptcy petition was presented against the debtor at 10.20 on the same day, and a motion was subsequently made to the county court by the trustee in the bankruptcy against the high bailiff, under section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, for an order declaring that the trustee was entitled to the goods, and directing the high bailiff to give up possession of them or their value to the trustee, on the ground that the execution was not completed at the time when the bankruptcy petition was presented.

At the hearing of this motion the preliminary objection was taken by the high bailiff that the formalities required by sections 53 and 54 of the County Courts Act, 1888, had not been complied with, which objection was allowed by the county court judge, and the application of the trustee was accordingly dismissed.

The trustee now appealed, it being admitted that if the appeal was successful the case must go back to the county court judge to be heard upon the merits.

Kisch, for the trustee.—The County Courts Act, 1888, has nothing to do with such a matter as this at all; and even if it has, then, according to the true meaning of sections 53 and 54, this matter is not within them. This was not an action. The trustee was applying for a declaration that he had a title to the goods by virtue of the Bankruptcy Act. According to the interpretation clause an "action" includes a suit, and means every proceeding in the court which may be commenced as prescribed by plaint.

Herbert Reed, for the high bailiff.—The county court judge was right in allowing the preliminary objection, because this motion was in reality an action against the high bailiff for wrong performance of his office. [A. L. SMITH, J.—Here the trustee made a motion. Did you ever know an action started by motion?] The term "action" must apply to any proceeding in which a person attempts to enforce a right. The word must have an extended meaning given to it. Here the trustee is really seeking to recover damages for something which took place before his title accrued. It is really nothing else but an action for damages, and notice ought to have been given. The question is one of great importance to county court officials.

CAVE, J.—This contention is an idle one. It is absurd to say that this was an action for trespass or for damages. It is simply a motion by the trustee to recover property which was the bankrupt's, and which the high bailiff has got in his hands, or, as is alleged, has improperly disposed of. It is not an action at all.

A. L. SMITH, J.—We have been told that what we are doing will take away the birthright of officials in the country, but we cannot help that. An "action" is a well-known thing, which is commenced by writ or plaint. The term "prosecution" is equally well known. In section 53 of the County Courts Act, 1888, both these terms are dealt with. Then it appears to have been thought by somebody that that would not cover a "suit." It was accordingly provided by the interpretation clause that "action" shall "include suit, and shall mean every proceeding in the court which may be commenced as prescribed by plaint." Now it is said that we ought to extend that further, and say that it shall include any proceeding by motion. We cannot do so.

Appeal allowed.

Bankruptcy notice—Judgment debt—Right of judgment creditor to include claim for interest—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 17—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 136.

A judgment creditor, in issuing a bankruptcy notice against a debtor under section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is entitled to include in such bankruptcy notice a claim for interest on the judgment debt.

Appeal ex parte from the refusal of the registrar of the county court at Guildford to issue a bankruptcy notice against the debtor.

The case raised an important question as to the right of a judgment creditor, under section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to issue a bankruptcy notice against a debtor so as to include a demand for interest on the judgment debt.

On February 15, 1890, an application was made by the appellant to the registrar of the Guildford County Court to issue a bankruptcy notice against the debtor, by which notice was given that unless within seven days the sum of £14,896, claimed as being the amount due on a final judgment obtained in 1888, was paid by the debtor, or secured or compounded for, or unless the court was satisfied that the debtor had a counter-claim, set-off, or cross demand against the applicant which equalled or exceeded the sum claimed and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained, such debtor would be considered to have committed an act of bankruptcy on which bankruptcy proceedings might be taken against him.

Of the amount of £14,896 claimed, the sum of £13,796 was the amount of the judgment, a sum of £1,100 being added for interest on the judgment debt at the rate of four per cent.; but the county court registrar refused to allow this latter sum to be included, and he altered the bankruptcy notice by reducing the claim to £13,796.

The judgment creditor now appealed.

Cautley, for the appellant.—The issuing of a bankruptcy notice depends on section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. By rule 136 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, "a bankruptcy notice shall be in the Form No. 6 in the Appendix, with such variations as circumstances may require." The rule and the form must be read with section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Act, and it is quite clear that variations in the form were intended. The form is such as clearly to cover the interest on the jugdment debt. By section 17 of the Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 it is provided that "every judgment shall carry interest at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum from the time of entering up the judgment until the same shall be satisfied, and such interest may be levied under a writ of execution on such judgment." It is impossible to satisfy the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment without paying interest.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He referred to Ex parte Lewis, In re Clagett, 36 W. R. 653.

CAVE, J.—I think the judgment creditor is entitled to have a bankruptcy notice issued for the amount due on the judgment which includes the interest. There might be a question whether the two amounts should not appear separately in the notice, but that is a matter of detail. The creditor is entitled to have the amount of the interest added to the judgment debt so that the debtor may be informed by the notice that he cannot comply with the notice without paying the interest on the debt.

A. L. SMITH, J., concurred.

Company—Shares—Transfer—Executor—Broker—Blank indorsement — Certificates — Estoppel — Domicile — Foreign law.

The executors of a registered owner of shares in a New York railway company signed blank transfers, which were indorsed on the certificates, and handed them to their brokers, with the intention of having the shares registered in their own names. The brokers deposited the transfers, by way of security, with their bankers, and were afterwards adjudicated bankrupts. The documents themselves were quite consistent with the fact that the executors had signed merely to complete their title.

Held (affirming the Court of Appeal), that the executors were not estopped, as against the banks, from asserting their title to the shares and certificates as part of the testator's estate.

May 12.—Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—The executors of Mr. Michael Williams had vested in them by law the shares which are the subject-matter of this controversy. The facts which gave rise to the controversy are simply that the executors, in order to get themselves registered in the books of the company, intrusted the possession of the share certificates to a person named Blakeway, who, in fraud of the trust reposed in him, pledged the certificates to raise money for himself with the appellant banks. The share certificates were in a form which contemplated the holder of them being entitled, when so disposed, to transfer the shares of which he was on the face of the document itself the owner by a form which, though on the same piece of paper as the share certificates themselves, was a separate instrument, and purported, when completed, by being signed by the person who on the face of the instrument was stated to be the owner, to transfer to someone else, by the execution of this form of assignment, his property in the shares. It is admitted that the shares (or, to speak more accurately, the share certificates) are not negotiable instruments, and the executors, being informed that in order to get themselves registered in the books of the company they must sign their names at the end of the document, acted upon that assurance, and, as I have said, intrusted the possession of (never intending to part with the property in) the share certificates to Blakeway. Blakeway was a stockbroker in London, and the transaction of loan took place in London; but the shares in question are shares in a corporation established in New York, and subject to the laws of that State. If it were necessary to consider what law must govern, as between these parties, the right to these certificates on the one hand, and the right to detain them as pledged for the money advanced on them on the other—though the certificates themselves were the certificates of shares in a foreign corporation—I should not doubt that it is to the law of England you must look, and not to the law of the United States. But, in the view which I take of the transaction in question, it does not appear to me that there is any such conflict as has been suggested at the bar.

It is not denied that Mr. Williams's executors never intended to part with the property in these shares. They simply parted with the custody of them, and I am unable to follow the observation made by Kekewich, J., in his judgment when he says that "it cannot be suggested for a moment that the executors are precluded from asserting the truth." "On the contrary," he said, "my judgment goes on an examination of the real facts." Blakeway's authority was simply to obtain the registration of the executors, and, if the real facts are examined, the executors never intended to part with the property, and did not do any act which, to them at least, suggested that they were giving an authority other than what I have described; and how it can be said that, apart from what Kekewich, J., describes as "a familiar use of the word estoppel," they have parted with the property to someone else, I am wholly unable to understand. But the doctrine that a person shall not be permitted to represent, or permit to be represented, a state of facts at one time, and afterwards, when such representation has induced another person to change his position, seek to show that such his representation was erroneous, is a doctrine too well established now to be shaken, and, whether it is accurately called "estoppel" or not, the principle is perfectly intelligible. But Kekewich, J., then goes on to say that "the executors are precluded from asserting that Blakeway was not by the custody of these documents precluded from dealing with them as he from time to time considered desirable." If this means the mere custody apart from what the instrument upon the face of it represented to any person to whom it might be exhibited, I am wholly unable to assent to any such proposition. But if it means that the document itself, in the condition in which it was intrusted to Blakeway, represented by its being in that condition that Blakeway was entitled to deal with it, then the decision of the learned judge becomes intelligible, but only upon the ground (which he nevertheless himself disclaims) that the executors made, or permitted to be made, a representation that Blakeway had full dominion over the certificates to do what he pleased with them, which representation having been made the executors are estopped from denying it. Now, the question is, Have they made, or permitted to be made, on their behalf any such representation? With the greatest respect for the gentlemen who have given evidence on the subject of the law of New York, so far as it is relevant to the matter in hand, it seems to me that the law is the same in both countries, and, as I say, the question is, whether, expressly or impliedly, the executors permitted a representation to be made by Blakeway that he was entitled to deal with the certificates as he pleased. Now, the form of the certificates, and of that which is intended to be used as a transfer when a registered owner makes the transfer, appears to me to be all-important. I have intentionally, in what I have said before, refused to adopt the phrase used at the bar, "that the executors executed the transfer."

The document, such as it is, with the names of the two executors subscribed, will not read so as to be a perfect and intelligible document. The person who begins by describing himself as the owner of the shares is not the person who signs; and, as Lindley, L.J., very pertinently inquires, "What is it the executors have done? What representation have they made which they are precluded from denying or explaining away?" The mere form of the document which they have signed certainly does not in itself purport to show that they are intending to give a complete title to anybody. But undoubtedly a document may by usage become so well understood, in a particular sense, that a person may be well estopped from denying that when he issues it to the world it must bear the sense which usage has attached to it. And that brings one to inquire whether it is true that the issue of this document to the world in this form would show that the person signing had intended to give a complete title to anyone. To my mind the evidence shows beyond doubt that the document might mean at least one of two things—either that the executors were going to sell these shares and transfer them to someone else, or that they were signing in order that they might be themselves registered in the books of the company as the legal representative of the deceased holder, John Michael Williams.

Now if that is all that the document upon the face of it represents, and I cannot doubt that when all the evidence is looked to that is not an unfavourable mode of representing it towards the appellants, let us see what would have been the result if Blakeway, instead of simply tendering the document as security for a loan to himself, had said in plain terms to the bank what I have described as being the representation made by the document itself. "I tell you (the bank) I have been intrusted with these certificates for only one of two purposes, but I will not explain which—either to sell or to get the names of the owners of them registered in the books of the company." Can there be any difference between that which is stated in plain terms and that which, as a matter of business, ought to have been inferred from the nature of the document itself? I think none. I am therefore of opinion that the judgments of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed, and these appeals dismissed with costs, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord WATSON.—These appeals involve the right of the appellant banks to retain, in a question with the respondents, certain documents of title representing 1,210 hundred-dollar shares of the capital stock of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Co. The company and its undertaking are American, and the rights of its shareholders, as well as the effect of its stock certificates, are admittedly governed by the law of the State of New York. The certificates issued by the company to its registered shareholders are for ten shares each, and bear in gremio that the shares are "transferable in person or by attorney only on the surrender and cancellation of this certificate, by an indorsement thereof hereon, and in the form and manner which may at the time be required by the transfer regulations of the company." The indorsement on the certificate is in the form of a transfer for value received, blank in the names of the transferor and transferee, which is obviously meant to be executed by the person who is entered in the register of the company and in the body of the certificate as the owner of the shares. The system thus adopted has the merit of inseparably connecting the certificate with the transfer, and so preventing the dishonest creation of a legal right by transfer to one person, and a competing equitable right by deposit of the certificate with another. The late John Michael Williams was the registered owner of these 1,210 shares, for which he held certificates in the usual form. The respondents, who are executors of the deceased, were desirous of having the shares transferred to their own names; and for that purpose they, on the 29th of January, 1881, sent the certificates to Thomas, Sons, & Co., their London brokers, having previously, as directed by that firm, signed as executors the blank transfer on the back of each certificate. Instead of using the certificates for the purpose for which they were sent, William Evan Blakeway, one of the partners of Thomas, Sons, & Co., on the 10th of February and the 20th of April, 1881, delivered them to the appellants, the Colonial Bank, along with a mass of other securities, in order to cover advances made and to be made to his firm. On the 15th of August, 1883, certificates representing 500 of these shares were returned to Blakeway, who, on the same day, obtained an advance of £20,000 from the appellants, the London Chartered Bank of Australia, on the security, inter alia, of the certificates for these 500 shares, which he authorized the bank to sell or otherwise dispose of at their discretion in the event of the advance not being repaid by the end of the month. Thomas, Sons, & Co. were adjudicated bankrupts on the 4th of February, 1884, when it appears that the securities held by the appellants were not sufficient to cover their advances. As soon as the frauds practised by Blakeway came to their knowledge, the respondents applied to the appellants for the certificates then held by them for 710 and 500 shares respectively. Neither of the appellants had obtained registration in respect of these shares, which still stood in the books of the company in the name of the deceased, John Michael Williams, but they declined to comply with the respondents' demand, on the ground that, according to the law of New York, delivery of the certificates with the indorsed transfer signed by the respondents was per se sufficient to pass to recipients for value and without notice the full legal and equitable right to the shares. That is their main defence to these actions, which pray for a declaration that the several deposits of the respondents' certificates were fraudulent, and conferred no title on the appellants, and for delivery of the certificates. That the interest in the railway company's stock, which possession of these certificates confers upon a holder who has lawfully acquired them, must depend upon the law of the company's domicil, seems clear enough, and has not been disputed by the respondents. But the parties to the various transactions, by means of which the certificates passed from the possession of the respondents into the hands of the appellants, are all domiciled in England; and it is, in my opinion, equally clear that the validity of the contracts of pledge between Blakeway and the appellants, and the right of the latter to retain and use the documents as their own, must be governed by the rules of English law. In the application of these rules the appellants are, of course, entitled to the benefit of any privilege which the law of America attaches to possession of these documents, as conferring right or title to the property of the shares. In so far as the law of America is concerned, your lordships have the aid of three experts, two of whom were examined by the appellants, and one by the respondents. As I understand their evidence, the principles of American law do not differ in any way, or at least in any material respect, from those by which an English court would be guided in similar circumstances. When the indorsed transfer has been duly executed by the original owner of the shares, the name of the transferee being left blank, delivery of the certificate in that condition by him or by his authority transmits his title to the shares both legal and equitable. The person to whom it is delivered can effectually transfer his interest by handing his certificate to another, and the document may thus pass from hand to hand until it comes into the possession of a holder who thinks fit to insert his own name as transferee, and to present the document to the company for the purpose of having his name entered in the register of shareholders, and obtaining a new certificate in his own favour. The appellant's witnesses say that delivery of the certificate with the transfer executed in blank, "passes the property" in the shares; but that statement must be accepted subject to the explanations by which it is qualified. The right of the holder appears from these explanations to be in the nature of a jus ad rem and not of a jus in re. Delivery does not invest him with the ownership of the shares in the sense that no further act is required in order to perfect his right. Notwithstanding his having parted with the certificate and transfer, the original transferor, who is entered as owner in the certificate and register, continues to be the only shareholder recognized by the company as entitled to vote and draw dividends in respect of the shares until the transferee or holder for the time being obtains registration in his own name. It would, therefore, be more accurate to say that such delivery passes, not the property in the shares, but a title, legal and equitable, which will enable the holder to vest himself with the shares without risk of his right being defeated by any other person deriving title from the registered owner. According to the custom of bankers and stockbrokers, both in this country and America, a certificate with the indorsed transfer executed in the manner already described is regarded as being "in order," and its delivery in exchange for value received is understood to be sufficient to pass the full title of the registered owner. Even when the delivery has been fraudulent, as in the present case, the Supreme Court of New York has held that the registered owner cannot reclaim the document from a holder who has given valuable consideration in good faith, and without notice of the fraud. But it is necessary to observe that the decision of the court did not attribute to the instrument any privilege or negotiability in the legal sense of that term. It was based (to use the language of Mr. Carter, one of the appellants' witnesses) "upon the circumstance that the registered owner has so dealt with the certificate as to lead the purchaser for value to believe that he was taking a good title to it. In other words, the foundation rests in the principle of estoppel."

Thus far the principles of American appear to me to be in harmony with the principles of English law. According to the latter, the true owner of such documents of title is not held to have parted with his interest in them, except where he intended to pass such interest, or where, by reason of some act or omission, he has estopped himself from saying that he did not intend to pass it.

The cases cited in the course of the argument which relate to competition between equitable and legal rights to stock or shares have really no bearing here. Whether the respondents are estopped from saying that Blakeway had not their authority to dispose of the certificates in question is, in my opinion, the sole question presented for decision in these appeals. Had the transfers been executed by John Michael Williams, and the certificates thereafter sent by him to Thomas, Sons, & Co. for safe custody, I should not have hesitated to hold that Blakeway, though acting fraudulently, was nevertheless placed by his act in a position to give a title to an honest purchaser, which his employer could not dispute. But that is not the case with which we have to deal. The transfer was signed by the respondents, who were not the registered owners of the shares, and were not named in the certificate. Whatever may be the effect of an instrument so executed, one thing is clear, that it cannot be regarded as, either in law or by custom, equivalent to a certificate and transfer executed by the registered owner himself. When the executors of a registered owner find it necessary to dispose of his shares they may for that purpose sign either the indorsed transfers or a separate transfer. But these documents themselves are insufficient to enable a person to whom the executors intend to pass the shares to obtain registration and a new certificate in his own name. In order to effect that object it must be proved to the satisfaction of the company that the persons signing the transfer as executors really possess doubt that such a delivery would have been effectual for that purpose. But they were not. As I have already said, the only object they had in handing them thus signed to the brokers was to complete their title by obtaining registration in their own names. And the question to be determined is whether parting with the possession of the certificate so signed was an act which estops them from setting up their title against a person who has taken the certificates bonâ fide and for value from the brokers intrusted with them. A most important piece of evidence was adduced at the trial bearing upon this point. It was proved that it was the usual course, where executors desire registration in their own name, to forward the certificates with the indorsement signed by them, and acknowledged with a duly authenticated copy of the will, to the New York office, and that on such certificates and copy will being filed new certificates in the names of the executors are returned to them. It thus appears that certificates, signed as those now in controversy were, may be in the hands of brokers for either of two purposes, to effect a transfer or to complete the title of the executors. Their possession is just as consistent with the one purpose as the other. The case seems to me to differ essentially from that of a transfer signed by the registered owner. He must, presumably, have signed it with the intention some time or other of effecting a transfer. No other reasonable construction can be put on his act, and if he intrusts it on that condition to a third party, I think those dealing with such third party have a right to assume that he has authority to complete a transfer. But when the indorsement is signed by executors, who are not the registered owners, there can be no such presumption. They may well have signed it merely to complete their title without the intention of ever parting with the shares. Under such circumstances I do not think anyone dealing with a broker in possession of such certificates has a right to assume that he has authority to complete a transfer of them; his possession is equally consistent with the absence of any such authority, and with his holding them merely for the purpose of procuring registration in the name of the executor. Indeed, I think the evidence shows that the latter would be the more probable explanation of the signature by the executors. For, though an attempt was made to prove that it was a common practice for executors to sign indorsed transfers for the purpose of transferring the shares on a sale or pledge, the attempt signally failed. Under the rules of the New York Stock Exchange the delivery of certificates with the indorsement signed by the executors of the registered owner, is not a good delivery. And in the New York financial market, amongst bankers and brokers, it is not usual to lend upon the security of share certificates thus signed by executors; they are not regarded as being in order. Any such transaction would be exceptional only, and depend upon confidence in, or some special arrangement with, the borrower. Nor would a transfer signed by executors be a good transfer on the London Stock Exchange. A certificate and transfer would not be accepted unless it was clean on the face of it. And it is a remarkable fact that the representatives of several of the most important banking establishments in this country, who were called as witnesses, were unable to point to a single instance in which certificates with indorsed transfers signed by the executors of the registered owner had been taken in the course of their business as security for an advance. I have come without hesitation to the conclusion that there is no estoppel in this case as against the respondents which prevents their setting up their title to the shares and the certificates which represent them, a title which they have never intended to part with, and of which they can have been deprived, if at all only by estoppel. For these reasons I think the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

Lord MORRIS. — I do not think it necessary to consider some nice questions which might arise under certain circumstances on the transfer by delivery and indorsement of certificates which are admittedly not negotiable instruments. In this case did the transfer and indorsement made by the executors of John Michael Williams transmit title to the shares to the appellants? On the facts (which it is not necessary to recapitulate), if the transfer and executorial indorsement did so vest the property it must have done so by estoppel, as well by the law of the State of New York as by the law of England. Mr. Carter, a member of the American Bar, examined on behalf of the appellants, thus states the law of New York: "The foundation of the title of a bonâ fide purchaser for value of a certificate of stock which has been delivered to him in fraud of the rights of the registered owner rests upon the circumstance that the registered owner has so dealt with the certificate as to lead the purchaser for value to believe honestly that he was taking a good title to it; in other words, the foundation rests on the principle of estoppel." Applying that principle to this case, the appellants, in taking delivery of the certificates from Blakeway, should have acted in such a manner as reasonable men would in dealing with such an important matter of business. They did not so act. According to the American evidence the certificates were not "in order," and would not, according to the rules of the New York Stock Exchange, pass from hand to hand. The documents were imperfect, and though in a proper case the imperfections might be remedied, that is not a sufficient answer when the appellants have to rely on title by estoppel. According to the English evidence, the certificates as indorsed would not be accepted in delivery on the English Stock Exchange. Consequently, whether considered from American usage and law or English, the documents were imperfect; the appellants were thereby put on inquiry, and being so put, can have no better title than their transferor Blakeway. In my opinion the judgments should be affirmed.

Orders appealed from affirmed, and appeals dismissed, with costs.

Appeal from North, J.

The testator, William Kershaw, who died in 1886, had by his will bequeathed his residuary estate to the plaintiffs in the present action, upon trust to pay the debts of the testator and, subject thereto, upon trust for the testator's son, John Kershaw, absolutely. The testator had also appointed the plaintiffs his executors.

On the 12th of March, 1887, John Kershaw assigned all his interest in the testator's residuary estate to his wife, the defendant, Harriet Kershaw, as her separate property.

The residuary estate of the testator consisted of a sum of £1,103 cash, and fifty shares of £5 each in the Belgian Mills Co., on each of which a sum of £3 had been paid up, leaving £2 per share still uncalled, but liable at any time to be called up on the passing of a resolution to that effect by the directors of the company.

On the 29th of April, 1887, the plaintiffs paid the £1,103 cash to Mrs. Kershaw, and handed her the certificates of the fifty shares, but no transfer of the shares to her was executed. Mr. and Mrs. Kershaw, however, executed a release to the plaintiffs.

There was some evidence to show that the plaintiffs knew that £2 per share at that time still remained uncalled, and that it was not improbable a call would shortly be made.

In August, 1887, a call of 10s. per share, payable on the 10th of September, 1887, was made. Immediately upon receiving notice of the said call the plaintiffs sent the notice to the defendant, Mrs. Kershaw, and requested her to pay the same, but she refused to do so.

The Belgian Mills Co. having brought an action against the plaintiffs to enforce payment of the said call, on the 3rd of January, 1888, the plaintiffs paid to the company the sum of £27 9s., being the amount of such call (£25), together with interest thereon from the 10th of September, 1887, and costs.

The plaintiffs thereupon informed the defendant of the payment by them of this call, and requested her to pay to them the sum of £25, with interest thereon at four per cent. per annum from the 10th of September, 1887, and also to accept and register a transfer of the said shares. The defendant, however, refused to do so.

The plaintiffs then took out an originating summons, claiming a lien on the shares for the amount of the call and costs, and on the 23rd of February, 1888, an order was made declaring that they had a lien for the amount of the call, interest, and costs, directing the costs to be taxed, and, in default of payment of the amount due, the plaintiffs were to be at liberty to sell the shares. The costs were taxed at £67 18s. 9d.

The defendant, Mrs. Kershaw, having refused to pay, the shares were sold, and realized only £26 5s.

The plaintiffs then instituted the present action against Mrs. Kershaw claiming payment from her of the difference between the sum they had received by the sale of the shares and the sum due to them. Mrs. Kershaw, by her defence, pleaded that she had not at the commencement of the action nor at the present time any separate estate free from a restraint on anticipation.

It appeared from the evidence that Mrs. Kershaw had, prior to the commencement of the action, disposed of the £1,103 cash; but that she was entitled to a contingent reversionary interest under the testator's will.

North, J., at the trial of the action, held that the case was governed by Jervis v. Wolferstan, L. R. 18 Eq. 18, 22 W. R. Dig. 251, and made an order declaring that the plaintiffs were entitled to be indemnified out of the testator's residuary estate against the sum paid by them for calls (£25) and interest, and against so much of the £67 18s. 9d. costs as did not relate to the costs of the originating summons, such amount to be certified, and also against their costs of the action, to be taxed as between solicitor and client. And it was ordered "that the plaintiffs recover against the defendant Harriet Kershaw the said sum of £25 and interest, the said costs to be certified and costs to be taxed, such amount to be payable out of her separate property, and not otherwise. Execution hereon to be limited to the separate property of the defendant not subject to any restriction against anticipation, unless, by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the property shall be liable to execution notwithstanding such restraint."

Mrs. Kershaw appealed.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the appellant.—The liability for calls is a debt: Williams v. Harding, L. R. 1 H. L. 9, 14 W. R. H. L. Dig. 3, and see section 16 of the Companies Act, 1862. Section 75 does not displace section 16. Jervis v. Wolferstan is distinguishable, for there the liability was a remote and contingent liability, but here the liability was defined and known to be likely soon to arise. In Fraser or Robinson v. Murdoch, 30 W. R. 162, 6 App. Cas. 855, Lord Blackburn, at p. 872, considered that Sir George Jessel, in Jervis v. Wolferstan, stated the right of trustees to indemnity in somewhat too wide terms. Executors are not entitled to recover back residue which they have paid away after having had notice of a debt, or even notice of a claim: Williams on Executors, 8th ed., p. 1457. Further, the defendant is a married woman, and there is no evidence of any express contract or engagement by her pledging her separate estate to indemnify the executors, and no such engagement can be implied: Leedham v. Chawner, 4 K. & J. 458. 7 W. R. Ch. Dig. 86; Leake v. Driffield, 38 W. R. 93, 24 Q. B. D. 98; Harrison v. Harrison, 36 W. R. 748. The words "or otherwise" in section 1, sub-section (2), of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, refer to suing on contract or on tort.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the plaintiffs, the respondents.—The other side have overlooked the fact that Pike v. Fitzgibbon, 29 W. R. 551, 17 Ch. D. 454, is now no longer law; it is sufficient if the married woman have separate estate at the date of the judgment obtained against her: In re Shakespear, 33 W. R. 744, 30 Ch. D. 169; Palliser v. Gurney, 35 W. R. 760, 19 Q. B. D. 519. Jervis v. Wolferstan governs the present case, and is a clear authority to show that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover back their money.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., in reply.—The executors having taken proceedings to establish a lien on the shares, and having obtained a sale of the shares, are not entitled afterwards to proceed against the defendant personally: Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson, 4 App. Cas. 801, 28 W. R. Dig. 86. The maxim Nemo bis vexari applies. [BOWEN, L.J.—This objection ought to have been taken in the court below.]

Cur. adv. vult.

July 5.—COTTON, L.J.—In this case a testator left the residue of his personal estate to his son, John Kershaw, who assigned his interest in it to his wife, the defendant, Harriet Kershaw, for her separate use. The residue comprised fifty shares of £5 each in the Belgian Mills Co. (Limited) on which £3 per share had been paid. The plaintiffs, who are the executors, paid the clear residue to the defendant by the direction of John Kershaw, and gave her the certificates of these shares, but by some accident no transfer of them to her was executed. After they had so paid the residue to the defendant, an action was commenced against them for a call on the shares, and they were obliged to pay it. They applied to Mrs. Kershaw to indemnify them against the amount they had been obliged to pay, but she refused to do so. They then sought to indemnify themselves by taking proceedings in the Chancery Division to obtain a sale of the shares, and they were sold by order of the court; but they did not produce sufficient to indemnify them. The defendant having still refused to pay them the balance, they commenced this action against her to recover the amount out of her separate estate. Their demand has been resisted on several grounds. I will first consider the case as if Mrs. Kershaw were a feme sole. If an executor pays away the residue of an estate to a legatee without knowledge of anything which interferes with the right of the legatee to receive it, he is entitled to call on the residuary legatee to refund, in the event of the executor afterwards being obliged to pay anything on behalf of the testator's estate. That is not a right depending on contract. It is said these executors have lost that right because, with knowledge of the liability on these shares, they paid over the residue to Mrs. Kershaw. If an executor with knowledge of a debt hands over the residue to the legatee, and the executor is afterwards obliged to pay that debt, he cannot recover the amount from the residuary legatee. But that rule does not apply where the executor has no notice of the debt, but only notice of a liability which may mature into a debt. A liability to a call is not a debt until the amount is actually called for. In Jervis v. Wolferstan Sir George Jessel, M.R., held that notice of a liability does not prevent an executor from recovering back the assets if he has paid them away, when the liability becomes a debt. It is true that in that case the Master of the Rolls referred only to a liability of a very shadowy nature, but he did not proceed on that, but on the principle that notice of a liability is not sufficient to deprive the executors of their right to recover. It must be notice of a debt, and where there is no debt the executor does not lose his right to recover. If notice of a liability was sufficient to deprive an executor of his right to recover it would cause enormous difficulty in administering estates, considering the liability of so many persons on shares and leases, and nearly every estate would have to be administered by the court. But it is said a call on shares stands on a different footing, and constitutes a debt from the time when the testator became a shareholder. But liability to a call is not a debt until the call is made. We were referred to section 16 of the Companies Act, 1862, which enacts that, "All moneys payable by any member to the company, in pursuance of the conditions and regulations of the company, or any such conditions or regulations, shall be deemed to be a debt due from such member to the company." The money payable is to be a debt, but when? When it becomes payable in accordance with the regulations of the company, and by the articles of association of this company the shareholder is only obliged to make the payment when called on by the directors to do so. There is, therefore, no debt until a call is made. We were also referred to section 75 of that Act, which enacts: "The liability of any person to contribute to the assets of a company under this Act in the event of the same being wound up shall be deemed to create a debt (in England and Ireland of the nature of a specialty) accruing due from such person at the time when his liability commenced, but payable at the time, or respective times, when calls are made as hereinafter mentioned for enforcing such liability, and it shall be lawful in the case of the bankruptcy of any contributory to prove against his estate the estimated value of his liability to future calls as well as calls already made." That section only applies where the company is being wound up. There is a marked distinction between sections 16 and 75.

No debt was existing here when the executors paid over the residue to the defendant. Therefore, if Mrs. Kershaw had been a feme sole, the executors would have been entitled to compel her to refund. But the defendant, Mrs. Kershaw, is a married woman, and it is said that the plaintiffs cannot sue her as a feme sole because she entered into no contract with respect to her separate estate, and that the claim of the executors to indemnity does not give them a right to sue a married woman who has entered into no contract. No doubt here there is no contract by her, but I do not agree that therefore she cannot be sued. It is said that the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is against that. I do not agree. By section 1, sub-section 2, it is provided that a married woman shall be capable of being sued either in contract or tort, "or otherwise," as if she were a feme sole. It is said that that power of suing a married woman is only in connection with her power to contract. I do not agree with that. The power to contract is distinct from the liability to be sued. The words "or otherwise" cannot be disregarded. They make her liable to be sued as if she were a feme sole. If the defendant here were a feme sole the executors would be entitled to sue her and recover this money. It is also said she has no separate estate. She has not as separate estate that which was handed to her. But she has separate estate, and though the plaintiffs' remedy against her may be defeated by the restraint on anticipation, yet she has separate estate.

It was urged that this judgment will to some extent cause the executors to be paid twice over. That is not so, for the judgment excludes the costs of the former proceedings, so that the executors will only be paid what has not already been paid to them. They got a right under the previous order, not an order for payment. Then it is said that the former judgment makes this res judicata. The former order was for a limited purpose, a sale and indemnity out of the proceeds; the present action is to obtain a refund of money paid, so that it is for a different purpose. This point could not be dealt with in the former action, as there was no knowledge that the sale of those shares would not indemnify the plaintiffs. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal fails.

FRY, L.J.—I am authorized by Bowen, L.J., to say that he concurs in this decision. North, J., gave the plaintiffs relief for two distinct sums, one was the amount of the call on the shares, and the other the unpaid balance of their costs, charges, and expenses as trustees. Those two amounts stand on two different footings. The main argument on behalf of the appellant was, that the plaintiffs had paid the residue of the estate to her with notice of a debt due from the testator, and that if no debt was due they had notice of a liability which brought the case within the same rule as if there had been notice of a debt. I am of opinion that the plaintiffs had no notice of a debt. They had notice of a liability, but that was merely a liability, and not a debt. Section 16 of the Companies Act, 1862, is explicit to show that this liability only became a debt when the amount became payable in pursuance to the articles of the company; that is, when a call was made. It was a liability before the call was made, and a debt afterwards. Section 75 shows that, on a winding up, that which was before a liability becomes a debt. If a liability is the same as a debt, that is one of the idlest pieces of legislation one can conceive. I hold, therefore, that the plaintiffs had no notice of a debt. Then it is said that notice of a liability is sufficient. That point was considered by Sir George Jessel, M.R., in Jervis v. Wolferstan, where he said:—"I have looked through many cases, and I have asked for the assistance of the bar, and I cannot find the rule stated in wider terms than these, that he cannot recover from a legatee a payment made with notice of a debt." This is the rule of law, and it is founded on good sense. If the executors could not recover any sum paid to a residuary legatee when they had notice of a liability, it would keep a large part of most estates in the hands of the executors.

Then it is argued that the defendant is a married woman, and that there is no evidence that she is possessed of separate estate. I agree with what Cotton, L.J., has said on that point. On what principle can the married woman be sued in this case? It is suggested she could be sued on the ground of an implied contract to indemnify these executors; but that does not appear to me to be a satisfactory ground on which to rest her liability. I think the right to sue the defendant in this case is given to the plaintiffs by the words "or otherwise" in section 1, sub-section (2), of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. It enables a married woman to be sued "in contract, or in tort, or otherwise." The action here stands on the following footing: A contract was entered into by the testator, whose property the defendant has, under which a debt arises, after his death. The creditor can sue the executors and recover to the extent of the assets, and the executors pay him, and have an equal right against the estate and the legatee of that estate. That right is based on the original contract of the testator, whose money got into the hands of this married woman. The object and effect of that sub-section is to enable a married woman to be sued on any cause of action on which a man can be sued, subject to the fact that her power to contract is limited, and that the remedy is confined to her separate estate. The cause of action is the same as in the case of a man, the relief is different. Then there is a point which was not argued, but which we have considered. Can an executor recover his costs, charges, and expenses, after he has paid over the residue of the estate? I think they may be recovered from the legatee to the extent of the estate received by him, though, as the point was not argued, I leave myself free to decide otherwise if the point should arise for decision. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal fails.

In re PORTUGUESE CONSOLIDATED COPPER MINES. BADMAN'S AND BOSANQUET'S CASES. (a.)

Company – Shares – Allotment – Directors – Allotment by unauthorized directors – Ratification by company – Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 67.

A. and B. had applied for shares in a mining company, and on October 24 1888, two of the four directors of the company met and allotted shares to A. and B. and other applicants. The allotments so made were invalid, the two directors not having authority to make allotments. Letters of allotment were, however, sent out, and were received by A. and B. on October 25. A. returned his allotment letter, but the secretary refused to receive it back, and both A. and B. immediately wrote complaining of the manner in which the allotments had been made, and asking to be relieved from taking the shares, but neither of them expressly repudiated the shares. On October 31 B. paid the allotment money to the company's bankers under protest, as he alleged, but there was no evidence that any protest had been communicated to the company. On December 24 the company brought an action against A. for the allotment money payable by him. On January 7, 1889, at a meeting of directors, at which two were present, it was resolved that certificates be sealed of the shares allotted to A. and B., and this was accordingly done and notice thereof given to A. and B. There was no evidence that the meeting of January 7 was in any way irregular or invalid. On January 16, at a meeting of all the four directors, the minutes of the prior meeting of January 7 were signed.

A. and B. subsequently applied to have their names removed from the shareholders' register.

Held, (1) that the invalid allotments made to A. and B. on October 24 were capable of being ratified by the company, and had been so ratified as regards A. on December 24, when the action to recovr the allotment money was brought against him by the company, and had also been so ratified as regards both A. and B. either on January 7, 1889, or on January 16 at the latest; (2) that, under the circumstances of the case, and in the absence of any prior repudiation of the shares by A. or B., the ratification had been made within a reasonable time; and, consequently, that neither A. nor B. were entitled to have their names removed from the register.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Appeals from North, J.

The Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines Co. was registered on the 20th of October, 1888. The articles of association provided:—

Clause (70) "The shares shall be allotted by the directors to such persons at such times and in such manner as they shall think proper."

(75) "The qualification of a director shall be the holding of at least forty shares."

(80) "The first directors shall be appointed by the majority of the subscribers to the memorandum of association."

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(91) "The business of the company shall be managed by the directors."

(96) "The directors shall hold meetings for the dispatch of business at such times and places, and may adjourn and otherwise regulate such meetings as they think fit, and may determine the quorum necessary for the transaction of business."

On the 22nd of October, at a meeting at which the seven subscribers to the memorandum of association were present, it was unanimously resolved "that the following gentlemen be appointed directors of the company: Lord Inchiquin, Captain Skewis, Matthew Loam, Richard Wood, and J. H. Hoyle; the latter gentleman will take his seat after allotment."

A prospectus dated October 17, 1888, and a form of application for shares had been sent to and received by each of the present appellants, Messrs. Bosanquet and Badman.

The prospectus contained a statement that the "share capital of the company is £100,000 in twenty thousand shares of £5 each, payable as follows:—10s. on application, £1 10s. on allotment, and the balance, as and when required, in calls of not more than £1 each at intervals not less than two months each. In cases where the number of shares allotted is less than the number of shares applied for, the surplus paid on deposit on such shares will be credited towards the amounts payable on allotment. Should no allotment be made, the deposits will be returned in full."

The form of application addressed to the directors of the company was as follows:—

"Gentlemen, — Having paid to the company's bankers the sum of £ , being a deposit of 10s. per share on application, I request you to allot me that amount upon the terms of the company's prospectus; and I hereby agree to accept the same or any smaller number that may be allotted to me, and to pay the balance of £ per share, as provided by the said prospectus."

On the 23rd of October Bosanquet signed an application in the above form for 200 shares, and Badman for 50 shares. On the 24th of October two of the directors Captain Skewis and Richard Wood, met, and allotted to Bosanquet and Badman the shares they had applied for. No allotments of shares to the directors themselves were, however, then made, but the meeting was adjourned to the 25th of October, when the same directors attended and allotted forty shares to each of the directors. Notice of the allotments were sent to each of the allottees. The meeting was further adjourned to the 26th of October, when Captain Skewis, Wood, and Loam attended and passed a resolution confirming the allotments already made.

Badman had, when he applied for his shares, sent a cheque for the money due on application, but on receiving the allotment letter he stopped the cheque, and returned the allotment letter, saying that he wished to be relieved from the shares; but he did not in terms repudiate the shares on the ground that the allotment was invalidly made. The secretary returned him the allotment letter, but he did not pay the allotment money. As regards Bosanquet, he paid the money payable on allotment of the shares, as well as the application moneys, but he alleged that he had paid the allotment money under protest; there was, however, no evidence that any protest had been communicated to the company. He also did not repudiate the shares on the ground of invalidity of allotment, though he complained that the allotment was unfair.

On December 24, 1888, an action in the name of the company was instituted against Badman to recover the amount of the application and allotment moneys payable by him, and the company obtained an order for payment under order 14.

On January 7, 1889, at a meeting of directors at which two only were present, it was resolved that certificates of the shares which had been allotted should be issued, and this was accordingly done, and notice thereof was sent to the shareholders. Bosanquet wrote in reply that he did not at present intend to take the shares, and was in hopes to be soon in a position to compel the company to return his money.

On January 16 another meeting of directors was held, at which Lord Inchiquin, Captain Skewis, Loam, and Richard Wood were present, and Lord Inchiquin, as chairman, signed the minutes of the previous meeting of January 7.

On February 18, 1889, a petition for winding up the company was presented.

On March 7, 1889, at a duly constituted meeting of directors, a resolution was passed confirming the allotments made on the 24th, 25th, and 26th of October, 1888.

On April 2, 1889, North, J., held, in Steele's case, In re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines, 42 Ch. D. 160, 37 W. R. Dig. 36, that the allotments made in October were invalid, notice of the meeting of October 24 not having been given to all the directors, and this decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal on May 31, 1889.

On February 10, 1890, North, J., dismissed applications made by Badman and Bosanquet to have their names removed from the register as holders of the shares allotted to them on the ground that they had withdrawn their respective applications for shares before any valid resolution to allot the shares had been passed by the directors.

From this decision Bosanquet and Badman now appealed.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Farwell, for the appellant Bosanquet.—Bosanquet's application to take shares was based upon the terms set out in the prospectus and the articles of association. The prospectus held out five persons by name (including Lord Inchiquin), whom it was proposed should be directors, and the articles provided that the shares should be allotted by four of these directors, and that the qualification of a director was the holding of forty shares (articles 70 and 75). These terms were a condition precedent of the contract. But the shares were, in fact, allotted to the appellant at a meeting, held on the 24th of October, at which only two of the directors were present, and when not a single share had, as yet, been allotted to the directors. There was, therefore, in fact no contract to take shares: Ernest v. Nicholls, 6 W. R. 24, 6 H. L. Cas. 401; and nothing capable of ratification, so that Bolton v. Lambert, 37 W. R. 434, 41 Ch. D. 295, does not apply. It has been decided by the Court of Appeal in In re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines, Steele's case, that the two directors who purported to allot the shares at the meeting of the 24th of October, could not validly do so because the meeting was not a properly constituted meeting; the ratification relied on is a ratification made by two directors, of whom Hoyle was one, but he was excluded by the terms of the prospectus from taking part in the allotments, and therefore he was not capable of ratifying the previous invalid allotment. The alleged ratification is, therefore, itself invalid. It must be shown that the persons who ratified were persons who at the date of the supposed contract were capable of contracting; the principle of ratification depends on relation back to that date, and that principle applies equally to both parties: Saunderson v. Griffiths, 5 B. & C. 909; Doe v. Walters, 10 B. & C. 626.

The date of the alleged ratification is the 7th of March, 1889, and the date of Bosanquet's application for shares is the 22nd of October, 1888; the ratification, therefore, was made too late, for it would have been too late to allot five months after the application: Ramsgate Victoria Hotel Co. v. Montefiore, 14 W. R. 335, L. R. 1 Ex. 109; Lyell v. Kennedy, 38 W. R. 353, 14 App. Cas. 437. Again, ratification cannot be used inequitably; the directors are not entitled to put off the ratification until shortly before the company goes into liquidation: Homer District Co. v. Smith, 39 Ch. D. 546; Mayor of Kidderminster v. Hardwick, 22 W. R. 160, L. R. 9 Ex. 13. Bosanquet paid the allotment moneys under protest.

E. Beaumont, for the appellant Badman.—Badman, when he received the allotment letter, at once stopped the cheque he had given, and wrote to say he did not wish to take the shares; he was not then, however, aware of the fact of the invalidity of the allotment, or he would have then distinctly repudiated. As to the alleged ratification, even if the ratification took place on the 24th of December, 1888—the date of the issue of the writ by the company against Badman—it was too late. The value of shares in a company like this, a mining company, fluctuate rapidly in a short period even, and a delay of two months in making an allotment would be inequitable to an applicant for shares; and if such delay would render it inequitable to allot, it must be also inequitable to confirm an invalid document. The circumstances here preclude any supposition of a continuing offer on Badman's part. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Hagedorn v. Oliverson, 2 Man. & Sel. 485]. There the underwriter had got all he bargained for—viz., the premiums—and the only question was whether an alien could take advantage of the insurance.

He also referred to Mathew's case, 3 De G. & Sm. 234.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and W. Baker, for the respondent company, were called on to argue only with regard to the question whether the ratification was made within a reasonable time.—There was in fact no repudiation of the shares by either of the appellants until after the ratification of the contract. The present cases are therefore distinguishable from Steele's case, because Steele distinctly repudiated the shares directly he received the allotment letter. The allotments were confirmed and ratified by the meetings held on January 7 and January 16, and the latter date is the very latest time at which the ratification can be fixed. The company did nothing to mislead either Badman or Bosanquet into the belief that they would not be held to their bargain. Ex parte Baily, 16 W. R. 1093, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 592, is distinguishable, and the ratification is within a reasonable time.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., in reply.—Though at the meeting of January 16 the minutes of the meeting of January 7 were signed by Lord Inchiquin, there is no evidence that those minutes were read and confirmed at the meeting of January 16. [Baker referred to the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 67.]

COTTON, L.J.—There are two appeals before us, and to a considerable extent the arguments are common to both, but we must deal with them separately in considering the question of ratification.

The facts in Bosanquet's case are these. He applied for shares in the ordinary way (the terms of the application I shall refer to presently), and there was an allotment made to him of the shares he had applied for. The allotment was made at a meeting no notice of which had been sent to one of the directors, so that those who attended the meeting were not able to bind the company; nevertheless they purported to make a contract on behalf of the company allotting 200 shares to Bosanquet. The allotment was made on the 25th or the 26th of October, and on October 31 Bosanquet paid (though he said he did so under protest) the money which was to be paid by him on allotment. After that nothing is done practically until January 7, 1889, when a meeting is held at which it was resolved that the certificates of the shares be sealed with the seal of the company and be issued to Bosanquet and the other allottees.

In Badman's case the facts are that he applied for, and had shares allotted to him in the same way, but on receiving the allotment letter he wrote saying—not that he had made no contract—but that he wished to be excused taking the shares, and he returned the letter of allotment; this, however, the secretary refused to receive, and sent him back the returned allotment letter.

I will first deal with the argument that is common to both cases. It was said that according to the terms of the contract, and as a part of those terms, there was that which prevented—independently of anything else, and even if the board who made the contract had been duly authorized to contract on behalf of the company—there being any contract which could be enforced; for it was said that according to the terms of the prospectus, and having regard to the articles, certain named persons were to be agents on behalf of the company to allot the shares and to determine the allotments. But that would not be part of the contract; it might be a ground, if it could be established, for setting aside the contract on the ground that it was wrong that that contract should be made by the persons who made it. The form of application was relied on in support of this argument, and it was as follows:—"Having paid to the company's bankers the sum of £ , being a deposit of ten shillings per share on application, I request you to allot me that amount on the terms of the company's prospectus." What do the words "on the terms of the company's prospectus" mean? Do they mean on condition that the allotment is made by the persons named in the prospectus and articles as about to make the allotment? I cannot think that they mean that. I think those words have reference to the terms as to payment, which are to bind the parties when the contract is made, and do not refer to any provision in the prospectus or articles as to the persons who are to make the contract. The prospectus contains the following terms:—"Payable as follows: 10s. on application; £1 10s. on allotment; and the balance, as and when required, in calls of not more than £1 each at intervals of not less than two months each"; and further, "in cases where the number of shares allotted is less than the number of shares applied for, the surplus paid on deposit on such shares will be credited towards the amounts payable on allotment. Should no allotment be made the deposits will be returned in full." In my opinion those are the terms on which the application is made, and it is not contended that anything has been done with reference to those terms which prevents this contract to take shares being enforced against either of these applicants.

Then it was urged that the Court of Appeal has already decided that the board which purported to make the allotments was so constituted that it could not validly make the contract on behalf of the company, because no notice of the meeting had been sent to one of the directors, although if that had been done there would have been a sufficient number of directors, as no quorum of directors had been fixed by the articles. And it was said that, as there was no contract by persons authorized on behalf of the company, there could be no ratification except by the persons who could have originally made the contract—

i.e., the contract of allotment. That I think is a fallacious argument; but looking at the facts of the case—at least as regards Mr. Bosanquet—I do not think it need be considered. The contract of allotment and the ratification of it are distinct matters. There is a contract purporting to be a contract of the company, and purporting to be made on behalf of the company, and although the Court of Appeal has held that the persons who purported to make the contract of allotment had no power to bind the company, yet as regards ratification any persons who were authorized on behalf of the company to ratify can do so, even though they were not the persons originally authorized to enter into the contract. The argument really depends on the fallacy of considering the contract as one made, not by or on behalf of the company, but by the individual directors who purported either to allot, or who afterwards confirmed that allotment. The contract is the contract of the company, and I know of no rule which compels the court to hold that the confirmation of the contract may not be made by those who have authority on behalf of the company to confirm the contract. In this case the directors have full power to do everything on behalf of the company except what is specially reserved to be done by the company acting in general meeting; and in my opinion, therefore, it is not necessary to show that those who confirmed this contract—for it purports to be a contract made on behalf of the company—were the persons who were nominated as the persons to allot the shares.

Then the question arises as to what ratification there was, and whether that ratification has been made within a reasonable time. I will take Badman's case first. He never in fact repudiated the shares, and on the 24th of December an action was brought against him in the name of the company to enforce payment of the moneys which he ought to have paid both on application and on allotment; for though he had sent a cheque for the money payable on application for the shares, he had stopped that cheque. That action, therefore—which we must assume to have been properly brought on behalf of the company—was an assertion by the company that they held Badman to his bargain, and it was an election by the company—if up to that time they were not bound by the unauthorized act of those who purported to act as their agents—to adopt that unauthorized act as a contract made by persons whom they authorized, and whose action they ratified and confirmed. The ratification, therefore, in Badman's case must be taken to have been made on the 24th of December, and that, in my opinion, was not an unreasonable time. There had been no previous declaration by Badman that he repudiated being bound; there had been only an appeal ad misericordiam by him to the directors, saying in effect, "I cannot pay, I ask you kindly to allow me to be relieved from the shares, and not to enforce your claims against me." The company treated him as being entitled to these shares and as being a shareholder; and although it is true that in a company like this, shares do fluctuate considerably as regards their value and prospects, yet I cannot think that at that time there existed any sufficient reason for holding that it was inequitable for the company, as against Badman, to ratify that which had been purported to be done by an insufficient number of directors, so as to bind him by it.

Then as to Bosanquet. He had paid the money payable on allotment, and although it is said he paid it under protest, that cannot be regarded. There is no evidence as to whom the alleged protest was made; the only evidence is that when he paid the £150 to the bankers on allotment, he wrote on the letter of allotment "paid under protest." The bankers were not agents to receive on behalf of the company any notice of protest, and therefore that cannot be regarded. In his evidence, no doubt, Bosanquet does state that he hoped to get further evidence and then to get off his liability; but he did not even then state that he considered the allotment was bad; he only said it was very unfair, which I think meant that he considered that the directors had allotted hastily, and that he hoped to find out some reason, in consequence of what he considered their hasty and unfair conduct, for getting off the contract he had entered into. The next thing that occurs is on the 7th of January, when a resolution was passed that the certificates of the shares should be sealed and sent to him, and they were sent to him on the following day. Then he sends an answer that he does not at present intend to take the shares. That I think, however, is not material as regards the point I am now dealing with—the point as to ratification—because the certificates had been already sealed and a resolution passed at a meeting of directors, which was entered in the minute book. Section 67 has a bearing upon this:—[His lordship read the section, and continued:—] We have no evidence at all as to the circumstances under which this meeting was held. There is no evidence in this case, such as there was in Steele's case, that there had been no notice of the meeting sent to those directors who were not present at it, and I think that we are bound by this section to hold, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the meeting was duly held and convened, and, if so, notice must have been sent to all the directors, and then those who were at the meeting would be in a position to act for, and on behalf of, the company, as there was no quorum required by the articles. Therefore, as early as the 7th of January there is, I think, a ratification by the company of the act of their invalid body of directors, treating Bosanquet as the holder of these shares. But, at all events, at a little later date—viz., the 16th of January—there was a meeting held of all the four directors, who, it is said by Mr. Higgins, could alone ratify, on behalf of the company, the previous allotment; and Lord Inchiquin, as chairman of the meeting held on the 16th of January, signed the minutes of the previous meeting of the 7th of January. It is true that in the minutes of the meeting of the 16th of January there is nothing said about the minutes of the preceding meeting having been read and confirmed, but we know that in the ordinary and regular course of business, at meetings of this kind, the minutes of a previous meeting are not signed until they have been read, and that then they are signed for the purpose of confirming them. The minutes of the meeting of the 16th of January, therefore, show that all the directors recognized and adopted the contract with Bosanquet, and that if it had not been already ratified by the meeting of the 7th of January, it was, at latest, ratified and made effectual by the signature given on the 16th of January by the direction of a meeting of all the directors. On the 16th of January, therefore, at the latest, there was an effectual ratification and adoption of the contract purporting to have been made on behalf of the company by those who acted in October; or, to put it in another way, there was then, at latest, an election by the company to be bound by the act of those who had acted on the 24th and 25th of October.

Then, is that too late? It is said there had been a considerable alteration in the position and prospects of this company between the 24th of October and the 16th of January. In my opinion that has not been satisfactorily established. I do not think that what Mr. Higgins has referred to establishes it, and in any case it was a matter which ought to have been brought forward pointedly, in such a way that those who represent the company could have met it by showing that there was no such substantial alteration in the state of the company between the 24th of October and the 16th of January as to make it inequitable to ratify on the latter date, the previous act of those who were not authorized to act so as to bind the company.

In my opinion, therefore, though Steele's case does show that the allotment made in October did not amount to a contract so as to bind the company, yet the case of Bolton v. Lambert is an authority for holding that the ratification should relate back, and that there has been an effectual ratification so as to bind both Bosanquet and Badman. The appeal, therefore, fails.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think this case is governed, when the facts are understood, by the case of Bolton v. Lambert.

It is said, first of all, that the allotment which was in fact made on the 24th of October, 1888, in response to an application in the ordinary form for shares, was altogether a nullity. If it was altogether a nullity, it was void, as distinguished from voidable. It is said to have been a nullity on two grounds, first, because the real contract between the parties was a personal contract—i.e., that the allotment (if any) should be made by the gentlemen whose names are on the prospectus. I cannot take that view of the contract; it is a forced and unbusiness-like view, and, having regard to the articles which refer to the directors, I cannot say that it is the true view. It is, in my opinion, no part of the contract that the allotment (if any) should be made by some directors as distinguished from others. Secondly, it is said that the fact that the contract was made by persons without authority makes it void. That point is covered by authority, it was the very point urged in Bolton v. Lambert, but the Court of Appeal repudiated it, and held that the contract was only voidable at the option of the principal, that the principal at his option could either avoid it or could elect to uphold it.

Now, one is struck by the fact, that there is in the present case no sign, from the beginning to the end, of anything like an election by the company to avoid the allotment, or to disavow the act of those who purported to be their agents. The company never take that line; on the contrary, everything they do is consistent, and consistent only, with the view that they ratified and upheld the act of those agents.

It has been said that there was no valid ratification, because, inasmuch as the directors who ratified could not have allotted, the company were not bound by such ratification. That appears to me to be a fallacy. Of course a principal cannot by his agent ratify something which he could not do originally, but it is not sound law to say that a principal cannot ratify by an agent something which he could originally have employed another agent to do and which has been done.

The remaining point—viz., as to whether ratification was within a reasonable time—is a more difficult one. There was certainly no repudiation, and that is important. In Badman's case there was certainly nothing like repudiation of the contract by him. He said he would "rather be off it," but the company would not let him off, and the bringing of the action against him for the money, on the 24th of December, is as clear an election to abide by the allotment as anything can possibly be. It was urged by Mr. Beaumont that it was too late for the company then to say that the allotment had been made; but the case is not like the cases cited in which there had been an application followed by the lapse of four or five months, and then an allotment. It is nothing of that kind, and it appears to me this argument is utterly untenable.

Bosanquet's case is a little better, but here again one must examine closely what passed. Bosanquet certainly never repudiated what was done until February 16, 1889, even if he did so then, as to which I will say something presently. His letter of October 26, 1888, was not a repudiation, but merely a complaint. Then between that date and January 16 there was this very important matter. It seems that the company—who had got his money, because he had paid his £300 to the bankers—he says he paid it under protest, but that protest is not brought home to the company at all—put their seal to his certificate, and the secretary wrote to him that he could have the certificate in exchange for his letter of allotment, but he would not have it. What is that but a clear, distinct, unequivocal act by the company in conformity with what they had done, as adopting the allotment as a valid contract? It appears to me that after that it would have been useless for the company to say that it was competent for them to repudiate the acts of their so-called agents or improperly appointed agents. They could not have done it.

But the case does not quite rest there, because after some further correspondence there is on January the 7th a formal resolution adopting in terms what had been done, not only in Bosanquet's case but in all the other cases. Though I thought at first it was a little unfair, I have come to the conclusion, having regard to the fact of the sealing of the certificates and the offering of them to Bosanquet, that it was then neither too late nor unfair for the company to ratify what had been done. It appears to me, therefore, that Bosanquet fails to make out that there is a defect in this ratification.

It comes, therefore, to this, that there was an allotment, in fact, by agents who had no authority, but whose authority never was repudiated by the appellants, and which authority has always been acted on by the principal from first to last.

The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I also think that this appeal must fail. The first point which Mr. Higgins raised is one the answer to which depends on the true construction of the contract. It is a question of construction. It was said that it was a condition of this contract that the shares should only be allotted by designated persons, persons who were indicated in the prospectus as the agents of the company to allot. It is not open to the appellant on this appeal to take the specific ground of misrepresentation, because that was not taken in the court below, and the proceeding has not been so shaped. But I agree that it does not follow necessarily that facts amounting to a misrepresentation may not give rise to relief upon another ground; and if Mr. Higgins could show that the true construction of this contract was that the shares were only to be allotted by designated persons, then, no doubt, he would be entitled to say, if the designated persons had not allotted the shares, that there had been a failure of a condition precedent or a warranty. If the contract was one of that kind, it would be in some sense a personal contract; not in the sense that the continuing personality of the party contracted with, was of the essence of the contract, but in the sense that the personality of the agent of the party contracted with, was of the essence of the contract. It would be a peculiar kind of contract. I do not know that I can call to mind for the moment any contract which would be an illustration of the doctrine; but, nevertheless, as persons may in a free country contract on what terms they please, one can conceive in theory that there might be a contract of which it was a condition that the agent of one of the parties, and the only agent to act, should be a designated person

But is that what this contract of allotment comes to? It certainly can only be held to be such a contract if the words, "upon the terms of the prospectus," used in the letter of application, are read in the sense in which Mr. Higgins asked us to read them. I think that is not the right construction to put upon them. I do not think that those words mean that the applicant only agrees to contract on the condition that the shares are to be allotted by the particular agents held out in the prospectus, but I think that they mean that he agrees that if the contract of allotment is made, the obligations of the parties under the contract shall be consistent with the terms of the prospectus. Therefore, that objection fails. If it had been a good objection, I agree that it would have gone to the root of the case.

But then Mr. Higgins also says, assuming this was a contract of allotment made in the first instance by persons who were not the lawfully authorized agents of the company—who had no authority to bind the company—that the allotment was therefore in the first instance irregular and invalid, and that there was no allotment at all; and, further, he says that this is a case in which either there could be no ratification, or that there were at all events matters which prevented the company setting up ratification.

Now, I agree that as this is an act done professedly on behalf of the company by persons who had not in fact authority to act as agents of the company, it does require ratification by the company to make the act a good one, and to make it binding; and I also think a ratification by the company must occur within a reasonable time. I think that the principle upon which that is good law is—not as an election not to avoid the contract, because original contract, from my point of view, there was none, there being no authorized agents to make it—but an election to confirm the act which purported originally to be done by the authority of the company, although it was not so in fact, and, being an election, it must take place within a reasonable time, and the standard of reasonableness must depend upon the circumstances of each case. I do not think it requires authority to make that clear. If authority were wanted, Bailey's Case would supply it; and I think also that among the circumstances of the case almost the most important is the character of the parties between whom the question arises. I think that the question of reasonableness may differ if the subject-matter of discussion arises as between two contracting parties or as between a principal and his own agent.

With regard to the reasonableness of the time during which the ratification may take place, the strongest way of putting the argument on behalf of the appellants was that the act, in order to be binding, must be ratified within the period during which the original act could lawfully itself have been done, and for that proposition no doubt ordinary cases like Bird v. Brown, 4 Ex. 786, and Lord Audley's case, Cro. Eliz. 561, might be relied on; and it was argued that two months was much too long a time within which to keep open the question of allotment, and the case of Ramsgate Hotel Co. v. Montefiore was instanced, where it was held that after four or five months a person had a right to treat the matter as if an acceptance by the company had not been given, or indeed declined. But the fallacy of the argument, as it seems to me, lies in this, that there is no hard and fast line of two months in any case; the measure of the reasonableness of the time entirely depends on the circumstances of the case. You cannot take a hypothetical case, where on the hypothesis nothing has been done after an offer made, and all the parties have continued silent for two or three months, and assuming in that hypothetical case that two or three months would have been too long to wait to ratify, then apply that standard to a case where the circumstances are totally different, as is the present case. This is not the case of an offer, with silence following upon the offer for some time. It is true it is a case where there has been no valid allotment, but the parties have been acting together from first to last, or for some time at least, upon the faith that there had been an allotment; and although the parties are at arm's length, and there has been a controversy, yet the facts differ totally from the case of what I call silence, in which two months or three months might be a time beyond which the court would not consider the offer to be open, because primâ facie, of course, an offer made is a continuing offer until such time as is indicated, either by the parties or by reason, for closing with it or refusing it. It must be a question of fact in each case what the reasonable limit is. Mere time is nothing, except with reference to the circumstances.

Now, can it be said that the circumstances, with regard to either Bosanquet or Badman, closed the matter before the time at which the company's ratification is to be assumed to have taken place. In Badman's case I think that the ratification was clear on December 24. The action was brought by the authority of the company on that day. It cannot be denied that the requisite ratification must be a ratification by the company or its appointed agents, or agents who have authority to ratify; and an action brought by the authority of the company is the fairest and most open indication of an election to treat that which is no contract as if it had been ab initio a contract, and to give it vitality as from the first. There has been no repudiation, and the circumstances which have been pointed out by my learned brethren prevent the court from holding that the time was too long.

We certainly have no materials from which we can safely come to the conclusion that there had been such an alteration in the prospects of the company as rendered it unfair that what had been assumed to be in the first instance good between the parties, could not be made good by a subsequent option or election on December 24.

As to Bosanquet's case, I take it that the real ratification was either on January 7 or on January 16. I desire to reserve the point as to whether what took place on January 7 was not in itself valid. I do not dispute it, because it is not necessary to do so, but I should not like to say that it was invalid if it stood alone. It was, however, in any event made good by what took place on January 16, for the reasons which Cotton, L J., has given.

I only wish, further, to say that, even if there had been no ratification till March—the date at which the ratification is assumed, in the court below, to have occurred—I still would, even in that case, doubt whether, under these particular circumstances—and it is a question of circumstances—the ratification had then come too late.

Then it was further ingeniously argued by Mr. Higgins and Mr. Farwell that the ratification when it was made was not made by persons who could have done the original act. There is a fallacy in that argument. The ratification, when made, was made by the company, not by the agents of the company.

It was through the agents of the company and by means of the agents of the company, but the act itself was the act of the company if it was a good act in law, and the moment you resolve the argument into its elements, that moment you see where the fallacy lurks. In order to make the argument good it requires to be said that the act of ratification was the act of the agent, and not the act of the principal by his agent. Once observe that it is the act of the principal by his agent, and then the argument fails, unless, indeed, it can be said that it is a principle of law that a person cannot ratify an act done without authority, although professing to be done on his behalf, except by an agent clothed with the same measure of authority as would have been required to do the original act. But there is no such law. It is only necessary to see whether the agent is clothed with authority to do that act, not whether he would have been clothed with authority to do some other act; and the only act which we have to consider in the last instance being an act of ratification, the question we have to ask is, whether the person who purported to ratify on behalf of the company had really authority to do it. The validity of his ratification does not depend upon any supposed authority in the original agent. That is not the basis of the law of ratification, because supposed authority in the original agent there is none.

These last observations do not apply, it is true, to the ratification in Badman's case, because there the ratification was by reason of the action which the company brought by properly authorized agents; at least, they do not apply so obviously to it, but they apply to the argument used as to the constitution of the board which ultimately ratified what had been originally done.

I think the appeal fails, with the usual result.

Apportionment — Tenant for life and remaindermen — Trust fund—Will—Insufficient assets.

A trust fund being insufficient to pay the arrears of income and the corpus in full,

Held, that the total amount of income and capital actually received in respect of the trust estate must be divided between the tenant for life and the remaindermen in the proportion of the two sums which they would have respectively received if the fund had been sufficient to pay them in full; the tenant for life giving credit for the amount of income actually received by her.

Adjourned summons.

The trustees of the residuary personal estate of a testator in 1845 invested £7,535, portion of the trust estate, upon mortgage of freehold premises; and interest at five per cent was reserved by the mortgage. In 1862, the interest being in arrear, the trustees entered into possession of the mortgaged property, and remained in possession until the death of Sarah Foster, the tenant for life of the residuary estate, in 1888. Sarah Foster received the whole of the net rents and profits of the property while the trustees were in possession; but in two years only did the rents and profits exceed the amount of interest payable under the mortgage, and in other years they fell below that amount. The property was sold after the death of Sarah Foster, and realized only £7,005 and the executors of her will claimed £376 on account of arrears of income due to her as tenant for life.

The trustee accordingly took out this summons, asking that it might be determined whether any and what portion of the sum of £7,005 ought to be paid to the executors of Sarah Foster, and, if any portion was payable, upon what basis it ought to be calculated and ascertained.

KAY, J., made the following order:—Treat the capital moneys which have been produced by the sale and paid, and all moneys received by the tenant for life, as a fund recovered by the mortgagees. Add these sums together and divide the total sum in the following way:—

Estimate how much the tenant for life would have received if the mortgage interest had been regularly paid, deducting income tax. Then take the capital sum to which the remaindermen would be entitled on the supposition that the capital of the mortgage debt had been fully paid. Then divide the total sum recovered, ascertained as above directed, between the representatives of the tenant for life and the remaindermen in the proportion of these two sums, which they ought to have respectively received; and in making that division let the representatives of the tenant for life give credit for what she actually received. And if the sale did not take place until a little while after the death of the tenant for life, then credit the remaindermen with interest during that time. They ought to receive the full amount of the corpus with interest from the death of the tenant for life at four per cent. per annum, and therefore that interest will be an addition to the sum which the remaindermen ought to receive.

The total sum recovered will be divisible between the tenant for life and the remaindermen in that proportion.

The costs of the trustees will come out of the residuary estate, if any, and if there is no other residuary estate, then out of the capital of this fund. Each of the other parties will bear his own costs, and then they will come out of the proportionate share of each.

County court — Winding-up petition — Transfer from county court to High Court—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 126.

The High Court has jurisdiction to order the transfer of a winding-up petition from the county court to itself, notwithstanding that the petition has been opened in the county court.

Motion.

This was an application under section 126 of the County Courts Act, 1888, for the transfer of a petition to wind up the above society, which had been presented in the county court, to the High Court. The application was based on the fact that the affairs of the building society had been before North, J., on previous occasions, and that his lordship was throughly conversant with the circumstances of the society. In the former litigation a Mr. Sibun had recovered costs against the society, and he thereupon had presented the winding-up petition as a judgment creditor in respect of these costs.

Counsel on behalf of the society, upon the petition being called on, had applied to the county court judge not to proceed with it in order that it might be transferred to this court. The county court judge, however, permitted the petition to be opened, and the first witness to be examined, and then adjourned the further hearing till a date after this application, intimating that, in his opinion, it would be better to have it transferred to this court.

Higgins, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis, for the society.—The questions involved are difficult and complicated, and more suitable to be tried by your lordship as already conversant with the facts involved. It is not a suitable case to be tried in the county court. We apply under section 126 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Casserley, for the petitioner.—The application is too late. No order for transfer can be now made, as the matter has been opened before the county court judge. The society, if dissatisfied with the county court judge's decision, can appeal to the Divisional Court.

Beaumont Morice, for some withdrawing members.

NORTH, J.—I am of opinion that the order asked for in this case should be made. Two points have been raised for my decision—viz., whether there is jurisdiction at this stage of the proceedings to order a transfer to the High Court, and whether, if the court has such power, it should exercise it in the present case. Now section 126 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides:—"It shall be lawful for the High Court or a judge thereof to order the removal into the High Court, by writ of certiorari, or otherwise, of any action or matter commenced in the court under the provisions of this Act if the High Court or a judge thereof shall deem it desirable that the action or matter shall be tried in the High Court, and upon such terms as to payment of costs, giving security, or otherwise as the High Court or a judge thereof shall think fit to impose," that is, the court may make the order at any time before the matter is finally decided. Nothing in the section says that it shall be made at any particular period of the proceedings. Cases might of course arise where, if the application was made at an early stage of the proceedings, it would be allowed, whereas at a later stage it would be refused. The circumstances in this case are peculiar. Proceedings in reference to the society have been before me several times, and I am hence familiar with many things in the case with which the county court judge cannot be acquainted, and which would necessitate the entering into complicated circumstances to lead up to the petition and render it necessary for the various matters being gone into at great length. The learned judge also evidently wished the petition to be dealt with here. Nothing, or very little will be lost by the transfer. I do not think the difference in expense would be material. It is, in my opinion, a case in which I should exercise the discretion vested in me, and I make the order accordingly.

Bankruptcy—Appeal from order made in county court—Deposit as security for costs of appeal—Withdrawal of appeal—Right of appellant to return of deposit—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 131—Practice.

On an appeal being brought from an order made in the county court, the sum of £20 was lodged in the High Court by the appellant as security for the costs of the appeal, in pursuance of rule 131 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886. The appeal was afterwards withdrawn, the costs of the respondent in respect of it being paid; but an application by the appellant for a return of the deposit was opposed by the respondent, on the ground that certain costs incurred by the appellant in the county court had not been paid.

Held, that the appellant was entitled to have the deposit paid out, and that the respondent could not claim the deposit as security for the costs incurred by the appellant in unsuccessfully contesting the motion in the county court.

Application on behalf of Mrs. Scott, the wife of one of the bankrupts, for an order that a sum of £20 paid into court under rule 131 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, as security for the costs of an appeal, might be paid out, all the costs occasioned by the said appeal having been paid.

The bankruptcy took place in the Dorsetshire County Court, and in August, 1889, a motion was made in that court by the trustee in the bankruptcy for an order declaring that certain property which was claimed by Mrs. Scott as her separate property was in reality the property of the bankrupt. This motion was allowed by the county court judge with costs, which were taxed at £10 3s. 6d.

Without paying these costs an appeal was brought by Mrs. Scott from the decision of the county court judge, for which purpose she was required to deposit in the High Court the sum of £20 as security for the costs of the appeal in accordance with rule 131 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886.

Before the appeal came on for hearing, however, it was discovered that, although the bankruptcy was a small bankruptcy, the necessary leave to appeal had not been obtained, and that it was then too late to remedy the omission. The appeal was accordingly withdrawn, the costs of the trustee in respect of it, amounting to about £4, being paid; but on an application being made by Mrs. Scott that the deposit might be returned to her, the trustee refused to consent to its being paid out, and claimed that the £20 in question, in addition to being security for the costs of the appeal, was also security for the costs generally incurred in the bankruptcy; and he contended that the £20 should not be paid over until the £10 3s. 6d. unpaid costs in the county court had been satisfied.

An application was now made by Mrs. Scott to the court for an order that the deposit might be paid out to her forthwith.

Clavell Salter, for the applicant.—The short point is whether the £20 is security for the costs of the appeal, or whether it can be said to be general security for costs generally incurred in the bankruptcy. The £10 3s. 6d. cannot in any sense be the costs of the appeal. The costs of the appeal have been paid The sidenote to rule 131 says "Security for costs of appeal," and the £20 was only deposited for that purpose.

F. C. Willis, for the trustee.—Under the circumstances this money ought not to be paid out until all the costs have been satisfied. The order was made in August on Mrs Scott to pay these costs, and she has not done so. It is only reasonable that the trustee should have them before the deposit is returned.

CAVE, J.—This motion must be allowed The sum of £20 is paid into court for the purpose of satisfying any costs which the appellant may be ordered to pay. It is paid into court on behalf of the appellant in pursuance of a rule of the court, and must be dealt with in accordance with the rule; but there is no ground for saying that, because the money has been paid into court by somebody by reason of the obligation of the rule, therefore I must go beyond the rule and make it subject to some claim of the trustee which the rule does not make it subject to. The costs of the appeal having been paid, the money in court must be paid out. The trustee must also pay the costs of this application, but he may set off those costs against the other costs if he likes to do so.

Application allowed.

The property of the Institution of Civil Engineers, being legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of the "science" of civil engineering, comes within the exemption under sub-section 3 of section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, and is consequently not liable to the duty imposed by that section.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal, reported 36 W. R. 598, 20 Q. B. D. 621, reversing the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, 36 W. R. 523, where the facts are fully stated.

The House took time for consideration.

Aug. 1.—Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—The question in this appeal is whether the Institution of Civil Engineers is liable to be assessed in respect of the annual value, income, or profits of their property, to the duty imposed by part 2, section 11, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, or whether their property is entitled to exemption under sub-section 3 of the same section. It is not disputed that the property is liable to duty unless the exemption applies. The exemption is in these words: "Property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts." For the purposes of this discussion it is immaterial to consider the exact meaning of any of the words except the word "science," except also so far as the other words may in their collocation or otherwise reflect light upon the true meaning to be given to the word "science." It is, of course, impossible to contend that the word "science" is to be understood in its widest sense as being equivalent to knowledge, since, if it were, the exemption would practically withdraw every institution from taxation, inasmuch as, to use the language of one of the great philosophical teachers of Germany, in his lectures on the vocation of a scholar, "Culture must not be one-sided, but all-sided." And I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that if such an interpretation were to be given to the exemption "it would be very difficult to imagine any institution whatsoever which would be excluded." There is no branch of knowledge, however apparently trivial and unimportant, which may not—nay, which does not—contribute something to the storehouse of "science," so interpreted. I think, therefore, it would be unreasonable to suppose that an exemption so wide as practically to make the tax inoperative could have been in the mind of the Legislature.

But in the exemption itself I find, as an additional head of exemption, "the fine arts"—not all arts, it will be observed, but the fine arts. I infer, therefore, that the Legislature intended that an institution for the promotion of an art, unless it were a fine art, was to be subject to taxation. Now, without supposing that the statute contemplated the controversy (now many centuries old) between what was an art and what was a science, I think one may see by the generality of its phraseology "education," "literature," "science," and the limitation of "the fine arts" to the last head of exemption, that it did intend to exclude from its operation all institutions which could not broadly be described as being for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts—that is to say, education generally, literature generally, and science generally. I do not stop here to discuss the question of whether the exemption would be lost by some additional object or purpose, since I agree with almost all who have considered this question that the statute would be satisfied if the main purpose and object of the institution were that which the statute considers the subject of exemption. Now, though I do not mean to say that all the cases under the earlier statute can be absolutely reconciled, yet I think a principle can be deduced from them which is very relevant to the matter in hand. R. 169, 3 E. & B. 416, were held not to be within the exemption; and, with reference to the fine arts, though music was assumed to be one of the fine arts, a musical institution, Reg. v. Brandt, 16 Q. B. 462, was held not to be within the exemption, whereas the Linnean Society, St. Anne. Westminster v. Linnean Society, 2 W. R. 516, 3 E. & B. 793, and the Birmingham Library, Churchwardens of Birmingham v. Shaw, 10 Q. B. 868, were held to be within it. When one examines the various grounds on which these decisions rested, it would appear that wherever the amusement of the members—as in the Musical Society; amusement though combined with the instruction derived from the study of natural history, as in the Zoological Society; the supply and opportunities of reading newspapers, as in the Russell Institution—was one of the purposes and objects of the institution, then the judges were of opinion that the exemption would not apply. But where, as in the Linnean Society, the object was purely the promotion of the particular branch of knowledge to which that institution applied itself, or in the case of the Birmingham Library, where the judgment of the court assumed that literature generally was the object of the society, then the exemption did apply. These cases were decided under the Act of 1843, which enacts: "Whereas it is expedient that societies established exclusively for purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts should be exempt from the charge of county, borough, parochial, and other local rates in respect of land and buildings occupied by them for the transaction of their business and for carrying into effect their purposes. Be it, therefore, enacted, &c., that from and after the 1st day of October, 1843, no person or persons shall be assessed or rated, or liable to be assessed or rated, or liable to pay to any county, borough, parochial, or other local rates or cesses in respect of any land, houses, or buildings, or parts of houses or buildings, belonging to any society instituted for purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts exclusively, either as tenant or as owner, and occupied by it for the transaction of its business, and for carrying into effect its purposes. Provided that such society shall be supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions, and shall not, and by its laws may not, make any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto or between any of its members, and provided also that such society shall obtain the certificate of the barrister-at-law or Lord Advocate as hereinafter mentioned." It is said, however, that the cases under the Act of 1843 ought not to guide us, because of the difference in the two Acts. Now, though the Acts are differently framed, the words which your lordships have to construe are practically identical. Property legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of "literature, science, and the fine arts" in the one Act corresponds very nearly with a society "instituted for purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts" in the other.

Two differences are suggested—one, that the Act of 1843 was a relief of existing liability to local rates. I agree that such a distinction exists, but I am wholly unable to apply such a distinction as relevant to the matter in hand. All exemptions from taxation to some extent increase the burden on other members of the community, and I confess I cannot imagine the Legislature meant one thing in 1843 by science, and a different thing in 1885, when it was determined to make corporations which never die pay something in lieu of succession duty. Neither does the use of the word "exclusively" appear to me to touch the particular point. Parke, B., in the earlier Act, pointed out that the word "exclusively" was not necessary: Purvis v. Traill, 3 Ex. 344. Can it be said that property, or the income or profit whereof is legally "appropriated" and "applied" must not be exclusively appropriated and applied in order to bring such property within the exemption? The omission of the word "exclusively" means nothing, since its existence or non-existence could add nothing to the true construction of the words that are there. I cannot concur with the argument which has found favour with one of your lordships—that the condition under which the society obtained exemption under the Act of 1843 was that in some degree it partook of the character of a charitable institution. I think it would be a surprise to the members of—e.g., the Linnean Society—to hear their society so described. It is no reflection on the council of the institution in question that they are desirous to promote the success of their members in the profession to which they belong, and that they wish to promote their success in the best way, by supplying them with the best possible professional education. I am wholly unable to see that there is any difference between the two Acts, both of them involving exemption from public burdens, whether local or Imperial, and both of them using language which, as I have said, is practically identical; and, through the framing of the Acts being necessarily different, from the fact that one refers to a corporation and the other to societies, the other differences, which I do not think relevant to the subject now under discussion, are quite accounted for without supposing that the word "science" is to receive a different interpretation in the two different Acts. Assuming, therefore, that the principles which I have suggested are to decide the matter, it becomes a question of fact whether, in this particular case, the institution is for the promotion of science in the sense in which I understand that word. In the historical notice which is part of the case, I find it is stated that "early in the present century it was desired to found an institution having for its object the furtherance of professional knowledge," and that the institution was, in fact, founded by gentlemen who were "impressed with the difficulties of gaining the knowledge necessary for the diversified practice of engineering, for promoting regular intercourse between persons engaged in the profession to the end that such persons might mutually benefit by the interchange of individual observation and experience." I have quoted these words not in the nature of an admission by the society (for which purpose a mere historical sketch would be very unfairly used), but because I think they aptly describe, in fact, both the purpose for which the institution was founded and the practice under it. The institution itself is for the benefit of persons who are civil engineers, to facilitate their work and to instruct them better in their own profession, to enable them the better to perform and practise the art by which they are to make their livelihood. They are to be instructed (the mode of instruction appears to me to be immaterial, whether by lectures, papers read, or the like) in various arts and in various applications of arts, as to which, except in the widest general sense—which I have already said I do not assume the statute intended—it could not be contended that such instruction was for the promotion of science. The statement is that "the persons for whose benefit the society has been formed are defined by its chartered title—the Institution of Civil Engineers." As the exact meaning of the words "civil engineers" is very important, and has given rise to much discussion, the council considers it desirable to state the sense attached to them by the institution.

The charter defines "the profession of a civil engineer" as "the art of directing the great sources of power in nature for the use and convenience of man," and some examples of this definition are given. But it was pointed out by Thomas Tredgold, who drew up the "description of a civil engineer," partly embodied in the charter, that "the scope and utility of civil engineering will be increased with every discovery in philosophy, and its resources with every invention in mechanical or chemical science." Consequently, since the charter was drawn the range of practice of the profession has become much enlarged. Thus the practitioners in this art may now have to do with many classes of works, for example: (1) Works for facilitating and improving internal communications, as roads, railways, tramways, navigation by canals and rivers, bridges, and telegraphs of various kinds; (2) works connected with the sea-coast, and for facilitating communication between the sea and the land, such as harbours, docks, piers, breakwaters, sea-walls, lighthouses, &c.; (3) works for facilitating communication across the seas, including naval architecture, iron shipbuilding, and the construction and laying of submarine telegraph cables; (4) works for reclamation, irrigation, or drainage of land, and for the prevention or the regulation of floods, including the improvement of rivers as arterial drains; (5) works for cities and towns, such as sewerage, water supply, light, and street improvements; (6) large and massive buildings generally, in their scientific and mechanical arrangements; (7) the operations of mining and of metallurgy, so far as they involve the application of mechanical science; (8) the design and construction of the mechanical prime-movers, such as steam-engines, water-wheels, and other hydraulic motors, windmills, electric and other engines; (9) the design, construction, and adaptation to practical use of machinery and mechanical appliances of all kinds; (10) the design and manufacture generally of all large and important metallic structures, including artillery and other large munitions of war." This is a comprehensive but by no means complete catalogue, and if an estimate is attempted to be formed of the work done under it during the century, and of the effect this work has had on the development of trade and commerce, on finance, on government, on every branch of industry, and, indeed, on every possible aspect of human interest, it must be admitted that the profession of civil engineering has become truly a great power. And, in exact accordance with the design which the founders of the institution had in view, I find premiums have been awarded for such papers as "Modern Machine Tools and Workshop Appliances for the Treatment of Heavy Forgings and Castings," "The Hydraulic Passenger Lifts at the Underground Stations of the Mersey Railway," and "Brickmaking." The council of the institution is intrusted, under various trusts, to award prizes or medals to persons who write papers on the subjects with which the institution is conversant, and although this has only an indirect bearing on what the institution is, it is, I think, not without its importance as showing the class of subjects which persons who were interested in promoting the interests of civil engineers imagined would be appropriately dealt with by the institution in question. I find in the subjects for papers what I should have expected to find for an institution of such a character as I have described: "The Construction and Testing of Air Locks and Shaft Tubes for Sinking Foundation"; "Concrete Work under Water"; "The Manufacture, Properties, and use of Castings of Malleable Cast Iron and Cast Steel"; "Modern Appliances for the Consumption of Liquid Fuel for Steam Boilers and other Industrial Uses"; "The Production of Heating Gas from Coal"; "Compressed Oil Gas and its Application"; "The Driving Axles of Locomotive Engines." These and many others seem to me to indicate that the real object and purpose of this institution (which certainly needs no eulogy from me or from anyone else in respect of its usefulness) is to promote the education of civil engineers as civil engineers, to enable them to succeed in their profession, to enable them to take charge of and direct works of the most complicated, difficult, and extraordinary value; such triumphs, for instance, of modern engineering as the Forth Bridge, and the like. But all this, to my mind, tends to show that it is a professional society founded for the advantage and in the interest of the profession of civil engineers, supplying most valuable and important means for the training and instruction of that profession, but for the interest and advantage of the members of the institution, as members of the institution, and therefore not within the exemption. To use the language of Lord Campbell, in one of the cases to which I have referred, "I think a member of it makes a very good bargain for himself in becoming a member of it," and I do not think that, unless the benefit was intended to be conferred directly, and not indirectly, on the whole community in the promotion of knowledge, that the Legislature intended to exempt from taxation an institution such as this, which, in my view, is primarily intended in the interest of, and for the advantage of, its own members. I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division be restored.

Lord WATSON.—The 11th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, imposes a compensatory duty, at the rate of 5 per cent., upon the yearly value, income, or profits accruing from real and personal estate, permanently invested in bodies corporate and unincorporate, which escapes liability to probate, legacy, or succession duties. The taxing enactments of the clause are expressed in broad and comprehensive terms, but these are qualified by seven sub-sections, which exempt from the incidence of the new tax the various classes of property therein specified, in respect either of the time and manner of its acquisition, or of the purposes to which it is appropriated and applied. The appellants assert their right to charge the respondent, as the officer whom the statute makes accountable for the Institution of Civil Engineers, with duty upon the annual income of the institution during the year ending April 5, 1886. It is not disputed that the property sought to be charged is within the general taxing words of the Act; but the respondent pleads that it is also within the exemptions provided by the 11th clause. His plea was rejected by a divisional court, consisting of Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Field, J.; but it was sustained in the Court of Appeal by Lord Esher, M.R., and Fry, L.J.; Lopes, L.J., dissenting from the judgment. The exemption relied on by the respondent is to be found in sub-section 3, which specially excepts from the operation of the clause "property which, or the profits or income whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts." In order to obtain the benefit of the exemption it must be shown, in the first place, that the property for which it is claimed is, in point of fact, applied to one or other of the purposes thus specified; and, in the second place, that it is legally appropriated to such purpose within the meaning of the statute.

The respondent maintains that the property and funds of the institution which he represents are devoted and applied to the promotion of science; the appellants contend that they are not. That is the whole matter of controversy in this appeal. The Institution of Civil Engineers was incorporated by Royal charter in June, 1828. The "objects and views" of the body politic and corporate, for the advancement of which it was expressly created, are stated to be "for the general advancement of mechanical science, and, more particularly, for promoting the acquisition of that species of knowledge which constitutes the profession of a civil engineer, being the art of directing the great sources of power in nature for the use and convenience of man, as the means of production and of traffic in states both for external and internal trade, as applied in the construction of roads, bridges, aqueducts, canals, river navigation, and docks, for internal intercourse and exchange, and in the construction of ports, harbours, moles, breakwaters, and lighthouses, and in the art of navigation by artificial power for the purposes of commerce, and in the construction and adaptation of machinery, and in the drainage of cities and towns." The charter prescribes rules for the government of the corporation, by which general meetings are authorized to make bye-laws for the admission of members and the management of its property, and also to enter into any resolution that shall be thought necessary and proper with respect to the affairs and concerns of the body corporate, subject to the condition that bye-laws or resolutions made contrary to the general scope and true intent of the charter shall be absolutely null and void. Since the date of its incorporation alterations have been made from time to time in the bye-laws of the institution, but there has been no material change either in the qualifications for membership or in its objects and the means of their attainment. According to the bye-laws now in force the persons entitled to the privileges of corporation consist of three classes: (1) Members, being civil engineers of eminence in their profession, who have been in practice on their own account for five years at least; (2) associates, who must be above twenty-five years of age, regularly educated as civil engineers, and actually engaged in the design or construction of one or more of the class of works enumerated in the charter; and (3) honorary members, being either distinguished individuals, who, from their position, can assist in the promotion of public works, or persons eminent for science and experience in pursuits connected with the profession of a civil engineer, but who are not engaged in the practice of that profession within the United Kingdom or its dependencies. The same degree of professional eminence is not required in the case of associates as in the case of members; but the former may be transferred to the higher grade when they become duly qualified. Students of civil engineering, who are not members, and have no voice in the management of the society, are admitted to certain privileges; but they can only enjoy that position between the ages of eighteen and twenty-six, and they must be the present or past pupils of a member, and be engaged in designing or executing engineering works. Admission to corporate privileges is by ballot; and any corporator may be expelled by the majority of a special meeting, convened on the requisition of twenty members, with the approval of the council of management. Students are admitted by the council, on the recommendation of the member whose pupils they are or have been, and the continuance of their privileges is dependent upon the pleasure of the council. During the session of the society, which commences in November and ends in the month of May following, weekly meetings are held, at which papers on engineering subjects, selected by the council, are read and discussed. These discussions are taken down in shorthand, and, with the papers read, are inserted at full length in the minutes of the society's proceedings, which are annually printed and a copy sent to every corporate member and student. The minutes are not sold; but copies of them are sent to 185 similar institutions and public libraries in different parts of the world, in order that persons interested in engineering science may have access to them. Meetings are also held by the students, at which papers prepared by themselves are read and discussed; and such of these papers as possess exceptional merit are published in the minutes of the institution. The library, which contains a large collection of native and foreign works on engineering, besides standard books of science, is open to corporate members for consultation and reference; and students have the privilege of using it, subject to regulations prescribed by the council. The appellants relied in the course of the argument upon Reg. v. The Institution of Civil Engineers, 28 W. R. 253, 5 Q. B. D. 48, in which it was held by a divisional court, consisting of Field and Manisty, JJ., that the institution was not exempted from payment of local rates in respect of the premises which it occupied by virtue of section 1 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 36. That Act exempts from the incidence of county, borough, parochial, and other local rates, premises occupied for the transaction of its business by a society "instituted for the purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts exclusively," it being expressly conditioned that "such society shall be supported wholly or in part by voluntary contributions, and shall not, and by its laws may not, make any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto and between any of its members." These provisions appear to me to differ so much both in their subject-matter and scope from the exempting enactments with which we have to deal in this case, that little or no assistance can be derived from them, or from the decisions which followed upon them, in construing the Act of 1885. There are many societies excluded from the benefit of the exemptions established by the earlier, which are plainly entitled to the immunity provided by the later statute. In order to bring a society within section 1 of the Act of 1843, two statutory requisites must concur. The society must be one instituted exclusively for purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts; and it must also be supported, in whole or in part, by annual voluntary contributions. I do not think the Legislature intended that fixed yearly payments which individuals agree to make, in consideration of their being admitted to a society, and allowed to share in its management (there being a legal obligation to make such payments as long as their membership continues), should be regarded as voluntary contributions within the meaning of the Act. But the contrary was decided after some hesitation, and to that circumstance the difficulties subsequently encountered in construing the exemption appear to me to have been mainly due. Then it is not sufficient compliance with the plain language of the Act that a society be established chiefly for the purpose of promoting science, literature, or the fine arts. One or other of these must be its exclusive object; so that an institution which also contemplated some other, though altogether subsidiary object, could not claim the benefit of the exemption. The provisions of subsection 3 present, in several important particulars, a striking contrast to these enactments. They dispense with the necessity for any of the enumerated purposes being exclusive, it being sufficient that the property of the institution is in the main devoted to one or other of them: and the exemption is made to depend upon the appropriation and application of such property, or its income, without reference to the sources from which it is acquired. I think the general construction of the sub-section was correctly expressed by the Lord President (Inglis) in the Scotch case of Society of Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 14 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 34, the only decision, before the present case, on this branch of the Act of 1885. His lordship, after pointing out that societies whose funds are expended mainly upon other objects, and only promote indirectly the purposes enumerated, are not within the protection of the clause, goes on to say: "But I apprehend that the meaning of this clause of exemption is that the property or income shall be, if not exclusively, yet certainly in the main, and as its chief object, devoted to the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts." The principle thus enunciated was referred to, and appears to have been unanimously accepted, both in the Divisional Court and in the Court of Appeal, although the learned judges differed in its application to the facts of this case. The contrast between the provisions of the two statutes becomes more apparent when the other sub-sections of the Act of 1885 are taken into account. In the present case, Field, J., said, in the Divisional Court, with reference to sub-section 3: "It seems to me that the exemption is intended to some extent to be correlative with the public benefit derived from the corporate body; that is to say, that the statute did not contemplate the exemption of bodies conferring mere individual local benefit." That observation might be very appropriate, and similar language has been used by learned judges in dealing with the Act of 1843; but I do not think it is applicable to the exemptions in sub-section 3, which depend upon the intrinsic character of the object which a society promotes, and not upon the scope of the benefits which may result from its transactions. Sub-section 2 expressly exempts property or its income, which shall be legally appropriated and applied "for the benefit of the public at large, or of any county, shire, borough, or place, or the inhabitants or ratepayers thereof." If societies instituted for the promotion of science must show that they are conferring a benefit upon the public at large in order to obtain exemption, the provisions of sub-section 3 add nothing to the provision already made in sub-section 2. But the enactments of the latter appear to me to compel a liberal reading of the sub-section which follows it, and to indicate the intention of the Legislature to exempt every society whose corporate endeavours are mainly directed, whether successfully or not, to the extension of the bounds of science, and are not, as in the case of the Society of Writers to the Signet, confined to the individual action of the corporators, each within the limits of his own professional business, and for his own private interest. The judgment of the court in Society of Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue was given against the body pleading statutory exemption; and in the circumstances of the case there cannot, in my apprehension, be any doubt as to its soundness. The position of the society, so far as concerns its constitutional objects, is strictly analogous to that occupied in England by the Inns of Court, and in Scotland by the Faculty of Advocates. It is simply one of the several portals through one or other of which an individual must pass before he can practise as an agent before the Court of Session. Persons who prefer to enter their profession by that portal join the society; but their chief, if not their only object in doing so, is to acquire the status and privileges of a duly qualified legal practitioner. Their qualifications are tested by examination before their admission; but when once they have become members they do nothing whatever towards advancing the science of law, unless it be by actively pursuing their profession in their individual capacity. The Institution of Civil Engineers stands, in my opinion, in a very different position from such professional bodies as the Society of Writers to the Signet. The mere fact that membership is confined to those who are actively engaged, and have attained some degree of eminence in the profession, does not militate against the object of the institution being the advancement of engineering science; because they are really the only persons possessing the knowledge and practical experience requisite for the efficient promotion of that object. Membership is not required for admission to the profession of a civil engineer; it confers no rights or privileges in the practice of that profession, over which the institution neither has, nor professes to have, any power of control. A writer to the Signet, in carrying on his private business, and in no other form, exercises his rights and privileges as a member of the society to which he belongs; but a member of the Society of Civil Engineers does nothing whatever in his corporate capacity except when he takes part in its proceedings within the walls of the institution. Lord Coleridge suggests that "any man who wants most effectively and successfully to practise the profession of a civil engineer will join the institution and go through the course of teaching which it provides." Now I have been unable to discover that the institution provides anything which can be appropriately denominated a course of teaching. Its members must be men who have both learnt, and effectively practised, their profession before they joined. I do not doubt that membership is accompanied with a certain amount of prestige, which may prove to be of some service to the member in his professional career; but I believe that the same result would attend membership of any society which effectively promoted a branch of science intimately connected with the profession or business in which the member was engaged. That there is a science of civil engineering, and that its development is of the utmost consequence to our national interests, are, to my mind, propositions not admitting of dispute. I would not for a moment suggest that a society which devotes its funds to giving concerts for the entertainment of members and their friends promotes the science of music; or that the cause of literature is advanced by the establishment of a reading-room for subscribing members. The main, if not the sole, object of such societies is to amuse or instruct the individual members. But I can discover no real analogy between societies of that kind and the Institution of Civil Engineers. The discussion of mechanical and engineering problems by the members of the institution cannot fail to elicit information and speculation of value to the profession at large, and of advantage to all interested in the various departments of science, for whose use everything read or spoken by members is recorded in the printed minutes, and constitutes a substantial addition to the sum of human knowledge. It occurs to me that, if anyone were asked to say what would be a more efficient method of promoting engineering science than that which the institution has adopted, he would have difficulty in making a satisfactory reply. I have accordingly come to the conclusion that the income of the institution is, in fact, applied not for the professional ends of individuals, but for "the promotion of science" in the proper sense of the words; and in that view I entertain no doubt that such income is "legally appropriated" within the meaning of the Act, because the purposes to which it is applied are the same with those prescribed by the charter of incorporation. I have not thought it necessary to dwell upon the first of these points, because I entirely concur in the judgments delivered by Lord Esher and Fry, L.J., in the Court of Appeal. The order appealed from ought, in my opinion, to be affirmed with costs, and I move accordingly.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I do not think that the reported decisions on the construction and effect of the Act of 1843 throw any light upon the question now before your lordships. The Act of 1843 was in relief of existing liability to local rates. Exemption from local rates involves an additional burden on a limited area. It means a tax on immediate neighbours, some of whom may be little better than actual paupers. A privilege so invidious was naturally confined within narrow limits. It was confined to societies established exclusively for the purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts. The word "exclusively," as Lord Campbell observes in Reg. v. Cockburn, 16 Q. B. 480, is "anxiously introduced, both into the preamble and the enactment." That is the first condition of exemption under the Act of 1843. The next is that the society must be "supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions." This provision has given rise to much difference of judicial opinion. But, if I am not mistaken, the result of the later authorities favours the view suggested by Lord Campbell in the following passage: "The Legislature may have intended to throw an additional burden on the other ratepayers of the parish by exempting from rateability property before rateable only when it is occupied for the purposes of a society supported in part by charitable donations, and not by payments made with a view to the personal accommodation and advantage of the members, although the object of their pursuit may be the cultivation of science, literature, or the fine arts": Russell Institution v. Vestry of St. Giles. So that, to bring itself within the exemption, a society must have no purpose beside those specified in the Act, and must also, in some degree, partake of the character of a charitable institution. On these two conditions all the cases decided under the Act of 1843 seem to have turned. Neither the one nor the other is required as a condition of exemption by the Act of 1885. The duty granted by that Act was imposed on property belonging to bodies, corporate or unincorporate, in order to compensate the revenue for their immunity from death duties. It was a new tax levied for Imperial purposes. As might be expected, the range of exemption is much more extensive. The conditions are far more liberal. The two Acts differ widely in their scope, and even when they happen to deal with the same subject the wording is not the same. It was argued, indeed, that the language was practically identical, but the expression, to my mind, involves an assumption that the meaning is the same, and an admission that the language is different. I do not, therefore, propose to trouble your lordships with any further reference to the numerous decisions which were cited in the course of the argument, beyond observing, with regard to the case of Reg. v. The Institution of Civil Engineers, that while I entirely agree in the conclusion, I have some difficulty in accepting the propositions and following the reasoning on which the conclusion is based. In the present case the Crown seeks to charge the property of the Institution of Civil Engineers by virtue of section 11 of the Act of 1885. The institution claims exemption under sub-section 3, on the ground that its property and income are legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science. The first question is, What is the meaning of the word "science" in that sub-section? I see no reason why it should be confined to pure or speculative science. The expression plainly includes applied science, and it was intended, I think, to denote a particular branch of science, as well as universal science or science generally. If it be at all material, the word "science" in the Act of 1843 appears to have been construed in the same way. I cannot, therefore, doubt that mechanical science as employed in civil engineering is science within the meaning of the exemption contained in section 11 of the Act of 1885. That being so, the question at issue may be stated shortly. Is the property of the Institution of Civil Engineers legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of the science of civil engineering; or is it legally appropriated and applied for the benefit of civil engineers, in order to enable them to practise their profession to greater advantage? It cannot, I think, be doubted that the institution has raised the standard of the profession, and that to a civil engineer it is of advantage, and probably of pecuniary advantage, to be a member. But is that result the purpose of the society, or is it an incidental, though an important and perhaps a necessary, consequence of the way in which the institution does its work in the pursuit of science? The charter and bye-laws define the purpose of the institution as being "for the general advancement of mechanical science, and more particularly for promoting the acquisition of that species of knowledge which constitutes the profession of a civil engineer." I cannot see any reason to doubt that the eminent men who founded the institution and obtained its charter from the Crown were perfectly sincere in describing the objects which they set before them. They professed to be zealous in the interests of science; why should it be assumed or suspected that their real purpose was the advantage of their own craft? It may be that the advancement of the interests of the profession of civil engineering is inseparably bound up with the advancement of mechanical science. Probably the founders of the society were not insensible of the advantages which such an institution was likely to confer upon its members in their professional capacity. That would have been a formidable objection if the language of the Act of 1885 had been the same as that of the Act of 1843. But under the Act of 1885, in the case of a scientific institution, the only question is whether the property sought to be charged is legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science. If it is, it seems to me that the exemption must hold good, although the institution to which the property belongs may serve another purpose as well. Now, I think it is clear that, according to the true construction of the charter, the property of the institution is dedicated to the promotion of science. Is it, in fact, so applied? It seems to me that the society has loyally adhered to the declared objects of its charter. There was, I think, much force in the observation which was made by one of the learned counsel for the respondents—that, in the present state of knowledge, advance in mechanical science is only to be expected from conferences of specialists—from the interchange in friendly rivalry of the ideas of the most highly trained, the most ingenious, and the most experienced members of the profession. That is the method by which this society pursues its professed object. The council every year invite original communications on various specified subjects, and on other questions of professional interest. For communications of adequate merit premiums are awarded, which, for the most part, are open to any person of any country, whether he be a member of the institution or not. During the session, which extends over six months in each year, there are weekly meetings of the society, at which every member is at liberty to introduce a stranger. At these meetings papers selected from communications received in response to the invitation of the council are read and discussed, the discussions often lasting over several evenings. In order to facilitate discussion proof copies of the papers intended to be read are supplied to any persons, whether members or not, who are supposed to be specially conversant with the particular subject. A shorthand note of the discussion is taken, and, after due correction, printed in the "minutes of proceedings" for the year, together with the papers read at the weekly meetings, and communications from persons interested in the subjects discussed who may have been unavoidably absent during the discussion. The minutes also contain other selected papers and a summary of information gathered from the transactions of foreign engineering societies and from foreign scientific periodicals on all branches of professional knowledge, so as to form a record from year to year of the progress of engineering science. There are, besides, occasional lectures delivered by men of eminence on "the principles involved in the action of the great sources of power in nature and their practical application," which are afterwards published in separate volumes. "The minutes of proceedings" are not on sale to the public, but they are not a sealed book. Copies are sent to every member, and copies are also presented to other institutions and public libraries at home and abroad, so that the information contained in them is practically accessible to any person who may wish to avail himself of it. The principal part of the expenditure of the society is incurred in the production of the "minutes of proceedings," and in connection with the lectures, and in the maintenance of the library of the institution, which contains a large and valuable collection of scientific works. The rest of the expenditure goes in establishment charges and other matters of that sort. Substantially, as it seems to me, the whole of the society's income is applied to the promotion of science. I cannot conceive in what better way the promotion of mechanical science, and in particular of those branches of mechanical science which lie within the province of civil engineering, could be effected. I cannot doubt that by means of the discussions on the papers read at the ordinary meetings of the society much new light has been thrown on scientific questions, and much knowledge, which would otherwise have perished, has been preserved. I see no trace of a selfish or illiberal spirit in the proceedings of the society, nor do I find anything to lead me to suppose that its property and income are applied otherwise than bonâ fide for the promotion of science. The action of the society may incidentally benefit the profession to which its members belong—I have no doubt that is so—but I agree with the Master of the Rolls in thinking that "that which this society does is something higher and larger than the mere education of students and others for the profession of civil engineers." I think the appeal should be dismissed.

BARNETT v. KING. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Covenant to pay out of estate six months after death—Claim barred by bankruptcy proceedings—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 37, sub-section 3.

By a deed made between R. D. K. of the one part and E. B. of the other part, R. D. K. covenanted that his executors and administrators would pay E. B. the sum of £3,000, with interest at five per cent. from the date of the death of R. D. K., within six months from his death. R. D. K. subsequently filed his petition in bankruptcy, and an order was made thereunder. E. B. knew of these proceedings, but abstained from proving in respect of this liability. R. D. K. died, and E. B. commenced this action against the executors under the covenant in the deed.

Held, that this was a debt which fell within section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and any proceedings under the deed were barred by the proceedings in bankruptcy.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

By a deed dated the 6th of June, 1885, and made between Sir Richard Duckworth King of the one part and Mr. Edward Barnett (the plaintiff) of the other part, Sir R. D. King covenanted with the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that the executors and administrators of him (Sir R. D. King) should within six calendar months from his death pay to the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the sum of £3,000, and interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per annum from the date of the death of Sir R. D. King.

In February, 1886, Sir R. D. King filed his petition in bankruptcy, and a receiving order was made thereunder on the 26th of February.

On the 2nd of November, 1887, Sir R. D. King died, having by his will appointed the defendants, Sir George St. Vincent King and Mr. Charles Edward Barnett, executors thereof, and in June, 1888, the plaintiff commenced this action against the defendants under the covenant in the deed of the 6th of June, 1885, claiming the sum of £3,000 and interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per annum from the 2nd of November, 1887.

The defendants raised (among others) the defence that any right of action which the plaintiff might have had under the deed was barred by the bankruptcy proceedings taken by Sir R. D. King, of which the plaintiff was fully aware, the debt falling within sub-section 3 of section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which enacts that, save as previously mentioned in the section, "all debts and liabilities, present or future, certain or contingent, to which the debtor is subject at the date of the receiving order, or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the receiving order, shall be deemed to be debts provable in bankruptcy."

Stirling, J., held that the debt arising upon this covenant fell within section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and any proceedings upon it were barred by the bankruptcy proceedings.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cautley (Herbert Reed with him), for the appellant.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and John Henderson, for the respondents, were not called upon.

(a.) Reported by H. M. CHARTERS MACPHERSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—We are all of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The question resolves itself into whether or not an obligation to pay money out of the estate of the deceased six months after his death is a liability or obligation within the meaning of section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1882. It was contended by the appellant that the section means that only such liabilities are capable of proof (and, therefore, affected by the proceedings in bankruptcy) as relate to the debtor personally; and that this liability, which could only arise after his death, is not within the meaning of this section. I think that is far too narrow a construction of the language of the Act. In my opinion the true meaning is that the section applies not only to an obligation to pay money by the obligor himself. but also to an obligation to pay out of his estate. I think the observation made by Fry, L.J., during the argument an exceedingly strong one. that the effect of the appellant's contention would be this, that, supposing the holder of this deed had taken the proper steps to do so, he could not have proved in respect of this liability in the bankruptcy proceedings. This is an unreasonable conclusion to arrive at; and in my opinion the decision of Stirling, J., is correct, and any proceedings under this deed are barred by the proceedings in bankruptcy.

BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Practice—Writ—Defendant out of jurisdiction—Substituted service—Ord. 9, r. 2.

The plaintiff, having issued a writ against the defendant and being unable to discover her address, obtained an order for substituted service upon her solicitor. It then appeared that she had gone abroad before the writ was issued without any intention of evading service, and had remained out of the jurisdiction ever since.

Held, that the writ being a writ for service within the jurisdiction, the order for substituted service could not be maintained.

Fry v. Moore, 37 W. R. 565, 23 Q. B. D. 395, followed.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Pollock, B., and Grantham, J.) setting aside an order for substituted service of the writ in the action.

In July, 1890, the plaintiff issued a writ against the defendant, and endeavoured to effect service of it upon her. He applied to the defendant's solicitor for her address, which the solicitor declined to give, and the plaintiff then obtained an order at chambers for substituted service of the writ upon the solicitor. It then appeared that the defendant was out of the jurisdiction, and had gone abroad some days before the issue of the writ, but without any intention of evading service. She had been out of the jurisdiction ever since.

The Divisional Court set aside the order, and the plaintiff appealed.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the appellant.

Morton Daniel, for the respondent.

The following cases were cited: Watt v. Barnett, 26 W. R. 745, 3 Q. B. D. 363; Hope v. Hope, 2 W. R. 698, 4 De G. M. & G. 328; Fry v. Moore, 37 W. R. 565, 23 Q. B. D. 395; In re Urquhart, 38 W. R. 612, 24 Q. B. D. 723; Slade v. Slade, 30 W. R. 28.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff, believing that he had a cause of action against the defendant, issued a writ in general terms for service in England. He attempted to serve the writ upon her in England, but failed. Then the plaintiff went to a person who had acted as the lady's solicitor, and asked him where she was; he declined to give her address. There was no duty on him to disclose his client's address, even if he knew it. The plaintiff then obtained an order for what is called substituted service of the writ—that is to say, for service of the writ on the solicitor. It then was discovered that the plaintiff had been acting in error. The lady, whom he supposed to have been in England at the time the writ was issued, was then abroad and out of the jurisdiction. The question, therefore, is whether it was right to order substituted service of this particular writ. The writ is an ordinary writ for service in England. By the law and comity of nations such a writ cannot be served abroad. It was rightly decided in Fry v. Moore that if such a writ cannot be served directly, it cannot be served indirectly by means of an order for substituted service. While the defendant is abroad, and out of the jurisdiction, this writ cannot be served upon her. Therefore there cannot be substituted service of this writ, and the order for it must be set aside. No doubt Parliament has given leave, under certain circumstances, for the court to issue writs out of the jurisdiction. Where those conditions are fulfilled, the court will, in certain cases, issue writs which can be served abroad. If this had been such a writ as that, then, possibly, under certain circumstances, the court might order substituted service of that writ. But this writ, as I have said, could under no circumstances have been served abroad, and therefore the order for substituted service was wrong. If the defendant had left the jurisdiction in order to evade service of the writ I think the case would be different, but there is no evidence at all of her having done so. The appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I agree. I think the case is governed by the decision in Fry v. Moore.

LOPES, L.J.—If it were proved that this lady left the jurisdiction in order to evade service of the writ I think that the order for substituted service might be maintained. There being, however, no evidence of this, I think the case falls within the decision of Fry v. Moore

Appeal from the judgment of the judge of the Romford County Court upon an interpleader issue to determine the right to certain goods which had been seized in execution by the plaintiff, and claimed by the grantee under a bill of sale.

There were three grantors, one of them being the execution debtor, and two attestation clauses in the bill of sale. The first attestation clause stated that the bill of sale was executed by one of the grantors "in the presence of me (the alterations initialled by me having been first made), Geo. Bailey, solicitor, Romford." The second attestation clause, which came immediately below the first, and which stated that the bill of sale was executed by the two other grantors, was in precisely the same form as the first, except that after the signature "Geo. Bailey" no address or description was added. It was apparent upon the face of the bill of sale that the document was originally drawn with only one grantor and one attestation clause; that the names of the two other grantors were subsequently inserted, together with the alterations and additions consequent thereon, as well as the words in the first attestation clause, "the alterations initialled by me having been first made"; and that the second attestation clause was also added. Each of the alterations was initialled once "G. B." The signature "Geo. Bailey" in each attestation clause was in the same handwriting, and the alterations and additions were apparently so too. The county court judge held that the bill of sale was valid. The execution creditor appealed.

July 17.—Lynden Bell, for the execution creditor.

POLLOCK, B.—My decision in this case is founded upon this: there have been two, or rather three cases, on the same point—namely, Blankenstein v. Robertson, 24 Q. B. D. 543, 38 W. R. Dig. 23; Parsons v. Brand. and Coulson v. Dickson, 38 W. R. 388, 25 Q. B. D. 110. The result of these cases is this, that the form given in the schedule must be taken to include the attestation clause, and that the execution of the bill of sale and the mode of execution are a part of that form. In those cases it was argued that the court might refer to the affidavit to supply the omission, but the court said not, and they said that the statute must be complied with. In the present case, no doubt, it is not contended that the affidavit can be referred to, but it is said that the court ought to assume that the attesting witness in the second clause is the same as the person who attests the first clause. It seems to me that that could not be done without sinning against the spirit of the cases cited. There might be two men of the same name, as, for instance, there might be father and son of the same name. I am of opinion that the present case comes within the authority of those cases.

DAY, J.—If this case had been unfettered by authority I should have been of opinion that this attestation clause was abundantly sufficient. Because the address and description have not been added in the second attestation clause, I am constrained by the cases cited to hold that this bill of sale is void. The second clause is merely signed by Geo. Bailey. I entirely concur that if a jury were asked if the Geo. Bailey who signed the second clause was the same Geo. Bailey who signed the first they would have no hesitation in saying that they were the same. But I am bound to hold that the words "the address and description" are part of the statutory form, that they are not in the present attestation clause, and, therefore, that this bill of sale is void.

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal.

The claimant appealed.

Oct. 28.—C. E. Jones, for the claimant.—The address and description of the attesting witness appear upon the bill of sale as required by the form in the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. It is clear from the mode in which the bill of sale is drawn, and from the handwriting, that the attesting witness was the same in each attestation clause. The words in each attestation clause, "The alterations initialled by me having been first made," together with the fact that the alterations are only initialled once, clearly show this. It is not necessary to repeat the address and description in each attestation clause; it is sufficient if, on the face of the bill, it is apparent that the attesting witness is the same in each case. In Blankenstein v. Robertson, 24 Q. B. D. 543, 38 W. R. Dig. 23, and Parsons v. Brand, Coulson v. Dickson, 38 W. R. 388, 25 Q. B. D. 110, the address and description were not in the bill of sale, and it was held that the omission could not be supplied from the affidavit or by evidence. These cases, therefore, are distinguishable.

Lynden Bell, for the execution creditor.— The address and description of the attesting witness must be inserted in each attestation clause. Each attestation clause ought to be complete in itself, otherwise the bill of sale is not in accordance with the form. Secondly, the information required by the form has not been given. There is nothing on the face of the bill of sale to show that the attesting witness is the same person in each case. The information required to be given—viz., the address and description of the witness in the second attestation clause—cannot be deduced from the bill of sale itself. The similarity of the handwriting in the original bill of sale cannot avail, because intending lenders who search the register would only see a copy of the bill of sale, and not the original. The form has, therefore, not been followed, and the bill of sale is void.

C. E. Jones replied.

Lord ESHER, M R.—It has been contended that this bill of sale is not in accordance with the form because the address and description of the attesting witness have not been given in the second attestation clause. Now it has been decided by this court that the address and description of the attesting witness must be given on the face of the bill of sale. It would not be sufficient to show from the affidavit or by extraneous evidence what the address and description were; nor would it be sufficient, in the case of a bill of sale where there are two attestation clauses, to show from the affidavit or by evidence that the witness was the same in each case. Still, however, if it is clear upon the face of the bill of sale, and without the help of any extraneous evidence, that the attesting witness was the same person in each case, then the address and description are given on the face of the bill of sale in accordance with the form, and the bill of sale is valid. The court must be satisfied upon that point from the bill of sale itself without any doubt whatever; in other words, the inference from the bill of sale itself must be an irresistible inference that the witness is the same in each case. If, on looking at the bill of sale, the court has no doubt from the handwriting that the attesting witness is the same person in each case, then the address and description are given on the face of the bill of sale. Inasmuch as the Act, when prescribing these particulars, is dealing with the original bill of sale, the original may be looked at for the purpose of comparing the handwriting, though no extraneous evidence is admissible in regard to it. In the present case no member of the court has the smallest doubt on looking at the bill of sale that the witness, "Geo. Bailey," in each attestation clause is the same person. The address and description of the witness are therefore given in the bill of sale, and the bill of sale is good. The case of Parsons v. Brand is distinguishable, as there the address and description of the witness did not appear upon the bill of sale at all. The appeal must be allowed, and the judgment of the county court judge restored.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The learned judges in the Divisional Court considered themselves bound by the authority of Parsons v. Brand to hold that this bill of sale was void. In that case, however, this court decided that an omission in the bill of sale could not be supplied from the affidavit, but that the bill of sale itself must be in accordance with the form. Section 9 of the Act provides that a bill of sale shall be void unless made in accordance with the form. Section 10 provides that the execution of a bill of sale by the grantor shall be attested by at least one credible witness. The question, then, is whether this bill of sale is attested in accordance with the form. The form, when dealing with the attestation clause, says "Add witness's name, address, and description." These particulars must be given somewhere in the attestation clause. If a person signs more than one attestation clause he need only state his address and description once so long as it is clear from the face of the bill of sale that the witness in each case is the same person. The Act does not require him to repeat his address and description over again. In Thomas v. Kelly, 37 W. R., at p. 356, 13 App. Cas., at p. 520, Lord Macnaghten said: "When is an instrument which purports to be a bill of sale not in accordance with the statutory form? Possibly when it departs from the statutory form in anything which is not merely a matter of verbal difference." Taking that as our guide, can it be said that this attestation clause is not in accordance with the form? If, from the face of this bill of sale, the inference is irresistible, as it seems to me to be, that there is only one attesting witness, then the bill of sale is valid. In the cases cited the address and description of the attesting witness were omitted altogether from the bill of sale.

LOPES, L.J.—If, from the face of the bill of sale, without the assistance of any extraneous evidence, the conclusion is irresistible that the attesting witness in each attestation clause is the same person, then the address and description are given in the attestation clause, and the bill of sale is valid. To my mind the conclusion from this bill of sale is irresistible that "Geo. Bailey" in both cases is the same person. The learned judges in the court below relied upon the cases of Parsons v. Brand and Coulson v. Dickson. In the first case both the address and description of the witness were altogether omitted from the bill of sale. In the second case the address was given, but not the description. The court held that both bills of sale were bad as not being in accordance with the form, and that the defect could not be cured by anything extraneous to the bill of sale itself. That is not the case here.

Appeal allowed.

"THE RUBY." (a.)

Shipping — Damage — Compulsory pilotage — Llanelly Pilotage District—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 353, 388—6 & 7 Vict. c. lxxviii., s. 158.

Subject to the provisions in the Merchant Shipping Acts exempting from compulsory pilotage certain vessels there referred to, pilotage is compulsory within the limits of the Llanelly Pilotage District for all vessels not exempted from compulsory pilotage by the terms of the pilotage bye-laws made by the Burry Navigation and Llanelly Harbour Commissioners.

This was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamship Cambrian against The Ruby and her freight.

This action was brought to recover the damages sustained in a collision between the two vessels on the 16th of February, 1890, in the River Burry, when both vessels were in charge of pilots licensed by the Burry Navigation and Llanelly Harbour Commissioners.

The owners of The Ruby appeared as defendants, and set up a defence on the merits, and also pleaded that at and before the time of the collision The Ruby was within a district where the employment of a pilot was compulsory by law, and was in charge of a duly licensed pilot by compulsion of law, and that if the said collision was caused or contributed to by any person on board The Ruby, which they denied, it was solely caused by the default or negligence of the said pilot, and not by any default or neglect of the defendants or their servants. The defendants further, by way of counter-claim, alleged that they had sustained damage by reason of the negligent navigation of The Cambrian by the plaintiffs or their servants, and for the amount of the damages occasioned by the collision claimed judgment against the plaintiffs and their bail.

The plaintiffs, in their reply, joined issue upon the defence, and by way of defence to the counter-claim, repeated the allegations in the statement of claim, and further pleaded as follows:—

3. The plaintiffs further say that at the time of the said collision The Cambrian was in charge of a duly licensed pilot for the district in which she was being navigated, all of whose orders were obeyed, and that if the said collision was caused or contributed to by the fault or incapacity of any person on board The Cambrian, which they deny, it was solely by the fault or incapacity of the said pilot, and if the court should be of opinion that the employment of such pilot was compulsory upon the plaintiffs by law at the time and place of such collision, the plaintiffs say they are not answerable for any loss or damage occasioned to the defendants by such collision by reason of the aforesaid circumstances, and under the provisions of section 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

The action was heard on the merits before Butt, J., and two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House on the 5th of June, when the court pronounced the collision to have been occasioned solely by the fault or incapacity of a duly licensed pilot, who was at the time of the said collision acting in charge of the steamship Ruby, but reserved for argument the question of law whether the employment of the pilot of The Ruby at the time and place of the collision was compulsory or not.

(a.) Reported by F. C. JEMMETT and A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

June 10.—The reserved question of law came on for argument before Butt, J.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall appeared for the defendants, the owners of The Ruby.

Barnes, Q.C., and Raikes appeared for the plaintiffs, the owners of The Cambrian.

Such of the sections of the local Acts of Parliament relating to the pilotage jurisdiction of the Burry Navigation and Llanelly Harbour Commissioners as are material to this report are set out below in the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal; and bye-laws under those sections were from time to time, from 1814 to the present time, made by the commissioners therein mentioned and their successors. Of the bye-laws so made, the following article was in force at the time of the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854:—

1. All vessels registering thirty tons and upwards passing over the Bar of Burry, either inwards or outwards, and all vessels with cargoes, though under that tonnage inwards, shall heave to and shall receive on board the first of the licensed pilots who shall offer, and the master of any vessel refusing or neglecting to do so, shall pay the pilotage as though such pilot had been taken on board, and be subject to a penalty not exceeding five pounds.

A similar bye-law, purporting to be applicable to The Ruby, was in force at the date of the collision.

BUTT, J.—I have no doubt whatever that this pilotage was by law compulsory upon all persons trading to this port, Llanelly, at the time when the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 came into operation; and if that is so, by the terms of that Act of Parliament pilotage continues compulsory.

It appears that the harbour authorities have made bye-laws ever since 1814, making pilotage, if they have any operation at all, compulsory. I see no ground upon which it can be said that this vessel was not obliged to take a pilot.

I do not think it really worth while to go through the somewhat lengthy preambles and clauses of these Acts of Parliament. The Act of the 6th and 7th Vict. c. lxxxviii. was passed at a time when, as a matter of fact (although as a matter of law it has been questioned), pilotage was compulsory in this port—that is to say, vessels were in the habit of taking pilots as if under compulsion.

I have no doubt that pilotage was compulsory in this case on the owners of The Ruby, and as I have found that The Ruby was to blame for this collision, but that the fault was the fault of the pilot alone, I must dismiss the claim against her owners. There will be no order as to the costs of the action; but unless the registrar finds that the practice has been, in a case like the present, for the court to make no order as to the costs of the counter-claim, the defendants will be condemned in the costs of the counter-claim.*

Against this decision on the question of compulsory pilotage the owners of The Ruby appealed.

* The minute of the decree subsequently entered in the registry was in the following terms:—The judge having heard counsel on both sides on the reserved question of law, pronounced that the employment of the pilot who was at the time of the collision in question in this action acting in charge of the steamship Ruby was compulsory by law, and he further pronounced against both the plaintiffs' claim and defendants' counter-claim for damages arising out of such collision, and made no order as to costs, except as to those (if any) consequent on the said counter-claim, in which he condemned the defendants.

July 22.—The appeal came on for hearing.

Barnes, Q.C., and Raikes, for the appellants.

Sir W. Phillimore and Aspinall, for the respondents.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question in this case is whether this vessel was bound to take a pilot on board, and whether the captain, when the pilot was on board, had to give up the navigation of the vessel to him. In other words, was pilotage compulsory? Such an obligation is put on a vessel, not for the benefit of individual shipowners, but for the protection of the general body of shipowners on account of the difficult navigation of most of our ports. The persons who made these bye-laws had not to think of the results which might ensue in consequence of pilotage being compulsory if ships came into collision, for these are a consequence of the principles of the common law. The bye-laws in question have the force of statutes. Llanelly is a small port, and the Legislature gave to local persons power to make bye-laws which have the same effect as statutes have in regard to larger ports. The preamble of the first local Act relating to this port—viz., that of 1813—shows the intention of the Legislature, that pilotage should be regulated and the entry to the port made safer. Section 158 of the Act of 1843 gives power to make bye-laws for regulating the navigation of the port. In order to regulate there must be ample power of control, and one of the first things required for the proper navigation of the port is that vessels should be steered in and out safely. A pilot acquainted with the locality would do this best. Therefore the authorities would have power to select and license pilots. There are decisions which show also that where authorities have power to make bye-laws, they have also power to impose reasonable penalties to enforce them. I am clearly of opinion that the authorities of this port have power to order a pilot to be taken on board vessels navigating into or out of it, and the fact that they have made bye-laws since 1814 regulating pilotage, and that these have never been disputed, is strong to show that this interpretation of them has been generally accepted. I have no doubt that pilotage was compulsory on this ship, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question in this case is what is the true construction of section 158 of the Act of 1843. To discover it we must look to the earlier Acts, and especially to the preamble of the Act of 1813. When these are read it becomes obvious that the Legislature has given power to make pilotage compulsory in this port.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

In re ANDERTON AND MILNER'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Usual and proper covenants—Proviso for re-entry—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14.

Under an agreement for a lease to contain usual and proper covenants, the landlord is not entitled to have inserted in the lease a proviso for re-entry upon breach of any of the covenants by the lessee or otherwise than on non-payment of rent.

Hodgkinson v. Crowe, 23 W. R. 406, 885, L. R. 10 Ch. 622, is not affected by the 14*th section of the Conveyancing Act,* 1881.

Vendor and purchaser summons.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to settle the form of covenants in a lease.

The only point requiring decision was as to the proper form of the proviso for re-entry in a lease to contain usual and proper covenants.

By agreement dated the 19th of February, 1890, F. W. Anderton, the lessor, agreed to lease certain houses for a term of seventy years to F. B. Milner, the lessee. The consideration was a premium of £230 and a ground-rent of 12 guineas. The lease was to be subject to the usual covenants to insure from loss by fire, repair, and pay rent and all outgoings that might be charged on the property and ground, and the lease and counterpart were to be prepared by the vendor's solicitor, and contain the usual and proper covenants thereinbefore mentioned, and also one for registration of transfers. The only covenants mentioned in the agreement are those stated above.

The conveyancing counsel to whom the judge referred the matter settled the lease with a proviso for re-entry on breach of any of the covenants.

The lessee refused to take the lease in this form, contending that the proviso must be limited to non-payment of rent.

The conveyancing counsel thereupon submitted the point to the court.

Percy F. Wheeler, for the lessor.—The question of "usual and proper covenants" was formerly governed by Hodgkinson v. Crowe, 23 W. R. 406, 885, L. R. 10 Ch. 622, but since the relief afforded to lessees by section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the ground of that decision—viz., "unfairness to the tenant"—is no longer applicable. "Usual covenants" include "conditions": Brookes v. Drysdale, 26 W. R. 331, 3 C. P. D. 52; Wilkins v. Fry, 1 Mer., at p. 263. As to what are usual covenants see Hampshire v. Wickens, 26 W. R. 491, 7 Ch. D. 555.

D. L. Alexander, for the lessee.—The proviso is not usual in this general form. The Conveyancing Act has made no difference. It was passed in favour of the lessee, not to give the landlord greater rights. Again, the provisoes for re-entry directed in the leasing sections of the Settled Estates Acts of 1856 and 1877 and the Settled Land Act of 1882 show what the Legislature considers a usual and proper form of proviso. If the question of "relief" governed the point the proviso for re-entry before the Conveyancing Act would have been on non-payment of rent or breach of covenant to insure, in both of which cases relief could have been granted.

(a.) Reported by G. ROWLAND ALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CHITTY, J.—The question is, how the proviso for re-entry ought to be drawn in this lease, which the conveyancing counsel has settled pursuant to the agreement.

The lease is one for seventy years of house property, at a ground-rent of twelve guineas. But the consideration for the lease is not the ground-rent alone, but also a sum of £230 premium, which is really paid in part purchase of the term. The property is to be held subject to the usual covenants to insure against loss by fire and so on. The lease and counterpart are to be prepared by the vendor's solicitor, and to contain "the usual and proper covenants hereinbefore mentioned." They have defined the usual covenants for themselves, and there they are to end. The agreement is not well drawn. There is no reference to the proviso for re-entry, and so it appears to me there must be the reasonable proviso which, by the practice of conveyancers, has been adopted in leases of this class. The question came before the Court of Appeal in Hodgkinson v. Crowe. There the agreement was for a mining lease to contain "all usual and customary mining clauses," and it was held by the Court of Appeal that no proviso for re-entry could be inserted except for non-payment of rent, any other clause being neither usual nor reasonable. James, L J., gave various grounds for his decision, such as that there are many cases where a court of equity can give no relief against a clause of re-entry for breach of covenants. But the main ground of the decision is that the general proviso of re-entry was not usual at that time. This decision was in 1875. No practice has sprung up since then, so far as I am aware, to insert a proviso for re-entry on breach of any of the covenants. The burden of proof lay on the lessor to show that such a practice existed, but no attempt has been made to do so, although the case has been well argued on his behalf. The learned conveyancer has suggested that the proviso is reasonable and proper at the present day, having regard to section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, under which relief against a power of re-entry is granted to the lessee on certain terms. It is, of course, possible that under this section a practice may grow up of inserting a wide proviso of re-entry, but that is not the point. The question is whether it has already grown up, and whether it was usual at the date of the contract—viz., on the 19th of February, 1890.

In Hodgkinson v. Crowe James, L J., referred to the Settled Estates Act of 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120), s. 2, sub-section (5), as to the proviso for re-entry contained in leases authorized by the court. This is the same as section 4, sub-section (5), of the Settled Estates Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 18), and both in this section and in section 7 of the Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), which is subsequent to the Conveyancing Act, the Legislature seems to think that the proviso for re-entry on non-payment of rent is the usual proviso. While acknowledging that the suggestion of the learned conveyancing counsel is ingenious, I do not think it is sound; and, having regard to the purchase of the term, I should have required a very strong case to convince me that such a general proviso of re-entry ought to stand in this lease. The lease will stand with the condition of re-entry limited to non-payment of rent.

N.B.—The 32nd section of the Settled Estates Act, 1856, directs a proviso of re-entry on breach of any of the covenants. It was limited as above by section 46 of the Settled Estates Act, 1877.

Ex parte CROWN BANK (LIMITED). In re O'MALLEY. (a.)

Attachment — Contempt of court — Pending proceedings —Newspaper comments—Motion to commit.

A paragraph inserted in a newspaper commenting on a case pending before the court, and foretelling the result of the case, is a contempt of court.

Motion.

This was an application on behalf of the Crown Bank (Limited) to commit the publisher of the Star newspaper to prison for publishing, while a petition was pending to wind up the bank, the following paragraph :—

"THE CROWN BANK—LETTING LIGHT IN.

"We have respectfully directed attention to the so-called bank, and we have not hesitated to describe it as a fraudulent concern. Neither Mr. Gilpin nor any other person connected with it, has thought fit to challenge that description, and we observe with much satisfaction that the matter has now come before the courts. On Saturday a petition for winding up the bank was discussed in Mr. Justice North's court. The petition is ordered to stand over until next Saturday, when the chairman of the bank and Mr. Gilpin are directed to attend for the purpose of being examined. If they are compelled to make a full statement as to the affairs of the bank, we shall have some interesting revelations."

The above paragraph appeared after the petition had been ordered to stand over in order that the chairman of the bank and Mr. Gilpin, a director, might attend for cross-examination.

Previous to the presentation of the petition, on several occasions articles had appeared in the Star newspaper in reference to the bank, which commented unfavourably on the company and its directors, and were written, as the court held, on information supplied by the petitioning shareholder.

The publisher made an affidavit, stating that he was not aware he had been committing a contempt of court in publishing the remarks complained of, but that if the court should be of opinion that he had committed a contempt, humbly apologizing for the offence.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Chadwyck-Healey, for the motion.—This publication, pending litigation, tends to prejudice a fair trial. It is clear that the article is inspired by the petitioner: Tichborne v. Mostyn, 15 W. R. 1072, L. R. 7 Eq. 55 n.; In re Cheltenham and Swansea Railway Carriage and Wagon Co., 17 W. R. 463, L. R. 8 Eq. 580.

Wurtzburg, for the respondent.—The court is slow to exercise the extraordinary jurisdiction to commit. When the trial is before a judge alone the comments would have no effect: Metropolitan Music Hall Co. v. Lake, 60 L. T. N. S. 749, 37 W. R Dig. 10; and Plating Co. v. Farquharson, 29 W. R. 510, L. R. 17 Ch. D. 49, 54.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.

NORTH, J.—The perusal of the paragraphs which appeared in the Star newspaper previously to the presentation of the petition clearly shows that the editor was put in motion by the petitioner, and that the views he was expressing were not the independent opinion of an impartial newspaper, but those of a partisan. So far as regards the earlier paragraphs, published prior to the presentation of the petition, they might be the subject of an action for libel, but are not a contempt of court. But when, after notice of the presentation of the petition, the Star deliberately took one side in the controversy and took on itself to predict what would be the result, in my opinion a gross contempt of court was committed. It was doing what might interfere with the course of justice. Whether such would be its result in any case I do not know. Whether any person exists with a mind so constituted that he would be influenced by such a paragraph in such a paper I cannot say. The only object for which such a paragraph could be inserted must be to influence persons reading it and induce them to take one side. It was not, therefore, an impartial statement, even if that were permissible, but it was a deliberate adoption of the view of one of the parties. I do not think a lengthy reference to the two authorities cited in support of the motion is necessary. In The Case of the Printer of the Champion, 2 Atk. 469, Lord Hardwicke says: "Nothing is more incumbent upon courts of justice than to preserve their proceedings from being misrepresented, nor is there anything of more pernicious consequence than to prejudice the minds of the public against persons concerned as parties in causes before the cause is finally heard. It has always been my opinion, as well as the opinion of those who have sat here before me, that such a proceeding ought to be discountenanced."

That view has both before and since always been taken by the courts, and, in my opinion, ought to be acted upon in this case. The case before me is entirely different from the cases relied upon by Mr. Wurtzburg, where a newspaper has inadvertently admitted advertisements, in ignorance of the existence of legal proceedings, and those cases have no application to a case where the act done is deliberate.

Under the circumstances there has been, in my opinion, a gross contempt of court, and I should send the publisher to prison but for the fact that I do not wish to give him the prestige which some foolish persons would attach to a man upon whom such a sentence is passed.

I order him to pay a fine of £50 and the costs of the proceedings as between solicitor and client. I think the company were quite right in bringing this matter before the court.

PHILLIPS v. HOMFRAY. (a.)

Interest—Compensation—Minerals wrongfully abstracted —3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 29—Action for money had and received—Time for claiming interest.

By a decree made in 1871 the defendants S. H. and R. F. and the estate of the defendant W. H. F. were declared liable in respect of all minerals gotten or removed by them from under the plaintiffs' land, and an inquiry was directed what quantity of minerals had been so gotten or removed, and it was ordered that the market value at the pit's mouth of all such minerals should be certified, all just allowances being made for carriage, but none for getting or working.

After the decree the defendants S. H. and R. F. died, and the suit, so far as the inquiry was concerned, was continued against their respective legal representatives.

(a.) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The official referee, before whom the inquiry was prosecuted, reported, in December, 1889, the value of the minerals to be £9,028 6s.

On the further consideration of the suit the plaintiffs claimed interest at £5 per cent., with half-yearly rests, on the amount found to be due to them.

Held, (1) that the suit must be treated, not as an action of trover or trespass, but as an action for money had and received, to which section 29 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, did not apply; (2) that no such relationship existed between the parties as to entitle the plaintiffs to treat the defendants as trustees of the sum found due from them; and (3) that the plaintiffs' claim to interest ought to have been adjudicated upon at the trial, and that it was too late to raise the question upon the further consideration.

Further consideration.

This suit was instituted in 1866 against Samuel Homfray, Rowland Fothergill, and William Henry Forman, who carried on business under the style of the Tredegar Iron Co., asking for a declaration that the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs in respect of certain minerals gotten and removed by them from under land of the plaintiffs and for consequential relief.

In 1871 a decree was made declaring the liability of the defendants Homfray and Fothergill, and the estate of the deceased defendant Forman, in respect of the minerals so gotten or removed; and the liability of the first named defendants to make compensation to the plaintiffs for the user of all roads and passages under the farm; and an inquiry was directed as to what quantities of minerals had been so gotten or removed as aforesaid, and it was ordered that the market price or value of all such minerals at the pit's mouth should be certified, all just allowances being made to the defendants in respect of the cost of carriage to the pit's mouth, but none for the expense of getting, severing, or working the same. Further inquiries were also directed with regard to the compensation to be made by the two first-named defendants in respect of the use of the roads and passages under the farm, and the manner in which they had worked the minerals (L. R. 6 Ch. 770, 20 W. R. Ch. Dig. 121).

In 1883, Fothergill being then dead, these last inquiries were stayed as against his representatives (32 W. R. 6, 24 Ch. D. 439), and in 1884 they were stayed as against the representatives of Homfray, who was then dead.

In December, 1889, the official referee, before whom the first inquiry was prosecuted, reported the value of the minerals taken to be £9,028 6s.

Hastings, Q.C., and F. T. Procter, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to interest at £5 per cent. on the £9,028 6s., with half-yearly rests. The court has jurisdiction under section 29 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42 to give damages in the nature of interest in actions of trover or trespass de bonis asportatis. The present suit is in effect an equitable action of trover. Further, the defendants, being accounting parties, and having had the use of the plaintiffs' money for twenty-five years, must be treated as trustees thereof, and are, therefore, chargeable with compound interest.

They referred to Wood v. Morewood, 3 Q. B. 440n; Mayne on Damages, 4th ed., p. 372; Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co., 37 W. R. 394, 42 Ch. D. 66, 43 Ibid. 316, 38 W. R. Dig. 63; Martin v. Porter. 5 M. & W. 351; Burdick v. Garrick, 18 W. R. 387, L. R. 5 Ch. 233; Jones v. Foxall, 15 Beav. 388; Williams v. Powell, Ibid. 461; Attorney-General v. Alford, 3 W. R. 200. 4 De G. M. & G. 843; Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co., 28 W. R. 357, 5 App. Cas. 25.

Rigby, Q.C., and Sangster Green, for the legal personal representatives of the defendants Forman and Homfray.—The sum awarded to the plaintiffs by the referee is in the nature of a penal sum, for it represents the value of the coal at the pit's mouth, without any allowance being made for the expense of getting, severing, or working it. The plaintiffs now claim interest in addition. If they base their claim on section 29 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, which applies only to actions of trover and trespass, the maxim "Actio personalis moritur cum personâ" is applicable. On the other hand, if they rest their claim on section 28 of the same Act, which applies to the case of money had and received, they must also fail, for they were never able until the publication of the referee's report to give the notice required by the section. Further, the defendants were under no duty or liability to invest this money, for no fiduciary relationship existed between the plaintiffs and defendants.

Buckley, Q.C., and Osler, for the legal representatives of the defendant Fothergill.

Hastings, in reply, referred to Hambly v. Trott, 1 Cowp. 371. Cur. adv. vult.

April 23.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued:—The first ground on which it is sought to charge interest is that the plaintiffs are entitled to it under the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 29. That section is confined to actions of trover, and trespass de bonis asportatis. The question is whether I can treat this present action as an action, as it was put in argument, in the nature of an equitable action of trover. It was decided in the case of Hambly v. Trott that an action of trover was one to which the rule of law, "Actio personalis moritur cum personâ" applies. There the action was brought against an executor for a conversion by his testator, and upon a plea of not guilty by the testator there was a verdict for the plaintiff. The case was twice argued, and after judgment had been reserved, Lord Mansfield, in delivering the judgment of the court, concludes as follows:—"The form of the plea is decisive—namely, that the testator was not guilty, and the issue is to try the guilt of the testator. And no mischief is done; for so far as the cause of action does not arise ex delicto or ex maleficio of the testator, but is founded in a duty which the testator owes the plaintiff; upon principles of civil obligation, another form of action may be brought as an action for money had and received." Thereupon the judgment was arrested.

That case was much considered and discussed in this very case of Phillips v. Homfray upon the appeal (24 Ch. D. 439), and, after carefully reading the judgment of Pearson, J., and the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal, it does not appear that the proposition of law on which Hambly v. Trott was decided was in any way disputed. It was accepted by all the judges as good law that an action of trover was one which dies with the person.

The question on which the majority of the court differed from Baggallay, L.J., and Pearson, J., seems to have been this, whether any form of action could be suggested which could be brought at law, in which the damages or the sums which were sought to be recovered by means of inquiries 2, 3, and 4, could be recovered against an executor, and the opinion of the majority of the Court of Appeal was that no such action could be suggested. The judgment of Bowen, L.J., seems to me to show that very clearly. I will read one or two passages from it which appear to me to contain the substance of all that I need mention. He says:—"The only cases in which, apart from questions of breach of contract, express or implied, a remedy for a wrongful act can be pursued against the estate of a deceased person who has done the act, appear to us to be those in which property, or the proceeds or value of property, belonging to another have been appropriated by the deceased person and added to his own estate or moneys. In such cases, whatever the original form of action, it is in substance brought to recover property, or its proceeds or value, and by amendment could be made such in form as well as in substance. . . . The true test to be applied to the present case is whether the plaintiffs' claim against the deceased R. Fothergill, in respect of which inquiries 2 and 3 were directed to his lifetime, belongs to the category of action ex delicto, or whether any form of action against the executors of the deceased, or the deceased man in his lifetime, can be based upon any implied contract or duty. In other words, could the plaintiffs have sued the deceased at law in any form of action in which 'Not guilty' would not be the proper plea? If such alternative form of action could be conceived it must be either an action for the use, by the plaintiffs' permission, of the plaintiffs' roads and passages, similar in principle, though not identical, with an action for the use and occupation of the plaintiffs' land. Or it must be in the shape of an action for money had and received, based upon the supposition that funds are in the hands of the executors which properly belong in law or in equity to the plaintiffs. We do not believe that the principle of waiving a tort and suing in contract can be carried further than this—that a plaintiff is entitled, if he chooses it, to abstain from treating as a wrong the acts of the defendant in cases where, independently of the question of wrong, the plaintiff could make a case for relief." That is the ground of the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal, which I need not say is binding upon me. The decision was that the proceedings must be stayed under inquiries 2, 3, and 4, but not under inquiry 1, with which I am now dealing. Having regard to that, I am of opinion that this action cannot be treated as in the nature of an action of trover, but rather as in the nature of an action for money had and received.

It appears to me, therefore, that section 29 of the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42 does not apply, and that, if any section of that Act does apply, it is section 28. That section was not relied upon in the opening of the case by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, and in his reply he stated expressly that he could not bring himself within that section. It appears to me, therefore, that the application for interest, so far as it is based on the statute, fails.

Then it was further said that the defendants were accounting parties, and that there was a general principle that accounting parties may be charged with interest. The principal cases which were cited in support of that proposition were two well-known cases—Burdick v. Garrick and Attorney-General v. Alford. In both these cases a fiduciary relation subsisted between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and the right to interest on the part of the plaintiffs was treated as arising by virtue of that relation, and the duty which the defendants owed to the plaintiffs by reason of it. No such relation exists here, and therefore the cases cited do not, in my opinion, apply. It was on those grounds that the plaintiffs rested their case. They appear to me to fail, and perhaps it might be sufficient to stop there, but I think it right to add this, that it does appear to me that the decree, as it now stands, is not consistent with the claim which is put forward by the plaintiffs. The decree appears to be framed so as simply to give the plaintiffs compensation for the value of this property, to be ascertained by means of the inquiry No. 1. If the defendants were to be charged with interest, it seems to me that the right course would have been to have made that case at the trial, and to have inserted in the decree proper directions as to the mode in which the interest was to be charged and ascertained. No such directions are to be found in it; and I think that it is too late now for the plaintiffs to come forward and ask to charge the defendants with interest.

The decree was not made till 1871. At the trial it must have been known that all the improper workings which were complained of had taken place prior to this, and the plaintiffs obtained a decree in which they charged the then defendants with the value, upon the footing on which the compensation is ascertained, when the defendants have been guilty, not of a mere accidental trespass, but of a wilful tortious act. That gives the plaintiffs more than the simple value of the property, because it gives them the value of the property without any allowance for the expense of getting, or severing, or working the minerals. For these reasons, I think the claim for interest cannot be sustained. I only desire to add this, that I do not think that in the present decision I depart from anything that was laid down or decided in the case of Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co., to which I was referred. In that case the form of the judgment was different. There the inquiry directed was what damages had been sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the detention by the defendant company of the cargoes of guano in question in the action, and in working out that inquiry as to damages the chief clerk allowed interest. It was held by Kay, J., and, as I understand, also by the Court of Appeal, that he was justified in so doing, by reason of the statute. But, in the first place, that was a different form of inquiry, and, in the second place, there was no room for the application of the maxim, "Actio personalis moritur cum persona," the defendants there being a company, and being in existence as such at the date of the further consideration as well as at the time when the wrongful acts complained of were committed. I think, therefore, that no interest can be allowed.

"THE MARK LANE." (a.)

Shipping—Salvage—Exorbitant agreement—Costs.

The plaintiffs, in an action of salvage brought to recover salvage remuneration for salvage services rendered in the Atlantic Ocean in towing for 350 miles to a port of safety a steamship disabled in her machinery, and valued, with her cargo and freight, at above £23,000, but less than £25,000, pleaded an agreement made between the masters of the plaintiffs' and defendants' vessel before the commencement of the services, whereby it had been agreed that the master of the plaintiffs' vessel would make the attempt to tow the disabled vessel to the port where she was placed in safety for the sum of £5,000, and that, in case of failing in the attempt, the plaintiffs' vessel should be paid for the service rendered, and claimed (1) the said agreed sum of £5,000 as and for salvage for the services rendered by them, and (2) alternatively, such an amount of salvage as to the court should seem right At the hearing of the action the court, considering that £5,000 was an exorbitant sum for the salvage services rendered, awarded to the salvors £3,000 salvage remuneration, with costs, and apportioned the amount so awarded as follows:—£2,500 to the owners of the salving vessel, £150 to her master, and £350 to her officers and crew according to their rating.

This was an action of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Crete against the steamship Mark Lane, her cargo and freight.

Appearances as defendants were entered on behalf of the owners of The Mark Lane and her freight and on behalf of the owners of the cargo of that vessel, and the plaintiffs, on the 29th of May, 1890, delivered a statement of claim in which, after alleging that on the 13th of April, 1890, The Crete, a steamship of 1,121 tons net, on a voyage in the Atlantic Ocean from Philadelphia to Denmark, had sighted The Mark Lane disabled by the loss of three of her propeller blades, and leaking so badly through her stern tube that it had been necessary to plug the tube, so that the engines could not be used, that the master of The Mark Lane had requested the master of The Crete to take him in tow for Halifax, they pleaded that an agreement had been entered into in the word, and figures following:—

"About lat. 40.0 N., long. 50 50 W.
"Sunday, 13 April, 1890.

"It is now agreed between Enoch James, master of the steamship Crete, and John Pengelly, master of the steamship Mark Lane, of London, that the master of the steamship Crete will make the attempt to tow the steamship Mark Lane to Halifax, Nova Scotia, for the sum of £5,000 British sterling. In case of failing in the attempt to reach Halifax, and obliged to abandon through stress of weather, the steamship Crete to be paid for service rendered."

The statement of claim then set out in detail the services The Crete had rendered, that she had taken The Mark Lane in tow and had towed her in safety to Halifax, where the two vessels arrived on the morning of the 16th of April, 1890, and after stating the value of The Mark Lane, her cargo, and freight to be £24,200 concluded as follows:—"The plantiff's claim: (1) The said agreed sum of £5,000 as and for salvage for the services rendered as aforesaid, and costs. (2) Alternatively, such an amount of salvage as to the court shall seem right, and costs."

The defendants, the owners of The Mark Lane, delivered a defence alleging in substance that the statements in the statement of claim were greatly exaggerated and untrue in many respects, and in the ninth paragraph of their defence pleaded as follows:—"The defendants say that the said agreement is not binding on them, on the grounds that it was unreasonable and that the said sum of £5,000 was exorbitant, and that the master of The Mark Lane signed the same under duress, and because he was led to believe by the master of The Crete that unless he signed it The Crete would not take The Mark Lane in tow. As soon as he arrived at Halifax the master of The Mark Lane gave notice to the master of The Crete that he would not be bound by the agreement."

The action now came on to be heard before Butt, J., and two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

Barnes, Q.C., and Aspinall, appeared for the plaintiffs.

Sir W. Phillimore and J. Walton, appeared for the defendants, and referred to The Cargo ex Woosung, 1 P. D. 260, 24 W. R. Dig. 281; The Medina, 25 W. R. 156, 2 P. D. 5; and The Silesia, 29 W. R. 156, 5 P. D. 177, as authorities in support of the view that the agreement was one which the court would not enforce.

BUTT, J.—The values of these two steamers, though not large, are considerable. The plaintiffs are seeking to recover the sum of £5,000, the sum mentioned in the agreement set out in the statement of claim, and only in the alternative asking the court to award such an amount of salvage as it may deem just. I feel satisfied that for services such as those rendered in this case the Court of Admiralty never has given such an award as £5,000, and I think, having regard to the state of The Mark Lane, the distance she was towed, and that £5,000 is more than one-fifth of the total value of the salved property, the plaintiff's demand is exorbitant. I think it would be so were this a salvage agreement; but it is not—far from it. One reason why salvage awards are so large is because, if the service is unsuccessful, at whatever risk and labour it may have been performed, the salvor gets nothing. But by this agreement, in the event of The Mark Lane going down, the plaintiffs were still to be paid for the service rendered.

I have said that I consider the demand exorbitant. In the cases referred to by counsel the word "inequitable" has been used. But I think that what is at the root of the question is this: where it is found that a wholly unreasonable price has been insisted upon by the salvors, and an agreement agreeing to that amount has been signed, the court looks rather to the position of the parties than to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the amount, the question being, were the parties, in fact, contracting on equal terms? It is clear that in the present case they were not. It is true that there is not in this case the amount of duress which would invalidate an agreement at common law; but in this court the same amount of compulsion or duress—call it what you will—is not necessary to induce the court to refuse to enforce an agreement. The captain of The Crete appears to have said in effect, though not in so many words, "If you do not sign this agreement to pay £5,000 I will leave you." His manner and his demeanour were, in my opinion, such that they led the captain of The Mark Lane to believe that that was what he meant to do, and he has not from first to last said that he would either have taken less or have stayed by The Mark Lane. The fact is that the master of The Mark Lane signed this agreement under compulsion, and, the amount being exorbitant, I decline to uphold the agreement. Then the question arises, what sum are the salvors entitled to receive? Considering that the weather was fine during the greater part of the time during which the services were rendered, and that there was a little risk to the salvors—no more than is necessarily incurred when a large steamer takes a still larger one in tow, and that the towage was about 350 miles, we think that £3,000 will be a liberal award. As I am asked to apportion the amount, I direct that £2,500 shall be paid to the owners of The Crete, £150 to the master, and £350 to the officers and crew according to their rating.

Sir Walter Phillimore applied that no order should be made as to the costs of the action.—In the case of The Silesia, a case on all fours with the present, the defendants having made no tender, the court followed the ruling of the Court of Appeal in The Medina, and ordered that each party to the suit should bear his own costs.

BUTT, J.—There has been no tender in this case, but the plaintiffs have succeeded in obtaining a large award of salvage. I shall in this case give the plaintiffs their costs.

Appeal from the decision of North, J. (reported ante, p. 5.)

The company was registered as a limited company in 1859 under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, 1856 and 1857, with a capital of £40,000 in shares of £10 each fully paid up.

The articles of association provided that the capital of the company might be increased, by the passing of a special resolution for that purpose by the company, and that the additional capital should for all purposes be considered part of the original capital, and subject to the same provisions with reference to calls or forfeiture or otherwise, as if it had been part of the original capital. The articles contained no provision with respect to distribution of the surplus assets among the shareholders in the event of a winding up.

By special resolutions passed and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings of the company held in May and in June, 1861, it was resolved (1) that the capital of the company be increased by the creation of 2,016 additional shares of £10 each, and that such additional shares be credited with the sum of £10 as paid up thereon upon payment by the allottees of a sum of £3 per share; (2) that the owners of these additional shares should be considered and treated with respect to dividend in the same manner, and should receive the like dividend as the holders of the original paid-up shares of £10 each; (3) that the directors should be authorized to offer such additional shares first to the present shareholders and afterwards to such persons as they might think fit; and (4) that the resolutions should be taken as additions to, and form part of, the articles of association of the company, and should be in lieu of any previous articles inconsistent with them.

Due notices of each of these meetings and of the resolutions passed and confirmed thereat had been sent to every shareholder of the company, and subsequently a notice was sent to every shareholder that the directors were prepared to allot the additional shares on the terms of the special resolutions, and a form of application for an allotment was sent along with such notice.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1,631 additional shares were applied for and were allotted, and certificates of the shares were subsequently sealed by the company and issued to the allottees.

The certificate of each original share, as well as the certificate of each additional share, contained a declaration that it was issued subject to the rules, regulations, and orders of the company for the time being in force.

Some of the additional shares had been from time to time transferred, and the transfers had been registered. The company continued to carry on its undertaking until 1889, when a resolution for the voluntary winding up of the company was passed.

The company had no creditors, and after all its assets had been realized there was (subject to the costs of liquidation) a surplus of £25,000 for division among the shareholders.

The liquidator had presented a petition to have it determined upon what principles and in what shares and proportions as between the holders of the original shares and the holders of the additional shares this surplus ought to be distributed, and the petition was served on persons appointed by the court to represent each class of shareholders.

North, J., held that the surplus should be applied, first, in repaying to each of the holders of original shares the sum of £7 on each share, so as to level them down to what had been paid by the holders of the additional shares, and then that the balance should be divided equally between all shareholders alike.

The holders of the additional shares appealed.

Buckley, Q.C., and W. B. Heath, for the appellants.—The additional shares were by agreement taken and issued at a discount of £7 per share, and though such an agreement has been held illegal as against creditors of the company in the winding up, yet it is not illegal as a mode of regulating the rights of the contributories inter se. Notice of the meetings at which the special resolutions were passed and confirmed, were sent to each shareholder, and also notice of the resolutions which were passed and confirmed thereat; and the additional shares were applied for, allotted, dealt with, and held for many years on the footing that by the payment of £3 per share the holder of an additional share was to be treated in all respects as the holder of an original share. We contend that the transaction amounted to an agreement on that footing between all the shareholders forming the company and those who paid the £3 per share. There is nothing in the Companies Acts to prevent an agreement being made between all the shareholders of a company as to a preferential right among themselves in respect of the capital: In re Eclipse Gold Mining Co., L. R. 17 Eq. 490, 22 W. R. Dig. 72; In re Bangor and Portmadoc Slate Co., 23 W. R. 785, L. R. 20 Eq. 59. [BOWEN, L.J.—But that is not the agreement in the present case, it is that and more, something which was intended to affect the rights of creditors as well.] If the agreement be bad as to one part, it does not follow it must be altogether bad. As between the particular members of the company inter se, the agreement is not ultrà vires. The contract is executed, and the money has been paid to the company on the terms of the contract. Each individual shareholder must be taken to have signed and sealed a document embodying the terms of the special resolutions passed in 1861, under which the allottees of the additional shares were to be put on the same footing as the holders of the original shares, but the effect of the order made by North, J., is that the original shareholders get the whole benefit of the improvement which arose from the increase of capital.

We contend, further, that, even if the agreement be held ultrà vires, the original allottees at all events, of the additional shares, ought to get back the £3 per share which they paid on the faith of the agreement contained in the special resolutions, and there ought to be an inquiry to ascertain the original allottees of the additional shares.

Chadwyck Healey, for the liquidator, and Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Mulligan, for the respondents, the holders of original shares, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order made by North, J., which is as follows:—[The Lord Justice read the order, and continued:—]

The company is a limited company registered under the provisions of the Acts of 1856 and 1857, which for present purposes do not materially differ from the Act of 1862, which replaces those Acts. The shares in the company, as originally formed, were 4,000 shares of £10 each, fully paid up. It was found desirable, subsequently, to increase the capital of the company, and accordingly resolutions to effect that purpose were passed by the company. [The Lord Justice read the resolutions, and continued:—] The effect of these resolutions was to enable persons who paid only £3 per share to get shares of £10 as fully paid-up shares.

If these resolutions were valid, the true construction of them may, possibly, be to entitle the holders of shares on which £3 only had been paid, to stand on the some footing as the holders of shares on which £10 had been paid, both with respect to the distribution of capital as well as the payment of dividend.

But the question we have to deal with is, What is the effect of the whole transaction, and what is the contract which was, in fact, entered into by those who took shares on the footing of these resolutions? Was it a contract entered into by them with the company as a body corporate, or was it a contract entered into by them with the individual shareholders, the members of the company? In my opinion it was only a contract entered into with the company, not a contract with the individual members of the company. It would be contrary to all principle to hold that a contract with a corporate body is equivalent to a contract with the individual members of the corporation.

Regarding the transaction, therefore, as a contract with the company, was it illegal and ultrà vires, or was it not? That point, which was, perhaps, doubtful in 1861, the date at which this contract was entered into, has been settled long since. It is now settled that such a contract with the company is illegal and ultrà vires. I do not say now whether or not the shareholders might not have obtained rescission of the contract by making an application for that purpose at the proper time, but, assuming that they could not now rescind, they were bound to pay up the whole amount on the shares.

It was urged that, although the contract was ultrà vires the company, yet that it could be regarded as intrà vires the contributories inter se. That, however, is merely asking the court to invent a contract which the parties never dreamt of entering into. That is the complete answer to the whole of Mr. Buckley's argument, every step of which proceeded on the basis that there was, in fact, such a contract as he suggested. For the same reason there is, therefore, no ground for any inquiry such as he asked for at the conclusion of his argument.

I think, therefore, that the decision of North, J., is perfectly right, and that the case of Ex parte Maude, In re Hodge's Distillery Co., which he followed, governs this case.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole of Mr. Buckley's case is founded on there having been a contract made between the holders of these additional shares and the individual members of the company. The answer to that is manifold; first, there was no such contract in fact; secondly, no such contract could be implied by law, because the circumstances of the case are totally inconsistent with the supposition of any implied contract with the members of the company as individuals; and, thirdly, even if there were such a contract, it could only be a contract that each individual member of the company should make a contract that was ultrà vires the company, and such a contract could not be enforced.

The appeal, therefore, fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

FRY, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Section 92 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, provides that (inter alia) the rents and profits of all hereditaments belonging to any corporate body shall be carried to an account to be called the "borough fund," and that such fund, saving the rights of all persons in or upon any real or personal estate of any body corporate, by virtue of any mortgage or otherwise, shall be applied to various specified purposes, including the payment of the salaries of the mayor, recorder, and police of the borough; and that, in case the borough fund shall be more than sufficient for such purposes, the surplus thereof shall be applied for the public benefit of the inhabitants of the borough. The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, contains a similar provision.

Held, that a bond of a municipal corporation creating a mortgage of the "borough fund" as constituted under either of the above Acts does not create an interest in, or a charge upon an interest in, land within the meaning of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, because such bond can only operate to charge the surplus (if any) of the fund remaining as moneys in the hands of the body corporate after the payments specified in section 92 have been made out of the fund.

The clause in section 92 of the Act of 1835 saving the rights of any person claiming under any mortgage applies only to rights existing at the date of the passing of that Act, and not to prospective rights.

Section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, provides that lands acquired by any local authority under that Act, and not required for the purposes for which they were acquired, shall be sold, and the proceeds of sale carried to the account of the "district fund."

Held, that, in the absence of any evidence to show the existence of any such surplus lands, a mortgage of the "district fund" did not create an interest in, or a charge upon an interest in, land within 9 Geo. 2, c. 36.

Decision of Stirling, J. (38 W. R. 249), reversed.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the decision of Stirling, J. (reported 38 W. R. 249).

The question raised by this appeal was whether or not certain corporation bonds created an interest in land within the Mortmain Act, 9 Geo. 2, c. 36.

The bonds in question were as follows:—

(1) A mortgage of the Dewsbury Corporation for £500, dated the 7th of October, 1878, made under the Batley Corporation Waterworks Act, 1873, and the Dewsbury and Heckmondwike Waterworks Act, 1876, of the share and interest of the mayor, alderman, and burgesses in the rates, rents, and moneys to be received in respect or by means of the waterworks of the Dewsbury and Heckmondwike Waterworks Board, and also as a collateral security of the borough rates and borough fund or general district rate and public water rate of the said borough. By the Act of 1876, s. 111, the corporation were empowered to charge the borough fund as a collateral security. From the evidence of the town clerk it appeared that the corporation was seised or possessed of the following hereditaments and real estate, that is to say:—"(a) The town hall now in course of construction upon freehold land acquired by the corporation for the purpose; also the borough offices of Dewsbury held by the corporation for an unexpired term of years under a lease thereof granted to the said corporation; some portions of the borough offices not required or constantly used by the corporation for their own use or that of their officers are sublet by the corporation to the School Board, the Waterworks Board, and the Chamber of Commerce of Dewsbury, as yearly tenants thereof at certain rents, which rents are paid to the treasurer of the corporation, and are by him carried to the credit of the account of, and form part of, the borough fund."

The Dewsbury borough fund was constituted by virtue of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), s. 92.*

(2) A mortgage of the Bradford Corporation for £400, dated the 1st of April, 1887, made under the Bradford Improvement Act, 1850, and in exercise of all other powers vested in the said corporation of "the borough fund of the said borough, and the rates, rents, and profits and other moneys forming such borough fund, or arising or accruing from the said borough fund."

The Bradford Improvement Act, 1850, constituted the corporation the local board of health, but it did not authorize them to charge the borough fund. The corporation were, however, authorized by the Tramways Orders Confirmation Acts, 1880 and 1883, as the local authority, to charge the borough fund with any sum not exceeding £95,000 for the purpose of the construction and maintenance of certain tramways in the borough.

The town clerk deposed that the corporation were seised and possessed of (inter alia) the following real or leasehold property:—the town hall of Bradford, the markets and market-places situate in Bradford acquired by the corporation under the Bradford Corporation Act, 1866, and certain surplus lands acquired by the said corporation for the purpose of effecting an enlargement of the town hall and improvements of the streets in the said borough, but which had not yet been used for that purpose, and in the meantime were let to several persons as tenants of the said corporation at yearly or other rents.

The Bradford borough fund was constituted under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 56), Part VII., the provisions of which are substantially the same as those of section 92 of the Act of 1835.

(3 and 4) Two mortgages of the Wakefield Corporation for £500, dated respectively the 10th of May, 1881, and the 9th of December, 1884, and respectively made under the Wakefield Corporation Waterworks Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. lvii.), of the share and interest of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses in the revenues to be received in respect or by means of the waterworks authorized by the said Act, and also, as a collateral security, of the general district rates and district fund of the said borough. By section 58 of the aforesaid Act "for securing repayment of moneys borrowed under the authority thereof the said corporation may mortgage the water revenues and the district fund and general district rate or either of them, and the provisions contained in sections 236-239 of the Public Health Act, 1875, with respect to the mortgages to be executed by a local authority shall apply in the case of all mortgages granted under the powers of this Act, and the term local authority in said provisions shall mean the corporation." With reference to the district fund the town clerk deposed that it consisted "of the income and profits accruing from the various undertakings of the corporation, the proceeds of the said district rate, contributions from the county authority and from the Government in respect of the maintenance of main roads, and the rent of a cottage the site of which, with other surplus lands, was acquired by the corporation under the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), for the purposes of their sanitary department or undertaking."

There was, however, no distinct evidence to show either that the cottage above referred to was in fact surplus land which ought to have been sold, or that there was in fact any surplus land belonging to the corporation.

Sections 236-239 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which, by section 58 of the Wakefield Waterworks Act, 1880, were expressly incorporated therewith, merely provided that mortgages under the Public Health Act, 1875, should be made by deed, and that a register of such mortgages and of all transfers thereof should be kept, and that a receiver of the rates liable to the payment of the mortgage moneys might be appointed under certain circumstances.

Section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (which section was not, however, expressly incorporated by the Wakefield Waterworks Act, 1880), enacts that "any lands acquired by a local authority in pursuance of any powers in this Act and not required for the purpose for which they were acquired shall . . . be sold . . . and the proceeds of such sale shall be applied towards the discharge, by means of a sinking fund or otherwise, of any principal moneys

* The Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, s. 92, in effect provides that the rents and profits of all hereditaments, and the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds of all moneys, dues, chattels, and valuable securities belonging to any corporate body shall be carried to the account of a fund to be called "The Borough Fund," and such fund, subject to the payment of any lawful debt due from such corporate body to any person contracted before the passing of the Act (September 9, 1835) and unredeemed, and saving all rights, interests, claims, or demands of all persons or bodies corporate in or upon real or personal estate of any body corporate by virtue of any proceedings either at law or in equity which have been already instituted, or which may hereafter be instituted, or by virtue of any mortgages or otherwise, shall be applied to various specified purposes, including the payment of the salaries of the mayor, recorder, and other officers, and in case the borough fund shall be more than sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, the surplus thereof shall be applied under the direction of the council for the public benefit of the inhabitants and the improvement of the borough.

borrowed by such authority on the security of the fund or rate applicable by them for the general purposes of this Act, or, if no such principal moneys are outstanding, shall be carried to the account of such fund or rate."

All the above-specified mortgages or bonds, and also bonds of the corporations of Batley, Keighley, and Leeds formed part of the estate of the testator, John Robert Thompson, who by his will gave large pecuniary legacies to various charitable institutions, which he directed should be paid exclusively out of such parts of his personal estate as might be legally bequeathed for charitable purposes.

Stirling, J., at the trial of the action, held that the bonds of all these corporations, with the exception of the Keighley bonds, constituted interests in land within the Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36), and, therefore, could not validly be bequeathed to charities.

The charitable legatees appealed, but their appeal was limited to the Dewsbury, the Bradford, and the Wakefield bonds, and the only questions raised were as to the effect of the charge on the "borough fund" in the case of Dewsbury and Bradford bonds, and the charge on the "district fund" in the case of the Wakefield bonds.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the appellants.—The Dewsbury and Bradford "borough funds" respectively exist by virtue of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, s. 92, and the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which provide that out of the fund certain payments mentioned in the 92nd section of the Act of 1835 have to be made, and when these payments are satisfied power is given to the corporation to apply the surplus, if any, for the benefit of the inhabitants of the borough. The bonds of these corporations are, therefore, not charges on the borough funds generally, but only on the balances after payment of the sums specified in the schedule, and that does not confer on the mortgagee any right to go upon the land or to take rents from the tenants. It is analogous to a charge upon a railway which gives to the mortgagee an interest in the net result, and does not give the mortgagee an interest in land under 9 Geo. 2, c. 36: Attree v. Hawe, 26 W. R. 871, 9 Ch. D. 337. The saving clause in section 92 of the Act of 1835 as to rights, interests, claims, or demands of any persons in or upon any real or personal estate of any body corporate by virtue of any proceedings at law or equity which have been already instituted, or which may hereafter be instituted, or by virtue of any mortgage or otherwise, applies only to rights existing at the time of the passing of the Act, and does not give a mortgagee, in the case of a mortgage created after the Act came into operation, any right against the land. The charge here is on the floating balance, not on the sources, of the fund: In re David, Buckley v. Royal National Lifeboat Institution, 38 W. R. 162, 43 Ch. D. 27, is therefore distinguishable. The Wakefield mortgages are charged upon the district fund under the Wakefield Corporation Act, 1880. That fund is not supplied by the rents and profits of land. Section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is not expressly incorporated in the Act of 1880, although other sections are, and therefore section 175 does not apply. Moreover, there is no evidence that any part of this district fund arises from the proceeds of sale of surplus lands. These mortgages, therefore, are not charges on any interest in land within 9 Geo. 2, c. 36.

Charles Browne, for the respondents, the residuary legatees under the will.—The Dewsbury and Bradford mortgages are charged on the borough fund—that is, they are charges upon that which constitutes the funds. And as this includes the rents of real and leasehold property the charges are interests in land within 9 Geo. 2, c. 36: Brook v. Badley, 16 W. R. 947, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 672. Marsh v. Attorney-General, 9 W. R. 179, 2 J. & H. 61, is disapproved in Brook v. Badley. The saving clause in section 92 of the Act of 1835 expressly preserves the rights of a mortgagee of the borough fund to enforce his security, and one of those rights would be a right against the land. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Arnold v. Mayor of Gravesend, 4 W. R. 478, 2 K. & J. 574, and Attorney-General v. Mayor of Newcastle, 23 Q. B. D. 492, 38 W. R. Dig. 139.] The Wakefield mortgages are charged upon the district fund. Section 209 of the Public Health Act, 1875, provides for the constitution of the district fund. Section 175 of that Act, although it is not expressly incorporated in the Wakefield Waterworks Act of 1880, would apply to these mortgages: it expressly requires that surplus lands of the corporation shall be sold, and the proceeds shall be applied towards the discharge of mortgages on the district fund. These mortgages are, therefore, charged on a fund partly constituted of the proceeds of sale of real estate, and are, therefore, interests in land within 9 Geo. 2, c. 36.

F. Hoare Colt, for the trustees of the will.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from Stirling, J., with regard to certain bonds of three municipal corporations which he has held to create an interest in land within the Act 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. I do not use expression "impure personalty" or "personalty savouring of realty," for what the Act speaks of is an interest or interests in land or a charge on an interest affecting land.

The Bradford bonds and the Dewsbury bonds really come within the same class, although one is a charge on the borough fund of the corporation under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), and the other on the borough fund under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50); that makes no practical difference, as the provisions of the two statutes as to the borough fund are substantially the same. Now, although the Dewsbury bonds and the Bradford bonds charge other things besides the borough fund, the respondents rely solely upon the fact that they charge the borough fund. They urge that the borough fund consists in part of rents arising from real estate, and that a mortgage of it is, therefore, an interest in, or a charge upon, land within the meaning of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. Now the borough fund, no doubt, does to a certain extent arise from rents of land, but what is to be done with them when they become part of the borough fund? In my opinion the Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 92, imposes a statutory duty upon those who administer the corporation funds to apply the borough fund for the purposes there mentioned, and although there is in that section a saving clause in favour of persons claiming under any mortgage, it is, in my opinion, only a saving of the rights of those who, at the time of the passing of the Act, had charges, with the rights existing under which, the Legislature did not think it just to interfere. A saving clause, as a general rule, is not intended to give power to a corporation or body to do something which they could not otherwise do, but to prevent the enactment from interfering with rights already acquired. On the true construction of these bonds, they do not, in my opinion, purport to charge the borough fund before the duties mentioned in section 92 are performed by the corporation. The objects of the Acts under which the corporations of Bradford and Dewsbury gave the bonds which are before us were to enable them to do what they otherwise could not do—viz., to charge beforehand that portion of the borough fund which, in each year, would, after satisfying the liabilities imposed by section 92, remain in their hands to be applied for the benefit of the inhabitants and the improvement of the borough. If a power were not given to charge that surplus beforehand, it might be said, and, as I think, correctly, that the corporation could not, until that surplus was ascertained, determine how it was to be applied for the benefit of the borough. The funds, then, being only charges on the surplus remaining in the hands of the corporation after they have satisfied the purposes pointed out in section 92, the case comes within the principle of Attree v. Hawe, and, in my opinion, these bonds do not give the holder any interest in land within the meaning of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. The case stands on precisely the same footing under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. This disposes of the Bradford and the Dewsbury bonds.

Then as to the bonds of the Wakefield Corporation. The only point laid hold of with regard to them is that they charge the district fund of the borough, and it is said that this makes a charge upon land or an interest in land within the meaning of the Act of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. What is relied upon principally, and it seemed to me at first sight to be a strong point in favour of the respondents, is section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which declares that the surplus lands—that is to say, lands that the corporation have acquired but do not require for the purposes of the Act—shall be sold and the money arising from the sale shall be applied towards discharging and paying off the money that has been borrowed on the security of the fund or rate applicable for the general purposes of the Act, or, if no principal moneys are outstanding, shall be carried to the account of such fund or rate—i.e., the district fund or the general district rates. There may be a grave question, which I do not think it is necessary to answer on the present occasion, whether, where an Act of Parliament directs land to be sold, any charge on the money arising from the sale of that land can ever enable the holder of the charge to take the land. Where no charge is given except upon the proceeds of sale of land which an Act of Parliament directs to be sold and converted into money, can that charge be a charge or interest in land within the meaning of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36? That point may hereafter have to be decided, but it lies on the respondents to show that this is an interest in land or a charge upon land. How can they show that? They must show that there is land which comes within the purview of section 175, and the proceeds of which are to be applied in payment of these bonds. It does not appear from the evidence that there is any surplus land unless the cottage is to be taken as such. The cottage now seems to be employed for the purposes of the corporation, and we cannot, in the absence of distinct evidence, hold that it is land which ought to have been sold and the proceeds brought into the district fund.

Another contention was raised by Mr. Cozens-Hardy, that section 175 is not incorporated with the special Act of the Wakefield Corporation. But a further question arises, upon which, as it has not been fully argued, I give no opinion, whether this is not a general section which, without being incorporated, would apply to all lands bought by the corporation and not required for its objects.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question with regard to all these bonds is the question which Cotton, L.J., has enunciated—viz., whether they constitute an interest in or charge on land within the statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. We may divide them into two classes. The Dewsbury and Bradford bonds and the Wakefield bonds. The Dewsbury bond was given under the authority of section 111 of the Dewsbury Waterworks Act, 1876, which authorizes the Dewsbury Corporation to create a collateral security on the borough fund. What does that enable them to do? The borough fund exists by virtue of section 92 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, and the character of the fund is shown by that section. It is a fund which may arise partly from rents—for if the corporation has real property producing rent, the rents are to be carried to that fund. Out of that fund certain payments specified by the section, and which are vital to the existence of the corporation, have to be satisfied, and the surplus is to be applied for the public benefit of the inhabitants and the improvement of the borough. Is it, then, intended by section 111 of the Dewsbury Waterworks Act of 1876 to enable the creditor who lends money upon the collateral security of the borough fund to get a charge upon the rents of the real property of the corporation before they pass into the fund and before the statutory purposes which are created by section 92 of the Municipal Corporations Act have been satisfied? It is, to my mind, impossible to suppose that such was the intention of the Legislature. All, therefore, that is charged by the bonds, and the only thing in which an interest is created by them, is the surplus which, from time to time, may exist or may not exist, and which exists only if the fund is more than sufficient for the statutory purposes which are made a primary charge upon it by the Municipal Corporations Act. The charge is not a charge upon the corporate property, but simply a charge upon a floating balance, such as was alluded to by Fry, L.J., at the end of his judgment in Buckley v. The Royal National Lifeboat Institution. It is the primary duty of the corporation to apply this fund in satisfying the ordinary municipal wants, and it is impossible, therefore, that a receiver could be appointed of the rents. That disposes of the Dewsbury and Bradford bonds.

The Wakefield bonds were given under section 58 of the Wakefield Waterworks Act, which enables the corporation to mortgage the district fund and incorporates, with regard to the mortgage of the district fund, the provisions contained in sections 236 to 239 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The district fund is fed by realty, because the proceeds of the sale of surplus land are to be paid into it. Whether by reason of this a charge on the district fund creates an interest in or a charge upon land may be open to doubt. It is not necessary to decide the point in the present case, and I reserve to myself the full right to consider, when the proper occasion arises, the question whether it is possible to treat as an interest in land a security which only affects a fund arising in part from the sale of land which the statute directs to be sold. That question does not arise unless section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is a section which we can treat as bearing on those mortgages. Mr. Cozens-Hardy says it is not incorporated with the Wakefield Waterworks Act. It is not incorporated in terms, but I, like Cotton, L.J., somewhat doubt whether it is not a general provision that would apply to these mortgages without express incorporation. But the respondents are met by another difficulty, section 175 can only be invoked by them if there is surplus land, and it seems to me that their case breaks down because there is no proof that there is any surplus land.

I will say nothing more except to mention that I entirely agree with Cotton, L.J., in holding that in the saving clause in section 92 the words, "by virtue of any mortgage," apply only to existing rights, and not to prospective ones. That point seems to me to have been decided by Wood, V.C., in the case of Arnold v. Mayor of Gravesend, and his view has been lately affirmed in Attorney-General v. Mayor of Newcastle.

I agree that the judgment below must be reversed as regards the four bonds before us.

FRY, L.J.—I also find myself unable to agree with the decision of the learned judge. The questions in controversy have been ranged around two funds, the one the borough fund of a municipal corporation, and the other a district fund created under the Public Health Act, 1875, and the question in each case is whether a charge on the fund is or is not an interest in land, or a charge upon an interest in land?

Now, with regard to the borough fund, I must express my doubt whether in any case a charge on a fund which gives no right to go on anything except the money when it has gone into the fund ever can be a charge upon real estate. It appears to me that money which comes from land in the form of rent, when it has been paid into a bank or otherwise been realized in the form of cash is pure personal property, and although a charge on that money, if it gives in addition a right of going upon the land, may be a charge on realty, I at least express a doubt whether a simple charge on the money when it has fallen into the fund ever can be an interest in realty. But it is not necessary to decide that point, for in the present case it appears to me that a charge on the borough fund of a municipal corporation is only a charge on the surplus balance of a fund arising, no doubt, partly out of the rents and profits of land and partly out of other sources, which from time to time remains after numerous payments have been made out of the fund. The balance of the fund after the application of part of it to prior charges is, in my opinion, pure personalty, and the person who is entitled to that and nothing more has no interest in the land.

Mr. Browne argued that the saving clause in section 92 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, which saves the rights of all persons and bodies corporate in or upon any real or personal estate of any body corporate by virtue of any proceeding instituted before or after the passing of the Act, "or by virtue of any mortgage or otherwise," gave to the mortgagees, whose titles were created subsequently to the Act, a right against the fund in priority to the purposes mentioned in the section. But it is to be observed that, according to the ordinary functions of a saving clause, it saves existing rights, and it is not an enabling clause, and does not authorize the creation of new rights. Now the right which Mr. Browne argued for is a right subsequently created. I think, therefore, that that clause has no application to the present case.

The considerations with regard to the district fund are to a great extent the same as those which apply to the borough fund, but there are two points of difference. In the first place, the district fund itself is not fed by rents and profits of land. So far it is less favourable to the argument on behalf of the respondents, but, on the other hand, there is a section which requires great attention—viz., the 175th section of the Public Health Act of 1875—because that directs that surplus lands shall be sold and the proceeds applied towards the discharge, by means of a sinking fund or otherwise, of any principal moneys that may be borrowed upon the security of the fund or rent. I shall not enter upon the construction of that section, on which many questions may arise, because it does not appear to me from the evidence that the Wakefield Corporation has any surplus land. I, therefore, shall not enter upon an inquiry whether a mortgagee might, if any surplus land existed, obtain by mandamus or otherwise a sale of such land, or whether, if he had such a right, that would create an interest in land. I leave those questions for further discussion if they should ever arise.

COTTON, L.J.—I think we ought to mention that the ground upon which we have decided this appeal does not seem to have been taken in the court below, and the attention of the learned judge was not directed to it.

Bill of sale—Form in schedule—Principal payable by unequal instalments—Interest on unpaid instalments—Rate of interest—Alleged ambiguity—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 9.

A bill of sale dated March 6, 1889, was granted to secure the repayment of a sum of £30, with interest thereon at the rate of sixty per cent. per annum. The grantor thereby agreed to pay the said principal sum by the following instalments:—i.e., "the sum of £5 on the 9th of March, 1889, the sum of £2 on the 6th of April, 1889, and the sum of £2 on the 6th day of every succeeding month until the 6th of February, 1890, and the balance of the said principal sum on the 6th of March, 1890; and on the said 6th day of March, 1890, to also pay the interest which shall have accrued at the rate aforesaid upon the said principal sum, and, in case default shall be made in payment of any of the said instalments of the principal sum, the same shall until payment continue to bear interest at the rate aforesaid."

Held, on the authority of Goldstrom v. Tallerman, 35 W. R. 68, 18 Q. B. D. 1, that the bill of sale was in accordance with the statutory form contained in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Lord Esher, M.R.) reversed.

Appeal from a divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Lord Esher, M.R.).

By a bill of sale dated March 6, 1889, H. T. Haslewood and his wife, the present plaintiffs, assigned to the defendant company the chattels specifically described in the schedule thereto by way of security for the repayment of a sum of £30 with interest thereon at the rate of sixty per cent. per annum; and the grantors thereby agreed to pay to the grantee, "the principal sum aforesaid by the instalments following, that is to say, the sum of £5 on the 9th day of March instant, the sum of £2 on the 6th day of April, 1889, and the sum of £2 on the 6th day of every succeeding month until the 6th day of February, 1890, and the balance of the said principal sum on the 6th day of March, 1890, and will on the said 6th day of March, 1890, also pay the interest which shall have accrued at the rate aforesaid upon the said principal sum, and in case default shall be made in payment of any of the said instalments of the principal sum, the same shall until payment continue to bear interest at the rate aforesaid."

On June 15, 1889, an instalment being then in arrear, the defendant company put in a distress on the plaintiffs' premises, and the plaintiffs on June 25 brought an action for trespass in the Mayor's Court against the defendant company on the ground that the bill of sale was void as not being in accordance with the statutory form. The Recorder held the bill of sale to be valid, and nonsuited the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs applied to the Divisional Court to set aside the nonsuit and order a new trial. There was also an application to the Divisional Court by the defendant company with respect to another bill of sale granted to them in the same form, but which had been held bad by a county court judge.

The following judgments were delivered by the Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Lord Esher, M.R.).

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—It appears to me that the fair and reasonable and obvious construction of this bill of sale is, that no interest will be payable on the instalments at the time that they are paid, but that the whole interest upon the whole sum advanced is payable in a lump on the payment of the last instalment of the balance, at a particular time, and on that day the whole of the interest which has accrued during the whole of the year upon the whole of the sum advanced is to be paid.

I do not say these are the words; but I say this is the fair and reasonable construction of the words, "the interest which shall have accrued at the rate aforesaid on the said principal sum." If that is the fair and reasonable construction, it follows at once that upon considerable portions of the £30 a great deal more than sixty per cent. would have to be paid, or at least would have been agreed to be paid, because, assuming that the instalments had been kept up and that the principal sum has been gradually reduced, it is manifest that interest on the whole sum at the rate of sixty per cent., although a great deal of it has been paid off during the year, would have to be paid at the end of the time.

Now that appears to me to be the meaning, and the obvious meaning of that provision. I do not deny, and I never meant, early in the argument, to deny, that it is possible to construe the words in the way in which Mr. Reed suggested they may be construed—viz., payment at the rate of sixty per cent. upon the principal sum, that is to say, upon so much of the principal sum as is then due, and sixty per cent. upon the rest of the sum that has been due to be diminished pro rata by taking off the sixty per cent from the time of payment upon each instalment that has been paid during the period that has elapsed.

It is possible so to construe the words, but I do not think it is their plain and obvious meaning. Therefore, on that ground, it appears to me that the bill of sale is bad. There is a matter which my learned brother has pointed out, and which I am very far from differing from him about, but which does not appear to me to be quite so clear as the point I have already adverted to. It occurs upon a later portion of the same provision, "and in case default shall be made in payment of any of the said instalments of the principal sum" (that is, of £30, the principal sum advanced), "the same shall until payment continue to bear interest at the rate aforesaid." That is to say, as a penalty for any instalments not being paid at the time stipulated between the parties, the whole sum shall continue to bear interest at the rate aforesaid—namely, at sixty per cent. The same consequence follows from that clause that followed from the clause with which I have dealt, that there would be a stipulation that the whole of the sum advanced should bear interest at sixty per cent. The total sum might have been reduced from time to time by the payment of instalments, although those instalments might not have been paid at the particular times stipulated for between the parties. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the true view is that "the same shall until payment" means the principal sum shall until payment; but here again I do not deny that it is open, and that it is possible to construe "the same" to mean the instalments. Although I quite admit it might be possible so to construe it, some of the consequences, though not all, would still follow; that is, such instalments as were in default for however short a time, at any rate would continue to bear interest as if they had not been paid at all. I think, therefore, on the true construction of this bill of sale in both respects, it is void as contradicting in substance the true intention of the form given in the statute, and that the grantees must fail.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The sole question in this case is, whether the bill of sale is void or not, on the ground that it has departed beyond the departure which is allowed from the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act. Now, there is a form given in the schedule, and certain things are allowed to be varied, by those parts of the form which are in italics and within brackets. The Court of Appeal has come to the conclusion that the Act of Parliament did not mean that bills of sale are to be word for word according to the form, and that if they omitted some few words which would not alter the effect at all, that would not make the bill of sale void. What they said, I believe, was this, that, if there is a variance from the form, that is from the words, but that the variance leaves the bill of sale in question to have the same legal effect as the form in the schedule; that, then, although there is a variance from the words, that is not an effective variance.

Now we have, subject to that rule, to see whether this bill is of the same legal effect as the form in the schedule, for that it differs from the form in the schedule cannot be denied. The schedule is that they will "duly pay to the said C. D. the principal sum aforesaid"—that is, the principal sum lent, "together with interest then due by equal payments" on particular days, and the only variation allowed (in brackets) is, "or whatever else be the stipulated time or times of payment." Now this bill of sale does not say "duly pay to the say C. D. the principal sum aforesaid, together with interest then due, by equal payments." Although the payments should be unequal, it would lead to the same effect as equal payments, and it seems, therefore, to me that, if the only objection to this bill of sale had been that the interest was payable on the very last day, that would not have been a defect sufficient to render it void. We must look, then, at the clause as to interest. There is the sum of £30 lent, and that is to be paid by instalments, and then it goes on, "and will on the said last day of June next also pay the interest which shall have accrued at the rate aforesaid upon the said principal sum."

Now, according to this bill of sale, no interest at all is payable until the last day. How shall we get at the interest which shall have accrued? The words are "pay the interest which shall have accrued at the rate aforesaid" (that is, at sixty per cent. per annum) "upon the said principal sum." What is "the said principal sum" there? Is it true to say "which shall have accrued upon the said principal sum" means that it is to be (if the instalments are paid at the days named) sixty per cent. for two days on the first sum, and sixty per cent. for a month and two days on the second sum, or more afterwards if it is not paid on that day, and so on? or is it that, although no interest is payable until the last day, yet that interest on the whole principal sum goes on accruing until bad. Then it is said that the clause which stipulates for sixty per cent. upon the instalment is obscurely worded. It is, "and will pay the interest which shall have accrued at the rate aforesaid upon the said principal sum," that is obviously enough the £30, "and in case default shall be made in payment of any of the said instalments of the said principal sum, the same shall, until payment, continue to bear interest at the rate aforesaid." Now, it is said that that is capable of this construction, that you shall pay sixty per cent. upon the whole £30, even if you make default in paying only one instalment. It turns on the meaning of the word "same" as applicable to the £30. The "same," to my mind, is referable to the antecedent "instalments of the principal sum." Any other construction is at variance with the principle which underlies all transactions of borrowing money. Then we must notice this, that this bill of sale, unfortunately I think, has not stated on the face of it what the total amount of interest is which will become payable assuming the instalments are duly paid. It is capable of easy calculation, and I think Mr. Candy told us it came to £8 10s. 9d. It would be very much better if that sum were put in, because that would get rid of all possible doubt. But it is not put in. Is that a defect or such a defect as will render this bill of sale bad? That point again is covered by authority. It is covered by In re Cleaver, which goes to show that a bill of sale is not void as not being in accordance with the form because the actnal amount of interest which will become payable according to the contract is not expressed in figures, but is left to calculation. No doubt it would be far better if it were put in. Now I come to the last difficulty, which is that the Divisional Court has said that this bill of sale is, to say the least of it, obscure, and it can—and one of the members of the court said that in its opinion it did—properly bear a different construction. That is what has created a difficulty in our minds. How is that got over? That difficulty has had to be faced before now. That was precisely one of the difficulties met in Goldstrom v. Tallerman. In that case the Divisional Court construed the bill of sale as possibly open to this construction—that it made the interest payable upon some arrears of interest. One of the judges, I think, thought it did mean that. The other judge thought that, if it did not mean that, at all events it was so worded that it might mean it. That was precisely the position of affairs. How did the Court of Appeal deal with that? They said: "We think the Divisional Court was erroneous in that respect, that it is not reasonably open to that construction," and they did not hesitate to say so. So here I think it is our bounden duty to say that we think the construction put on this bill of sale by the Divisional Court is erroneous, and, having regard to the case which I have referred to, and which seems to me to cover every doubtful point, to hold that this bill of sale is valid, and the appeal ought to be allowed, with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I put the same construction that Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ., do upon this bill of sale, and I confess that, but for the judgments of judges like the Lord Chief Justice of England and the Master of the Rolls, I should have come to the conclusion that that was the true and clear construction of the document without much hesitation; but the truth is, it seems to me, that the court below took the view they did because they did not consider Goldstrom v. Tallerman. I believe that Goldstrom v. Tallerman was not cited to them, and I believe that, if it had been cited to them, it would in the first place have put an end to one of the difficulties; and, in the second place, it would have led them to the true path of construction of this document. I attribute, accordingly, the variance of our judgment pronounced to-day from the view taken below by the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls to the fact that we have had Goldstrom v. Tallerman before us, which they had not. I do not mean to say that I do not rely on my own view; but I think it was the absence of a reference to that case in the court below that led the court on what I venture to call a wrong line. It seems to me that, once we have that case and follow out all the logic that that case contributes to the subject, we must come to the conclusion, not only that the court below are wrong, but that it is our duty to cure the interpretation which they have put upon this deed by allowing this appeal.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. WOODALL. (a.)

Practice—Third-party procedure—Originating summons—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 16, rr. 48, 55; ord. 55, rr. 3—8.

The rules regulating third-party procedure are in terms inapplicable to proceedings by originating summons, and the form of procedure under an originating summons is inconsistent with the issue of a third-party notice. Accordingly a defendant to an originating summons is not entitled to serve third-party notices.

The question for decision was whether procedure by third-party notice, under rules 48 and 55 of order 16, is applicable to proceedings under order 55 by originating summons.

The originating summons was taken out by the Attorney-General for an account of certain charitable funds settled by a deed dated in 1852, the four trustees of which were all dead. The first defendant was W. O. Woodall, who was the executor of the last survivor of the four deceased trustees, and two other defendants were the two executors of Henry Fowler, another of the four deceased trustees.

W. O. Woodall obtained an order under rule 48 of order 16 giving him liberty to serve a third-party notice upon the beneficiaries under the will of Henry Fowler with a copy of the originating summons, claiming to be entitled to contribution from such beneficiaries, which service was duly effected.

W. O. Woodall also served a notice under rule 55 of order 16 on his co-defendants, the two executors of Henry Fowler, claiming contribution from them.

This was a motion by the beneficiaries under the will of Henry Fowler and his two executors who had been served with the third-party notice to set aside the order giving liberty to serve the third-party notice on the beneficiaries, and to set aside the services on the beneficiaries and on the two executors, on the ground of irregularity.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the motion.—Rule 48 of order 16, under which rule the order for service of the third-party notice on the beneficiaries was made, is inapplicable in terms to proceedings by originating summons; and a third-party notice is inapplicable to proceedings by originating summons. The order and the service of the third-party notices are accordingly irregular, and there is no distinction for the purposes of this motion between the two cases.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Haldane, Q.C., for W. O. Woodall.—Rule 48 of order 16 is not to be regarded as inapplicable to an originating summons, because of the mention of the words "statement of defence," "writ," and "statement of claim" therein. Third-party notices are not inconsistent with procedure by originating summons. We do not seek to distinguish between the case of the beneficiaries and of the executors.

They referred to In re Fawsitt, Galland v. Burton, 34 W. R. 26, 30 Ch. D. 231; Annual Practice, 1889-90, p. 66.

NORTH, J.—I think that this application must succeed, because of the terms of rule 48 of order 16. The directions given by that rule point to proceedings in an action following the usual course of procedure. A proceeding commenced by originating summons is an action, but it is not an action in which a defence has to be delivered, the having to do which is referred to in rule 48 as being essential. The rule provides that the notice shall, unless otherwise ordered, be served "within the time limited for delivering his defence." That points to the form of procedure in an action commenced by writ of summons, and the words at the end of the rule are, "if there be no statement of claim, then a copy of the writ of summons in the action." The words are, "the writ of summons," and there is no reference to an originating summons.

But the principal ground of my decision is outside the terms of that rule. I do not think that the form of procedure to be observed under an originating summons is of a character to fall in with the bringing in of a third party by notice. The form of procedure is, I think, inconsistent with so doing. Thus, rule 3 of order 55, which declares the nature of the relief to be obtained on originating summons, in the first place defines the classes of persons who "may take out, as of course, an originating summons returnable in the chambers of a judge of the Chancery Division," and then it defines the nature of the relief that may be obtained. The 4th rule of order 55 extends rule 3 to administration; and rule 5 declares what persons are to be served with the summons in the first instance in the several cases where an originating summons may be taken out. Rule 6 provides that the court or a judge may direct such other persons to be served with an originating summons as they or he may think fit. Rule 7 provides for such evidence in support of the application as the court or a judge may require, and for the giving of directions for the trial of questions arising thereout. Rule 8 provides that the court or a judge may pronounce such judgment as the nature of the case may require. I do not think the proceedings contemplated by those rules include the issue of a third-party notice. Under these circumstances I think the applicants are right, and I allow the motion, with costs.

Motion allowed.

Company—Winding up—Wrongful forfeiture of shares—Claim to prove for damages—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 38, sub-section 7.

A shareholder, whose shares had been irregularly forfeited, claimed to prove in the winding up of the company for damages for the loss of his rights as a member.

Held, that section 38, sub-section 7, of the Companies Act, 1862, did not apply to preclude the shareholder from proving in competition with the other creditors, as this sum was not due to him "in his character of a member," but rather in his character of a non-member; and his claim must be admitted by the liquidator.

Whether sub-section 7 of section 38 applies to a past member, quære.

James Cant having claimed to prove against the assets of the New Chile Gold Mining Co. (Limited), in its winding up, for the sum of £1,650 for damages for the wrongful forfeiture by the company of 6,000 shares belonging to him, the liquidator rejected his claim, and a summons was taken out by James Cant asking that he might be at liberty to enforce it. James Cant died in July, 1889, but the proceedings were continued by his widow and administratrix.

The company was incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, and the following were included among its articles of association:—

"(29) If any member fails to pay any call on or before the day appointed for payment thereof, the board may, at any time thereafter during such time as the call remains unpaid, serve a notice on him to pay such call, together with interest and any expenses that have accrued by reason of such non-payment, and stating that in the event of non-payment on some day and at some place (either the office of the company or a bank) named in such notice, the share will be liable to be forfeited.

"(30) If the requisitions of any notice as aforesaid are not complied with, any shares in respect of which such notice has been given may, at any time thereafter, be forfeited, by a resolution of the board to that effect, and the holder thereof shall thereupon cease to have any interest therein, and his name may be removed from the register as such holder.

"(31) Any member whose shares shall be so forfeited shall, notwithstanding the forfeiture, be liable to pay to the company all calls owing upon the shares at the time of the forfeiture, and the interest (if any) thereon.

be in damages only, and the register shall be conclusive evidence of title to a share as against any person claiming as a former holder of a share which the board shall have purported to forfeit, cancel, or dispose of under the regulations of the company."

Calls were made upon the shares of James Cant at various times from December, 1884, to June, 1886; the last call being made upon the 18th of June, 1886, and becoming payable on the 31st of July, 1886. It was admitted that the call was not paid, and on the 24th of August, 1886, the shares were forfeited in pursuance of a resolution of the board. On the 28th of December they were, with the exception of three (which could not be traced), allotted to thirteen members of the company.

The shares were issued at 2s. each, and it appeared that they were at the date of the forfeiture of the value of 7s. 6d. each; it also appeared that the sum due by James Cant after the call made on the 18th of June, 1886, and which was not paid, had been deducted before making the claim of £1,650 for damages. On the 25th of June, 1888, the winding up of the company was ordered, and on the 12th of February, 1889, James Cant took out this summons.

There was no evidence to show that a proper notice had been sent to James Cant as required by the 29th article of association.

H. C. Deane, for the widow and administratrix of James Cant.—No notice having been given under the 29th article, the forfeiture of the shares was absolutely invalid, and the applicant should have leave to prove in the liquidation. For any irregularity in any forfeiture of shares the remedy is, under the 36th article, in damages only. The administratrix desires to have leave to prove for this claim in the winding up in competition with the other creditors: In re Dale and Plant (Limited), 38 W. R. 409, 43 Ch. D. 255.

A. J. Chitty, for the liquidator.—The case of In re Dale and Plant (Limited) was quite different from the present. There was no forfeiture of the shares, or, if there was, it must be held to have been good for all purposes: Wood v. Wood, 22 W. R. 709, L. R. 9 Ex. 190. This case does not come within sub-section 7 of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1862,* and the administratrix has no right to prove in the liquidation. [He referred to Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, 28 W. R. 677, 5 App. Cas. 317—325; In re Hull and County Bank, Burgess's case, 28 W. R. 792, 15 Ch. D. 507; Fry v. Moore, 37 W. D. 681.] The administratrix's claim for damages can, if at all, only be considered when the rights of the contributories as amongst themselves are being adjusted; and then only for the value of the shares as at the date of their sale by the company, and not as at the date of the alleged forfeiture.

The cases of In re London Celluloid Co., 36 W. R. 673, 39 Ch. D. 190; In re North Hallenbeagle Mining Co., Knight's case, 15 W. R. 294, L. R. 2 Ch. 321; In re The Phosphate of Lime Co. (Limited), Austen's case, 24 L. T. N. S. 932, 19 W. R. Ch. Dig. 54; In re Addlestone Linoleum Co., 36 W. R. 227, 37 Ch. D. 191; In re Anglo-Romano Water Co., Wright's case, 18 W. R. 777, L. R. 5 Ch. 437; and Hope v. International Financial Society, 25 W. R. 203, 4 Ch. D. 327, were also referred to.

H. C. Deane, in reply.—If the forfeiture was irregular in any particular it was wholly invalid; and the administratrix is entitled to damages as for the value of the shares at the date of the forfeiture. [STIRLING, J.—The logical result of this application is that the administratrix ought to be put on the list of contributories. I will give her an opportunity to consider the matter and to say by this day week whether she does desire to be put on the list or not; and I will reserve my judgment till after that day.]

Aug. 2.—STIRLING, J.—This is an application on the part of James Cant and his administratrix (he having died since the summons was taken out) to be allowed to prove in the liquidation of the assets of the company in respect of a claim which arose out of his shares, which were, as he alleged, irregularly forfeited. [His lordship then referred to the articles set out above, and, after stating the facts, continued:—] In the evidence before me there was nothing to show that proper notice was sent to the applicant, pursuant to the requirements of the 29th article of association, and on that account it was contended that the forfeiture was not only irregular, but wholly invalid, and that the provisions of the 36th article were not applicable. If that argument were well founded the logical consequence would seem to be that the present holders of the shares ought to be removed from the list of contributories, and the applicant's name be restored to the register. I offered to give to both the applicant and the liquidator an opportunity of taking steps for that purpose, but neither of them has thought fit to avail himself of that offer, and consequently I must treat the shares as having been forfeited in accordance with the articles, and I must hold that an irregularity has taken place in respect of which the applicant is entitled to prove for damages under the 36th article.

But then it was said that the company is insolvent, and it was contended that the applicant is precluded by the provisions of section 38, sub-section 7, of the Companies Act, 1862, from proving in respect of his claim in competition with the other creditors of the company. [His lordship then read the section, and continued:—] I need not allude to the first six of the qualifications to the section, except to point out that they relate to the contributions of past members. But sub-section 7 provides:—[his lordship read it, and continued:—] In order, therefore, that that sub-section may be applicable, the sum sought to be proved must not only be due to a member of the company, but due to him in his character of a member "by way of dividend, profits, or otherwise."

First of all, then, I have to consider whether the applicant is a member of the company within the meaning of sub-section 7, and I confess that, having repeatedly considered the question whether a past member is to be treated as a member for the purposes of that sub-section, it appears to me to be one of very considerable difficulty. I do not, however, think it is necessary on the present occasion to express a concluded opinion as to the meaning of the sub-section,

* Section 38, with sub-section 7:—"In the event of a company formed under this Act being wound up every present and past member of such company shall be liable to contribute to the assets of the company to an amount sufficient for payment of the debts and liabilities of the company, and the costs, charges, and expenses of the winding up, and for the payment of such sums as may be required for the adjustment of the contributories amongst themselves with the qualifications following (that is to say)—(7) No sum due to any member of a company in his character of a member by way of dividends, profits, or otherwise shall be deemed to be a debt of the company payable to such member in a case of competition between himself and any other creditor not being a member of the company, but any such sum may be taken into account for the purposes of the final adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves."

but, having regard to the last words of it—"but any such sum may be taken into account for the purposes of the final adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves"—it would seem to mean that the sum which is sought to be proved must be such as is in its nature susceptible of being taken into account for the purpose of the final adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves; and it is difficult to see how that can be done where the person who claims is not a past member, liable to be made a contributory of the company; for in the present case the applicant ceased to be a member more than a year before the date of the winding up, and consequently there would be a difficulty in holding that sub-section 7 applied to him.

I do not, however, decide the case on that ground, because I have come to the conclusion that, even supposing the applicant to be a past member within the meaning of that sub-section, the sum in question was not due to him in his character of a member, but, as it appears to me, was, on the contrary, due to him in his character of a non-member. What he claims is not any sum payable to a member, but damages payable to him by reason of his having been deprived of the rights of a member by an irregular act on the part of the company in respect of which the contract, which contains the articles of association, entitles him to damages.

I am therefore of opinion that this claim is admissible, and must be admitted by the liquidator. The costs of the applicant must be added to his claim, and the liquidator will take his costs out of the estate.

BAIRD v. WELLS. (a.)

Club—Proprietary club—Member—Expulsion—Injunction.

Where the members of a club have a right of property in the club, any member who is improperly expelled can obtain relief by injunction. In the case of a proprietary club where the members have no right of property in the club, but have merely a licence in consideration of a certain payment to use the club, in accordance with certain rules, the remedy of a member improperly expelled is damages for breach of contract, but he cannot obtain relief by injunction.

Motion.

The plaintiff was a member of the Pelican Club, which was established in 1887 as a proprietary club. The original rules provided that general meetings for the election of a committee should be held in October or November in each year; that fourteen days' clear notice should be given to the members; that the committee should consist of not more than twenty-one members; that the proprietor should be an ex-officio member, but not qualified to vote; that special meetings might be called; that members should be elected by the committee; that the subscription should be fixed from time to time; and that the rules should be printed and binding upon the members. The 7th rule was that "resolutions to be proposed at special or ordinary meetings shall be given notice of, in writing, a clear week previous to the meeting," and the 17th was that "any member whose conduct in or out of the club shall be unbecoming a gentleman in the opinion of the committee, or with respect to whom any matter may have transpired which might be calculated to render his continued membership of the club injurious to its character or interests, shall, if the committee, on inquiry, find the same to be substantiated, be requested to resign; and in the case of his non-compliance he shall be subject to expulsion."

The first general meeting was held on the 29th of October, 1887. No general meeting was held in 1888, but on the 6th of December in that year, the committee then being reduced to twelve, nine persons were appointed to fill up the vacancies. A general meeting for the purpose of considering certain proposed new rules was held on the 2nd of April, 1889, but the notice convening it did not state the matters which were to be taken into consideration, as required by the 7th rule.

At the meeting it was resolved "that the election of the present committee be confirmed; that the elections and work of the committee be confirmed," and the rules were read and amended, and finally confirmed. The new rules provided for an increase in the size of the committee, and an alteration in the mode of election; and the former 7th rule was entirely omitted.

On the 23rd of December, 1889, a prize fight took place at which the plaintiff was present. Unseemly proceedings occurred, in which it was alleged that an official of the club was implicated. In the course of an investigation by the committee into the conduct of that official charges were made against the plaintiff of having hired roughs and used violent language. In consequence of these charges the plaintiff was summoned to attend before the committee on the 7th of January, 1890. The plaintiff in reply addressed a letter to the committee which he handed to the secretary on the 7th of January. The letter was as follows:—

"My Lord and Gentlemen,—I attend at your request before you to-day in order to answer any question that you may put to me touching my conduct in connection with the late fight between Slavin and Smith. I point out to you the great loss and damage that would accrue to me, socially and otherwise, if an adverse decision is arrived at upon a hasty and partial investigation; and I request that before arriving at any such decision I may be supplied with an accurate statement of the complaint that you make against me, that I may examine into the same with a view of ascertaining the true facts and placing them before you. I may add, that I have not, either directly or indirectly, done anything that necessitates an inquiry into my conduct."

The plaintiff was examined before the committee, which acquitted him on the charge of hiring roughs, and resolved that his language, although unbecoming that of a gentleman and a member of the club, and consequently deserving of regret, was not such as, in their judgment, to call for the application of the 17th rule.

On the 8th of January, 1890, the general meeting of the club was held. The Marquis of Queensberry then moved:—"That the examination into Mr. Baird's conduct should be reopened and continued by the committee from the point it left off." An amendment was proposed:—"That the conduct of Mr. Baird be referred back to the committee for further consideration, and that they be instructed to report to a general meeting to be convened one month from this date." The amendment was carried, after discussion. The chairman stated that the committee had resolved to resign in a body, and that a general meeting would be held in a fortnight's time to elect a "better lot." The report of the proceedings did not state that the meeting was adjourned, but notices of an adjourned meeting were posted up and sent to the members. The further or adjourned meeting was held on the 22nd of January, and it was then proposed, and carried unanimously, that the committee be invited to return to office en bloc. The committee then proceeded to deal with the plaintiff's case, and at a meeting on the 29th of January it was resolved, "That in view of the report made by the committee to the general meeting, and of the vote of the members thereon, Mr. G. Baird be requested to resign his membership of the club in conformity with rule 17"; and on the 10th of February the committee resolved that the plaintiff should be expelled from the club. The plaintiff thereupon commenced the present action against the proprietor and secretary of the committee of the club, to restrain them from interfering with his use and enjoyment of the club as a member thereof, and he now moved for an interim injunction.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Ernest De Witt, for the plaintiff, contended that a committee who expelled a member from a club were bound to show that they had carried out the rules and had acted in accordance with the ordinary principles of justice: Fisher v. Keane, 11 Ch. D. 353, 27 W. R. Dig. 32; Labouchere v. Earl of Wharncliffe, 28 W. R. 367, 13 Ch. D. 346; that the committee in the present case were not legally constituted, and had not proceeded with due formalities, and their action was, therefore, ultrâ vires; and that the plaintiff was accordingly entitled to the relief sought.

Hastings, Q.C., and Levett, for the defendants.—An injunction can only be granted upon the ground that some right of property possessed by the member had been infringed. The Pelican being a proprietary club, the plaintiff had no right of property in it; he had merely a license to use the premises: In re St. James's Club, 2 De G. M. & G. 383—387; Hopkinson v. Marquis of Exeter, 16 W. R. 266, L. R. 5 Eq. 63—66; Rigby v. Connol, 28 W. R. 650, 14 Ch. D. 482; Lyttelton v. Blackburne, 45 L. J. Ch. 219—223, 24 W. R. Dig. 49; Millican v. Sulivan, 4 Times L. R. 203; and Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 M. & W. 838. Even, however, assuming that the court had jurisdiction to grant an injunction in this case, the decision of the committee, which, even if not duly elected, was a de facto committee, and before whom the plaintiff had had a fair trial, could not be overruled.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., in reply, referred to Tayler v. Waters, 7 Taunt. 374; Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, 8 App. Cas. 467.

March 7.—STIRLING, J.—This is a motion to restrain the defendants from excluding the plaintiff from the use and enjoyment of the Pelican Club, of which the plaintiff was threatened to be deprived in consequence of a decision of the committee of the club. In cases similar to the present the court, as has been repeatedly held, does not undertake to act as a court of appeal from the decisions of the committees of clubs: Fisher v. Keane; Labouchere v. Earl of Wharncliffe; Dawkins v. Antrobus, 29 W. R. 511, 17 Ch. D. 615. The only questions which this court can entertain are, first, whether the rules of the club have been observed; secondly, whether anything has been done contrary to natural justice; and, thirdly, whether the decision complained of has been come to bonâ fide. I propose to inquire into these matters in the first place, reserving for consideration hereafter a further question—viz., whether the decisions to which I have referred apply to a club constituted as the present is. [His lordship, having referred to the rules and the evidence, continued:—] What was done on the 6th of December, 1888, and also the proceedings of the 2nd of April, 1889, were entirely irregular. If the election of the committee was to be confirmed and new rules were to be adopted proper and distinct notice should have been given to the members. No such notice was given, and consequently the proceedings were not binding on the members who were not present. Those proceedings took place in April, 1889, and the transactions complained of were in January, 1890. Were the acts of the meeting of the 2nd of April, 1889, assented to by the plaintiff or other members of the club in the interval—a considerable interview—between the two dates? It was admitted by the secretary on cross-examination that copies of the new rules were not sent to the members, and there is no evidence that the plaintiff knew what had been done, or assented to be bound by the new rules or by the acts of the committee so elected. I come now to the transactions which gave rise to the present proceedings. [His lordship stated them, and continued:—] The plaintiff has filed no affidavit upon this motion, and his counsel do not now seriously complain of the proceedings at the meeting of January 7, 1890. I think it may fairly be inferred from the account given by the secretary, in the absence of any other evidence, that the committee were justified in concluding that the plaintiff was not prepared to dispute the substantial accuracy of the accounts given to them as to the language made use of by him, and I also think that if the committee had there and then resolved that the plaintiff had rendered himself liable to the penalty imposed by the 17th rule, I could not have held that such a decision was other than bonâ fide in the sense in which those words are used in the cases on this subject. The committee, however, did not come to that conclusion. [His lordship then read the finding and resolution of the committee, and proceeded:—] I understand that the committee acquitted the plaintiff as to the charge of hiring "roughs," and that they held that his language, although unbecoming that of a gentleman and a member of the club, and consequently deserving of regret, was not such as, in their judgment, to call for the application of the 17th rule, and to justify them in excluding him from the club. [His lordship then referred to what took place on the 8th of January, 1890, and continued:—] I think that the meaning was that a new trial should take place. There was great confusion at the meeting, and the report is not clear as to what occurred, but according to the final paragraph the chairman stated, after the amendment had been carried, that the committee had resolved to resign in a body, and that a general meeting would be called in a fortnight's time to elect a "better lot." There was no formal adjournment of the meeting, but a notice of an adjourned meeting to be held on the 22nd of January, 1890, was posted at the club and sent to every member. On the 22nd of January a meeting was held, and at it the Marquis of Queensberry rose and expressed his regret that his resolution at the last general meeting should have come into conflict with his brother committeemen. He proposed to make a statement with regard to Mr. Baird. It was then proposed that the election of a committee should be proceeded with, and a member proposed that the old committee should be invited to return to office en bloc, and that proposition was carried unanimously. It was that committee which proceeded to deal further with the case. If the proceeding on the 22nd of January was a new election it was irregular. The notice did not specify the object of the meeting, and it was not sent at a sufficiently early date—fourteen days' clear notice according to the rule was not given; for although the notice was posted at the club on the same day, the circular to the members was not issued until the 11th of January, 1890. It was said, however, that the proceeding amounted merely to non-acceptance of resignation. There are difficulties as to that view, because at that meeting, according to the new rules, five members were to retire; however, I treat it in that way. Still, the committee remained that which was elected on the 2nd of April, 1889, and, as I hold, irregularly elected. Was the decision binding on the plaintiff? All the cases lay down that the rules must be observed. It was held in the case of Labouchere v. Earl of Wharncliffe that the decision of a meeting of which proper notice was not given according to the rules was not binding on the plaintiff, although he appeared before it without protest. That being so, it seems to me that the present plaintiff cannot be bound by the decision of an irregularly elected committee. The rules of the club as to the election of a committee are certainly of not less importance than those which relate to the length of notice to be given of a general meeting, and I hold on the evidence now before me that the plaintiff had no knowledge of and did not waive the irregularity. Subsequently, at a meeting of the committee held on the 29th of January, 1890, the Marquis of Queensberry, who had taken a prominent part at the meeting on the 8th of January, read a statement, of which his lordship's notes have been put in evidence on behalf of the plaintiff. He urged that the committee should inquire further into matters which had been mentioned prior to the 7th of January, but were not referred to on that day, on which alone the plaintiff attended the committee. If that course, which seems to have been that intended by the general meeting, was to be taken, the committee were, in my opinion, bound to call the plaintiff before them and give him an opportunity of answering the matter thus for the first time brought forward. The Marquis of Queensberry said, however, and I accept his statement, that the committee refused to do what he wished in that respect. What was done appears only in the minutes, and according to them it was resolved, "That in view of the report made by the committee to the general meeting, and of the vote of the members thereon, Mr. G. Baird be requested to resign his membership of the club in conformity with rule 17." It thus appears that the same committee which on the 7th of January came to the conclusion—and as I assume bonâ fide—that the offence of which the plaintiff was guilty did not call for expulsion from the club, determined on the 29th of the same month, without taking any further evidence, and without hearing the plaintiff, that the penalty imposed by rule 17 ought to be put in force against him.

No member of the committee has made any affidavit explaining the grounds on which that conclusion was arrived at, and in the absence of such evidence I am not satisfied that the resolution of the 29th of January represents the fair and unbiassed judgment of the committee. The Marquis of Queensberry, who on the 8th of January is reported to have stated that he was entirely satisfied with the result of the committee's inquiry, appears to have urged upon the committee that, even if the plaintiff did not hire the roughs who were present at the fight, he so acted as to render himself responsible for their conduct. That view of the plaintiff's conduct was not dealt with in the report of the committee; it does not seem to have presented itself to that body on the 7th of January, and if it did not present itself to the committee it was hardly likely to occur to the mind of the plaintiff. It is true that one question put to the plaintiff, according to the evidence of the secretary, seems to show that some attention was directed in that way; but, notwithstanding that, upon the materials before me, I think that that charge was not so formulated or so prominently brought forward on the 7th of January that it ought to be made the ground of the decision of the committee unless the plaintiff had an opportunity of meeting it. The resolution of the 29th of January may be susceptible of another meaning. It is quite consistent with the terms of it that some members of the committee, or even the majority of them, may have adhered to their original opinion, but thought that they were bound to give effect to the personal feeling of the members of the club as expressed in the vote of the following day. In my judgment they could not be justified in so doing. The question was one for the decision of the committee who had heard the evidence, and not for a general meeting of the members who, as opposed to the committee, had not; and though the committee might take advice on the matter before them they were bound to form and act on their own opinion. I do not forget that a further resolution was passed on the 10th of February, 1890. That was done under legal advice; and to that resolution, in the state of the evidence before me, I cannot attach any weight. In truth, however, it appears to be consistent with the prior resolution, and to be open to the same objections. I am, therefore, of opinion, first, that the decision complained of was not that of a committee duly elected according to the rules of the club, and, secondly, that it is open to serious question whether the resolution of the 29th of January can be regarded as representing the unbiassed judgment of the committee after fairly hearing the plaintiff.

The question then arises whether this case falls within the class of cases in which the court grants relief by way of injunction. In all the cases of this nature in which up to the prsent time an injunction has been granted the club has been one of the ordinary kind—i.e., it has been possessed of property (such as a freehold or a leasehold house, furniture, books, pictures, and money at a bank) which was vested in trustees upon trust to permit the members for the time being to have the personal use and enjoyment of the club-house and effects in and about it. But the interest of the members is not confined to that purely personal right. The members might, if they all agreed, put an end to the club, and in that case they would be entitled, after the debts and liabilities of the club were satisfied, to have the assets divided among them. In the present case the club, as such, has no property. The club-house and furniture belong to the defendant Wells, and by him the subscriptions are taken. He is not a trustee, but the owner of the property. If the club were dissolved at any moment there would be nothing whatever to divide among the members. Now the interference of the court in the cases which have hitherto occurred has been based on the rights of property of which the member had been improperly deprived.

The general principle was laid down by Lord Cranworth in the case of Forbes v. Eden, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 568, where he said, "Save for the due disposal and administration of property there is no authority in the courts of either England or Scotland to take cognizance of the rules of a voluntary society entered into merely for the regulation of its own affairs." And the same principle was stated at greater length by the late Master of Rolls in the case of Rigby v. Connol. In that case the plaintiff sought to restrain the defendants from excluding him from the benefits of a trades union of which he was a member. Sir George Jessel said, "The first question that I will consider is, what is the jurisdiction of a court of equity as regards interfering at the instance of a member of a society to prevent his being improperly expelled therefrom. I have no doubt whatever that the foundation of the jurisdiction is the right of property vested in the member of the society, and of which he is unjustly deprived by such unlawful expulsion. There is no such jurisdiction that I am aware of reposed in this country, at least in any of the Queen's courts, to decide upon the rights of persons to associate together when the association possesses no property. I cannot imagine that any court of justice could interfere with such an association if some of the members declined to associate with some of the others. That is to say, the courts as such have never dreamt of enforcing agreements strictly personal in their nature; in such cases no court of justice can interfere so long as there is no property the right to which is taken away by the person complaining. If that is the foundation of the jurisdiction, the plaintiff, if he can succeed at all, must succeed on the ground that some right of property to which he is entitled has been taken away from him. That this is the foundation of the interference of the courts as regards clubs I think is quite clear." Then his lordship referred to certain cases, and came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief.

Here, as I have pointed out, there are no funds vested in trustees or settled to be disposed of by the members of the Pelican Club in accordance with the rules of that association, and the question is whether the plaintiff, as a member of that club, has any right of property for the protection of which the court will interfere by way of injunction, and in my judgment he has not. The position appears to me to be this: Each member is entitled by contract with the defendant Wells to have the personal use and enjoyment of the club in common with the other members so long as he pays his subscription, and is not excluded from the club under rule 17. That right is, as it seems to me, of a personal nature such as, if infringed, may give rise to a claim for damages, but not such as the court will enforce by way of specific performance or injunction. The contract in its legal nature closely resembles contracts for providing board and lodging in a particular house, as when the head of a household admits a boarder into his family for a fixed period, or the proprietor of a private boarding-house agrees to provide for a term board and lodging for one boarder in common with others; as to which Wright v. Stavert, 8 W. R. 413, 2 E. & E. 721, may be referred to. The contracts in these cases fall, in my opinion, under the head of agreements strictly personal in their nature, and, consequently, in neither of them would the court interfere by way of injunction at the instance of the boarder. So, also, in my judgment, is it in the present case. It was contended that damages might be an insufficient remedy by reason of a decision being given which affects the character and position in society of the plaintiff, and does not satisfy the requirements of the law. In no case, so far as I am aware, has the existence of such circumstances been treated as affording ground for the granting of an injunction to restrain the proceedings of a voluntary society, and, indeed, upon the principle laid down in the case of Forbes v. Eden, it might well happen that decisions which gravely affect some members of a voluntary society and do not satisfy the requirements of the law, might be arrived at by the committee or other like body without being open to be questioned in any civil court or giving rise to any right of action whatever. Under these circumstances I make no order on the motion.

The plaintiff appealed against this decision, and the appeal came on on the 23rd of April. It was then stated by his counsel that as the judgment of Stirling, J., had been in his favour as regarded the irregularity of the defendants' proceedings, the plaintiff did not desire to continue in the club, and would consent to the appeal being dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed accordingly.

Probate—English will disposing of property in this country—Executors—Swiss independent will—Swiss law—Administration by State—Objections to incorporation—Form of grant.

A testator possessed of property in this country and in Switzerland made a will according to the English law disposing of his property here only, and by it declared that it was to take effect concurrently with, and independently of, a prior will dealing with his Swiss property only. On the application of the executors of the English will for probate of it only, it was proved that, if the Swiss will were incorporated in the probate, the executors would have no power to deal with the Swiss property, there being no executors appointed under the Swiss law, and if they attempted to deal with it they might come into conflict with the officers of the Swiss courts whose duty it would be to administer the Swiss estate.

The court granted probate to the executors of the English will only upon their filing a certified copy of the Swiss will in the registry, and directed a note to be made on the English probate that such copy had been so filed.

In the Goods of Astor, 24 W. R. 539, 1 P. D. 150, followed and explained.

Motion for a grant of probate of the English will of Augustin Charles Granet de la Rue, deceased, to the executors without incorporating a Swiss will made by the same testator.

The testator died on March 29, 1890, at Meggen, in Switzerland, possessed of property in Great Britain, Switzerland, and Italy. On August 14, 1889, he made a will according to the English law disposing of his property in this country. The will declared that it was for the purpose only of disposing of his estate, real and personal, situate in Great Britain and Ireland, and that it was to take effect concurrently with and independently of another will made by the testator on July 6, 1889, relating to his property in Switzerland and Italy only.

July 8.—Deane, in support of the motion.—The application is identical with that made in In the Goods of Astor, 24 W. R. 539, 1 P. D. 150, and the proposal is to follow the decision in that case by filing a certified copy of the Swiss will in the registry and adding a note to the English probate that such copy has been so filed.

HANNEN, P.—I am afraid of giving rise to complications which one is unable to foresee with regard to this method of dealing with testamentary papers. In the case of the late Mr. Astor I was influenced by the enormously bulky will. In this case that element is not present. It is obviously of importance to anyone interested in the estate to see the whole of the testamentary documents.

If this will be not a long document, as I understand it is not, I should like to know what practical objection there is to incorporating it.

Deane.—If the executors take probate here of the (a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Swiss will, they will be amenable to the Swiss courts and yet not able to interfere with the estate comprised in the Swiss will, as there are no executors under the Swiss law.

HANNEN, P.—Let that be proved by affidavit and I will make the same order as in In the Goods of Astor.

July 15.—Deane produced an affidavit of a Swiss advocate and legal adviser to the Swiss consulate stating that if this court were to grant probate of the two wills to the executors of the English will, such executors would by the law of Switzerland, have no power to interfere with the goods of the testator within the jurisdiction of the Swiss courts, and if the executors attempted to deal with such goods with the object of carrying out the provisions of the Swiss will, they might come into conflict with the officers of the Swiss court whose duty it is to administer the estate of the testator dealt with by the Swiss will.

HANNEN, P.—I make a similar order to that in In the Goods of Astor, granting probate of the English will alone to the executors upon their filing in the registry a certified copy of the Swiss will, and a note will be added to the probate that such copy has been so filed.

Local government — Vestry — Election of vestryman— Qualification—Occupation of club premises as secretary —Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 6.

The qualification of a candidate for the office of a vestryman was that he was rated in respect of the house in which he resided at £19 per annum, and that he was rated jointly with another person in respect of the premises of a certain club, of which he was secretary, at £55 per annum. The qualification required for the particular parish under section 6 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, was the being rated upon a rental exceeding £25 per annum in respect of the occupation of premises within the parish.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, ante, p. 8), that, since he was not in occupation of the club, his qualification was insufficient.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Pollock, B., and Grantham, J.) reported ante, p. 8, where the facts are fully stated.

At an election of vestrymen for the parish of Bermondsey Soutter was a successful candidate. A rule nisi was obtained against him in the nature of a quo warranto, on the ground that he was not properly qualified under section 6 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, which requires that the vestry shall consist of persons rated or assessed to the relief of the poor upon a rental of not less than (in this particular parish) £25 per annum, and provides that no person shall be capable of acting or being elected as one of such vestry unless he be the occupier of a house, lands, tenements, or hereditaments in such parish, and be rated or assessed as aforesaid upon such rental as aforesaid. It further provided that a joint occupation and a joint rating of premises should be sufficient to qualify if the amount of the rental, when divided by the number of joint occupiers, would give the requisite sum.

It appeared that Soutter was rated at £19 per annum in respect of the house in which he resided, and that he also was rated jointly with one other person in respect of the premises of a certain club of which he was secretary, and which were of the rateable value of £55 per annum. The Divisional Court held that he was not rated in respect of the club premises so as to bring up his qualification to the amount required, and made the rule for a quo warranto absolute.

Mr. Soutter appealed.

Cluer, for the appellant.

Lynden Bell, for the respondent.

The arguments used and the cases cited were the same as in the court below.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think we must decide this case on the assumption that Soutter was jointly rated in respect of the club premises. But he did not occupy those premises, and then comes in the decision of my brother Lopes in Mogg v. Clark, 15 Q. B. D. 82, 33 W. R. Dig. 136, with which I entirely agree, which says that in order to be qualified under this section a person must not only be rated for, but also be the occupier of, the property. A man may, of course, occupy more than one set of premises in a parish by his servants or others, and he may add together the rateable value of those premises in order to make up his qualification. But the plain intention of the Legislature was that in order to qualify himself he must occupy the premises for which he is rated. Therefore, although our judgment may be not quite on the same ground as that of the Divisional Court, I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the true construction of the section was that given by Lopes, L.J., in Mogg v. Clark.

LOPES, L.J.—I decided this point in 1885, and coming again to the consideration of the point without any predilections on the subject I think that the decision in Mogg v. Clark, which case was upheld in the Court of Appeal on another point (34 W. R. 66, 16 Q. B. D. 79), was right.

Conflict of laws—Power of attorney—Construction.

Where an authority is given in a foreign country to an agent to transact business for his principal in other countries, it must be construed, in the absence of any evidence of a contrary intention, according to the law of the place where the business is to be transacted.

Appeal from the decision of Day, J.

On May 17, 1880, M. Chatenay, who resided and carried on business in Brazil, executed and recorded in Brazil in the Portuguese language a notarial act (which was in substance a power of attorney) which gave power to P. Broë, of London, on behalf of M. Chatenay, of Rio, "to purchase and sell shares in public companies and public funds . . . in conformity with his letters of credit and following his letters of orders and particular advices, which, if necessary, shall be considered as part hereof." Without receiving any specific order from Chatenay, Broë disposed of fifty shares which Chatenay held in the Brazilian Submarine Telegraph Co. (Limited). Upon discovering this Chatenay applied under the Companies Acts for an order restoring his name to the register of the company as owner of the shares. The matter came before a divisional court, who directed an issue as to whether the construction of the document was to be according to Brazilian or English law. This came on to be tried before Day, J., who certified that it must be construed according to English law.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The company appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., Graham, and Calvert, for the appellants.—According to the Brazilian law this notarial act gives Broë an unlimited power to deal with all shares independently of any letters of advice. The document, being executed in Brazil and in the language of the country, must be construed according to the law of that country. It is not an authority to be executed only in England, but in all countries.

They cited Jacobs v. Credit Lyonnais, 32 W. R. 761, 12 Q. B. D. 589; Maspons y Hermano v. Mildred, 30 W. R. 862, 9 Q. B. D. 530; Lloyd v. Guibert, L. R. 1 Q. B. 115; Duchess di Sora v. Phillips, 10 H. L. Cas. 624, 11 W. R. H. L. Dig. 6.

H. D. Greene, Q.C., and Alexander Young, for the respondent.—According to English law this is only a limited authority dependent on the letters of credit. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—We have not to decide that now. We have only to say which law is applicable to the construction of the document.] That point has never been exactly decided: Story's Conflict of Laws, 7th ed., s. 286, p. 337; but Day, J., adopted the view there expressed, that it must be construed, in the absence of counter proofs, as intended to be executed according to the law of the place where the business is to be transacted.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case a person residing and carrying on business in Brazil wrote in the language of that country what he intended to be an authority to an agent to act for him. We have now to discover exactly what his intention was at the time he wrote it, and the question is how that is to be ascertained. The authority being given in Brazil, and in the Portuguese language, the intention of the parties is to be ascertained by evidence of competent translators and experts, including, if necessary, Brazilian lawyers, as to the meaning of the language used. If, according to such evidence, the intention of the parties appears to be that the authority should be acted upon in foreign countries, it follows that the extent of the authority in any country in which the authority is to be acted upon is to be taken to be according to the law of the particular country where it is acted on The authority must first be translated, and must be given its equivalent in English business language. Then the court, having got the exact language, has to construe it. The business sense of all business men is that if a contract is to be carried out in a particular country it must, unless a contrary intention is expressed, be subject to the law of that particular country. In the present case, therefore, if this authority is to be carried out in England, and in so far as it is to be carried out in England it is subject to English law. This seems to me a mere expansion of the judgment of Day, J., and therefore I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a certificate by Day, J., to the effect that the construction of this document was governed by English law. The construction of a power of attorney includes two things: first, the actual meaning of the words used, and, secondly, their legal effect. The meaning of the words is in all cases a question of fact; their legal effect is, of course, a question of law. In this case, the document being in Portuguese, we must have recourse to translators and experts in order to ascertain the exact meaning of the words used—to get a correct translation. That being done, it appears that this is a power to buy and sell shares in all countries. Therefore, when it is to be executed in England, it must be executed according to English law. It appears to me that this is the meaning of Day, J.'s order, when it is properly understood, and I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

NORTHAMPTON (MARQUIS OF) v. POLLOCK. (a.)

Mortgage — Redemption — Attempt to fetter equity of redemption—Policy of insurance.

C. charged a reversionary interest in real estate, to which he was entitled contingently on his surviving N., with the repayment, with interest thereon, of a sum of £10,000 advanced to C. by the trustees of an insurance society, and also with the repayment of the premiums of a policy for £34,500, which, in pursuance of the contract between C. and the trustees, was effected by the trustees on the life of C. as against that of N.

The contract also contained stipulations that, in the event of C. not having paid to the trustees the whole of the sums due by him before the death of N., the policy should belong absolutely to the trustees; that, in the event of C. paying the trustees before the death of N. the whole of the sums due to them, the trustees should forthwith assign the policy to C.; and that, in the event of C. predeceasing N. without having paid all principal moneys, interest, and costs due to the trustees, the policy should belong absolutely to them.

C. died in the lifetime of N. without having paid anything to the trustees, and C.'s legal personal representative now claimed to be entitled to redeem the policy.

The premiums on the policy had been paid by the trustees.

Held by the Court of Appeal (Bowen, L.J., dissenting), that the contract as regards the policy was part of one whole mortgage transaction; that the stipulations which provided that, in certain events, the policy should belong absolutely to the trustees were invalid, as clogging the equity of redemption, and, therefore, that C.'s representative was entitled to redeem the policy.

Decision of North, J. (38 W. R. 346), affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of North, J. (reported 38 W. R. 346.)

On the 26th of May, 1879, Earl Compton (since deceased) executed a bond in the form of a Scotch mortgage, whereby he became bound to repay to the defendant Pollock and the other trustees of the National Life Assurance Society a sum of £10,000 advanced to him by them, and also to pay the premiums on a policy of £34,500 to be effected by the defendants, and to be payable in the event of Earl Compton predeceasing his father, the Marquis of Northampton. The Scotch estates to which the earl was entitled in remainder were by this instrument charged with the repayment of the sum advanced and the premiums.

By an agreement of even date with the said bond (May 26, 1879), and made between the defendants (therein referred to as the first party thereto) and Earl Compton (therein referred to as the second party thereto) it was (inter alia) provided as follows:—

"1. The first party shall effect a policy or policies of assurance on the life of the second party as against that of the said most noble marquis, his father, to the extent of £34,500, with such assurance company as they may select, and on such terms as by them shall be deemed advisable.

"2. The interest payable on the said advance of £10,000, and the premiums payable on the said policy or policies of assurance, shall be allowed to accumulate for a period of five years, that is to say, till the term of Whitsunday, 1884, and compound interest with half-yearly rests at the rate of 5½ per cent. per annum shall be charged thereon.

"3. On the expiry of the said period of five years, it shall be in the power of the first party, in the event of the said advance of £10,000, premiums of assurance, interest, and others accummulated as aforesaid, not having been paid to them by the second party as aforesaid, forthwith to exercise their full powers and privileges conferred on them hereunder or under the said land and disposition in security, and in the event of their not exercising their powers and privileges, they may continue to pay the said premiums and interest as before provided, and the principal sum, premiums, interest, and others, may be allowed to accumulate as aforesaid, and that so long as the said first party may think proper to do so, and the first party shall be entitled to use all diligence against the person or estate of the second party for payment of the interest or premiums paid by them after the expiry of the period of the said five years, and that without prejudice to the powers and privileges in regard to any sum due by the second party or otherwise. And a statement certified by the first party shall be sufficient evidence of the amount due by the second party as at the date of said certified statement.

"4. In the event of the second party not having paid to the first party the whole sum due by him to them before the death of the said most noble marquis his father, then the policy or policies of assurance effected by the first party as aforesaid shall belong absolutely to the first party, and neither the second party nor his representatives shall have any claim or right thereunder in any manner of way, and the first party shall be entitled to exercise their full powers and privileges under the said bond and disposition in security as if no such policy or policies had been effected.

"5. In the event of the second party paying the first party before the death of the most noble marquis his father the whole sums due to them, the first party shall be bound forthwith to assign the said policy or policies of assurance to the second party, but that always at his own expense.

"6. In the event of the second party predeceasing his father without having paid to the first party the whole of the sums due to them, the first party shall prepare a certified statement of the amount due to them as at the date of the death of the second party, and they shall be bound to impute to the amount the whole sums of money they may receive in respect of the policy, and in the event of the said sums so received exceeding the amount due under the said statement, to account for and pay over the excess to the representatives of the second party. And in the event of the sums so received being inadequate to meet the amount brought out in the said statement, then the first party shall have full right to exercise the powers conferred on them under the said bond to recover from the estate of the second party the balance due."

A subsequent agreement, dated June 6, 1879, was entered into between the same parties, which, after reciting that the sixth clause of the former agreement did not accurately state the terms on which the £10,000 was advanced, and reciting that the agreement was that in the event of Earl Compton predeceasing his father without having repaid the principal moneys, interest, and costs due to the defendants, the said policy and the sums assured thereby should belong absolutely to the defendants, provided as follows: That in the event of Earl Compton predeceasing his father without having paid all principal moneys, interest, and costs due to the defendants under the said bond and disposition in security, then and in such case the said policy and all moneys thereby secured should belong absolutely to the defendands.

The £10,000 was accordingly advanced by the defendants to Earl Compton, and the defendants effected a policy of assurance in their own office on the life of Earl Compton against that of the Marquis of Northampton for the sum of £34,500.

The premiums were paid by the defendants by means of writing up the debt of the borrower in the books of the insurance society.

Earl Compton died on the 5th of September, 1887, intestate, in the lifetime of his father, without having paid to the defendants any part of the sum of £10,000 and without having paid any interest thereon, or any premiums on the policy of assurance.

The Marquis of Northampton, as administrator of Earl Compton, brought this action claiming a declaration that the defendants were only entitled to the policy of assurance and the sum or sums assured thereby as a security for the sum of £10,000 with interest thereon at the rate of 5½ per cent. per annum, and for the amount of the premiums on the said policy paid by them, with interest thereon at the rate aforesaid. And the plaintiff offered to pay to the defendants any sum that might be found due to them, after deducting any sums received by them.

The plaintiff, in his reply, further raised as a point of law that the agreement of the 14th of June, 1879, so far as it purported to vary the minute of agreement recited in it, or to limit the right of redemption in the said policy to the lifetime of Earl Compton was not valid in law, and did not bind the plaintiff.

By an order, dated the 4th of July, 1889, it was ordered that the point of law raised by the reply should be tried before the court, prior to the hearing of the merits of the case.

North, J., held that the whole transaction was a mortgage transaction, and that the plaintiff was entitled to redeem the policy notwithstanding the express stipulation that in the events which had happened the same should belong to the defendants (see the report 38 W. R. 346).

The defendants appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Rigby, Q.C., and E. Beaumont, for the appellants.—The only question is whether the agreement of June 14, 1879, is invalid on the ground of its being an attempt to fetter an equity of redemption. The policy never was property belonging to the mortgagor, Earl Compton; it was created solely for the purposes of this special agreement, and the rights of the parties with respect to the policy must be governed by that agreement: Potter v. Edwards, 5 W. R. 407; Mainland v. Upjohn, 37 W. R. 411, 41 Ch. D. 126; the cases as to "once a mortgage always a mortgage" do not apply. The cases as to policies which were the property of the mortgagor, such as Goodman v. Grierson, 2 Ball & Bea. 274; Scottish Union Insurance Co. v. Queensberry, 1 Bell App. Cas. 183, have no application to the present case. In cases where the payment of the premiums has been thrown on the mortgagor, the courts no doubt have held that the inference to be drawn was that the policy was the mortgagor's property: Drysdale v. Piggott, 4 W. R. 773, 8 De G. M. & G. 546; Freme v. Brade, 6 W. R. 739, 2 De G. & J. 582; but such inference cannot be drawn when there is an express stipulation to the contrary, as there is here. The policy in this case was not taken out by Earl Compton, but by the defendants, and the policy "owes its being" to the special agreement, and it is only under the agreement that Earl Compton's representatives could have any claim at all to the policy.

Howard v. Harris, 1 Vern. 33, and Bonham v. Newcomb, 1 Vern. 232, were also referred to.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Reginald Winslow, for the plaintiff.—The fact of the making of the subsequent agreement of June 14 shows that the policy was not originally considered to be the property of the defendants. The creation of the policy was part of the mortgage transaction. The policy was redeemable by Earl Compton at any time during his life, and only ceased to be redeemable by his death in his father's lifetime. The ownership of the policy must be determined by the liability for payment of the premiums: Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Society, 35 W. R. 143, 34 Ch. D. 234; Leslie v. French, 31 W. R. 561, 23 Ch. D. 560. Potter v. Edwards only decides that a bargain may be made giving a mortgagee a bonus on his advance, not that the right of redemption can be done away with. No stipulation can render a mortgage irredeemable: Courtenay v. Wright, 9 W. R. 153, 2 Gif. 337; Toomes v. Conset, 3 Atk. 261; Jennings v. Ward, 2 Vern. 520; Spurgeon v. Collier, 1 Eden. 55; Broad v. Selfe, 11 W. R. 1036; and James v. Kerr, 37 W. R. 279, 40 Ch. D. 449. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Protector Endowment Loan Co. v. Grice, 28 W. R. 427, 5 Q. B. D. 592]. The debt is not extinguished, and cannot be regarded as extinguished without nullifying at least two clauses in the agreement. The cases of Scottish Union Insurance Co. v. Queensberry; Knox v. Turner, 18 W. R. 873, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 515; Gottlieb v. Cranch, 4 De G. M. & G. 440; and Bruce v. Garden, 18 W. R. 384, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 32, which were relied on by the defendants, are cases of conditional purchase, in which the relation of debtor and creditor did not subsist from the first, and they are not applicable to the present case.

They referred also to Holland v. Smith, 6 Esp. 11; Morland v. Isaacs, 3 W. R. 397, 20 Beav. 389; Williams v. Owen, 5 My. & Cr. 303; and Wallingford v. Mutual Society, 29 W. R. 81, 5 App. Cas. 685.

Rigby, Q.C., in reply.—Though the bond was in the form of a Scotch mortgage, yet in fact it was only to operate as such if Earl Compton became the owner in possession of the Scotch heritable property, but if Earl Compton died before his father, it was to become null and void; I contend, therefore, that at the time the agreement was entered into there was no existing effective mortgage. The policy was in reality a wager on one life against another life. The policy at the time of its creation was of uncertain value, which could only be determined by subsequent events. It was not like a policy steadily increasing in value by the payment of premiums. The agreement of June, 1879, did not altogether do away with clause six of the original agreement, it only modified that clause to a certain extent—viz., by providing that the excess of the policy moneys were to belong to the trustees absolutely; but still the trustees remained liable to render an account and to impute in that account the whole of the sums received by them in respect of the policy, as provided for in clause six of the original agreement.

COTTON, L.J., after stating the facts and referring to the bond and the agreement of May 26, 1879, continued:—Then the defendants (who are called "the first party" in that agreement) covenant to effect a policy or policies of insurance to the extent of £34,500 on the life of Earl Compton (who is called the second party) as against his father—i.e., if the earl died in the lifetime of his father the sum secured by the policy would have to be paid.

The money payable under that policy is the sum now in contest between the parties. The premiums and the interest for the first five years were to be allowed to accumulate, and after that time the defendants were to be entitled to use all diligence to recover payment against the person or estate of the earl of the interest or premiums paid by them. The suspension of their claims for premiums and interest during that time in no way prevents them suing afterwards; it was in no way a release of the covenant to pay. [The Lord Justice then read the 4th clause of the agreement, and proceeded:—] That is a curious provision, for if the earl's father died in the earl's lifetime, then there would be no force at all in the policy, because it was to be paid if the earl died in his father's lifetime. [The Lord Justice then read the 5th clause of the agreement, and continued:—] That, so far as it goes, is clear. But some difficulty is raised by the subsidiary agreement of June 14, 1879. As to this, I think we ought to take the subsidiary agreement as entirely substituted for the former agreement. The agreement of June 14, 1879, recites the 6th clause of the previous agreement, and then it goes on as follows: "and whereas such last mentioned clause does not accurately state the terms upon which the said advance of £10,000 was agreed to be made, it having been agreed that the policy or policies to be effected upon the life of the said Earl Compton against that of his father, the Marquis of Northampton, and in the event of his death before his father without having repaid all the principal moneys, interest, and costs then due" to the defendants "the said policy or policies and the sums thereby assured should belong absolutely to" the defendants: "Now these presents witness that in consideration of the said advance being made to the said Earl Compton it is hereby agreed and declared by and between the parties hereto that in the event of the said Earl Compton predeceasing his father, the Marquis of Northampton, without having paid all principal moneys, interests, and costs to" the defendants "under or by virtue of the bond in the said recited agreement mentioned, that then and in such case the policy or policies and all moneys thereby secured shall belong absolutely to" the defendants "or the survivor or survivors of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, their or his assigns. And it is further agreed that in consideration of the premises, the said Earl Compton shall, whenever called upon so to do, execute any further or other assurance for the purpose of carrying out at his own expense this agreement."

Those were the instruments of agreement between the parties, and what do they mean, having regard to the last clause in the later agreement?

This is not the case of a policy being effected by the lender simply for his own security, but it is a policy effected under a contract with the borrower—the borrower contracting that he will pay the premiums, or that, if he does not, he shall be liable to be sued for them. Although this policy was effected in the office of the defendants, we must, in my opinion, consider it as if it were a policy effected by them in another office. They might if they pleased have effected the policy either in their own or in any other office. Quite independently of the later agreement, and without reference to the clause in the first agreement bearing on this point, what would have been the rights of the parties if that had been done? The earl or his representatives would have been entitled when the money was paid to say, "account to me for that and pay over to me any balance there may be beyond the sum which I borrowed from you." That is clearly laid down in Drysdale v. Piggott. The present case is different from a case where there is no contract between the parties, but where the lender chooses himself to insure the borrower's life. There he does that simply for his own benefit, and he can whenever he likes drop the policy or renew it when he likes, but he does that simply as being his own property and for his own benefit. But in the present case, unless effect is given to that last agreement between the parties (and, of course, there is no question as to what is the effect of it) the earl's representatives would have been entitled to get the balance of this sum of £34,500, which was much more than enough to pay the money lent and the premiums paid on the policy, and would be entitled to call on the defendants to account for it. But it is said that that is altered by that last clause. It is hardly necessary to quote authorities to show that courts of equity never will allow the equity of redemption to be cut off, except by lapse of time or by the order of the court. The mortgagor must be foreclosed if he does not redeem. Lord Hardwicke says that in plain terms in Toomes v. Conset: "This court will not suffer, in a deed of mortgage, any agreement in it to prevail that the estate shall become an absolute purchase in the mortgagee in any event whatsoever." He gives some reasons for that, which may not now be the only reasons, but that is the principle of courts of equity.

How is the present case to be distinguished from that? It is said that this is not like the case of a mortgage of property of the borrower; that it is not the property of Earl Compton, and that it is not a case of preventing him redeeming that which was his own. But is that so? As I pointed out, but for this last clause he would be entitled to an interest in the policy. He had such an interest in it, that, although the legal estate was in those who lent the money, yet he could call on those who had got the policy money to account and to pay over to him any residue.

Mr. Rigby said that the subsidiary agreement (which I last read) does not contain the whole of the 6th clause of the original agreement, and he contends that the true construction of it is, that the only change that is effected is that the policy moneys—or the balance of the policy moneys—shall belong to the insurance office, and not to Earl Compton's representatives. I cannot agree with that contention; and if that is not so, then this difficulty arises, that the defendants could take the whole of the money and also exercise their rights under their bond if any part of this sum of £10,000 or any part of the premiums are not paid, because the agreement is to be without any prejudice to the securities which they already have—the security of the bond.

That of course was rather startling, so it was said that the defendants never would or could sue if only a small sum still remained due and owing. It was also said that the earl would have every reason to get back the policy and to pay off the money, which he could do during the lifetime of his father, and then put an end to the whole matter. But the question is what are the rights of the parties purported to be given by this deed? As I understand it, the later agreement really contains the whole of the agreement between the parties as regard the policy moneys in the events which have happened.

Although it is true that in the original agreement there was an express clause that the balance of the policy moneys should belong to the earl and that he should be liable to be sued in the event of the policy moneys not being sufficient, yet there is nothing to confine the right to sue to the event—which has not happened—of the policy moneys being insufficient. As it is, the policy moneys are amply sufficient to pay all, and the contention of the defendants must be that they are not bound to account for the policy moneys to the earl or his representatives; and furthermore, as the agreement expressly stipulates it is to be without prejudice to the rights of the defendants under the bond, that they can sue the earl—for that must be the consequence of their contention, although they do not say so. They have lost the security of the real estate, but the bond still remains, a good security against the personal estate and effects of the earl, and that which his personal representatives may have from him. But the principle of the courts of equity is not to allow the equity of redemption to be clogged. The whole basis of a mortgage is that the estate is, in law, the absolute property of the mortgagee, yet the courts of equity have always treated it as being intended and being only as security for the money advanced, and have held that whenever the mortgagor offers to pay the principal, interest, and costs, then the mortgagee must reconvey the estate which by law is absolute in him and which by express bargain between the parties has become absolute when the equity of redemption arises.

Although this is not property which formerly belonged to the earl, yet by the effect of the contract and the way in which the premiums were applied, it did belong to the estate of the earl, and in my opinion it ought in equity to be regarded merely as a security for the money, and we ought not to allow any stipulation which would enable the defendants to take the policy moneys without being liable to pay the balance of them to the earl. In my opinion, therefore, this clause cannot be allowed to interfere with what would otherwise be the rights of the parties.

It is quite true that in cases where the policy is effected by the mortgagee, then it belongs to him. But in the present case, from the way in which this policy was created, I am of opinion that the mortgagor had as much interest in it as if it had been a policy originally belonging to him; by the terms of its creation the earl had an interest in it—i.e., he had the right to get the surplus of it after paying all the moneys which he had borrowed.

One of the cases cited by Mr. Rigby (Potter v. Edwards) was a case where there was an agreement that, although a smaller sum was advanced, the mortgage should only be redeemable on payment of a sum of £1,000. But in that case the court nevertheless treated it as a security, and the question whether £1,000 was a reasonable sum to be paid when only £700 had been advanced was a mere question as to whether there had or had not been a hard and unfair bargain on the borrower; but when that question was decided in to be extinguished, and in case the question were to arise I think the court would so have held.

In conclusion, I have found no case that is in point. The present problem is not governed by authority. My view is that, as regards this policy, the transaction was not one of mortgage, but of a wagering and speculative bargain to replace a mortgage which, in the event that has happened, would have been defunct, a bargain in which it was clearly intended and expressly agreed that the policy in the contingency that has occurred never was to become Lord Compton's. The rule of equity applied by North, J., does not, therefore, in my opinion, become appropriate. My brothers, however, think differently, and as their knowledge and experience are better than mine, I see no reason to be dissatisfied that I am in a minority, and that their view prevails.

Bankruptcy—Undue preference—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28, sub-section 3 (f); s. 48.

Where a bankrupt has, within three months preceding the receiving order, given an undue preference to any of his creditors, the court may punish him by refusing or suspending an order for his discharge under section 28, sub-sections 2 and 3 (f), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, though he has not been guilty of a fraudulent preference within the meaning of section 48.

A debtor, on whose premises there were three mortgages, having been served with three writs in separate actions brought by the three mortgagees to recover their mortgage debts, handed the two writs issued by the second and third mortgagees to the solicitors of the first mortgagee, who thereupon entered appearances for him to those two writs, and signed judgment by default in the action by the first mortgagee.

Held, that such conduct on the part of the debtor was an undue preference within section 28, sub-section 3 (f).

Appeal by the bankrupt from an order of Mr. Registrar Linklater suspending the bankrupt's discharge for two and a half years.

The debtor, who was a licensed victualler, mortgaged his premises to the Lion Brewery Co., and subsequently executed two further mortgages in favour of other persons. The Lion Brewery Co. commenced an action against the debtor on his covenant to repay the debt due to them on their mortgage, and served him with the writ of summons. Two days after this service he was served with writs in similar actions commenced by the second and third mortgagees. He took these two writs to the solicitors of the Lion Brewery Co., and asked them to do what was necessary for him. They entered an appearance on his behalf to each of these writs, but no appearance was entered to the writ issued by the Lion Brewery Co., who thereupon obtained judgment by default. The third mortgagee also obtained judgment under order 14, and the sheriff took possession of the debtor's goods under writs of fi. fa. issued by the Lion Brewery Co. and the third mortgagee. A petition in bankruptcy having been presented against the debtor by the third mortgagee and a receiving order made thereon, the proceeds of the sale were paid to the official receiver, and no benefit was derived from the execution by either of the creditors. The debtor was adjudicated bankrupt.

On the bankrupt applying for his discharge the registrar made an order suspending the discharge for two and a half years on the ground (inter alia) that the bankrupt had within three months preceding the date of the receiving order, when unable to pay his debts as they became due, given an undue preference to one of his creditors, within the meaning of section 28, sub-section 3 (f), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The bankrupt appealed.

Herbert Reed, for the appellant.

No one appeared in opposition to the appeal.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The registrar has suspended the bankrupt's discharge on the ground that he has been guilty of three of the offences mentioned in section 28, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act. The only question which has been seriously argued on the appeal is whether the bankrupt has been guilty of giving an undue preference to one of his creditors within the meaning of sub-section 3 (f).

In Mr. Yate Lee's book on Bankruptcy (3rd ed., p. 154) an opinion is expressed that "undue preference" in section 28 appears to be the same thing as the "preference" mentioned in section 48, which is commonly called fraudulent preference. In my opinion that is not so. Section 48 makes certain acts and transactions void if they have been done or entered into by the bankrupt with the motive of giving one creditor a preference over the others. Section 28 does not make anything void; it deals with the consideration by the court of the conduct of the bankrupt on the hearing of an application by him for an order of discharge, and includes many things which could not be made void after an adjudication of bankruptcy. The objects of the two sections being different, it is not unlikely that the word "preference" should have different meanings in each. What the court has to consider when acting under section 28 is the general conduct of the bankrupt, whether it is such as to induce the court readily to grant him a discharge. Now, when a debtor finds himself in the position mentioned in sub-section 3 (f), unable to pay his debts on the eve of bankruptcy, and knows that he is in that position, in my opinion the only honest course for him to take is not to interfere in any way between his creditors so as to give one any preference over the others. If he does interfere so as to give any creditor a preference over the others, he is, in my opinion, guilty of giving that creditor an undue preference.

It is clear, to my mind, that in this case the bankrupt took the two writs to the solicitors of the Lion Brewery Co., not, as was suggested, because he did not know any other solicitors in London, but because the Lion Co. were his principal creditors, in order that they might be able to levy execution before the others. I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think that "undue preference," in section 28, includes more than is comprised in section 48. The object of section 48 is to make void certain transactions in order to preserve a bankrupt's property for his creditors generally. The object of section 28 is to empower the court to punish a bankrupt by refusing to give him a discharge if, on taking his conduct into consideration, the court should think he was not entitled to it. If the court thinks he has unduly preferred one of his creditors, then, although there may be no transaction which can be set aside under section 48, the court may punish him under section 28.

BOWEN, L.J.—When the debtor was insolvent he gave a notice to his principal creditor which enabled him to obtain a preference over the other creditors. Any conduct on the part of a debtor which has this effect is, in my opinion, conduct at which the court ought to strike. I do not agree with the argument that a debtor does not, within the meaning of sub-section 3 (f) of section 28, give an undue preference to a creditor unless he does one of the specific acts mentioned in section 48. It is quite possible for a man to give one of his creditors a preference over the other without there being any transaction such as mentioned in section 48. And if he does so, the court can punish him under section 28. That is what the registrar has done here, and, in my opinion, the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

MAKINS v. PERCY IBOTSON & SONS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Mortgage—Debenture—Receiver and manager.

In a debenture-holder's action for foreclosure, where the debentures included all the property and uncalled capital of the company, all the shares which had been issued were fully paid up, and almost all the shares and the whole of the debentures belonged either to the plaintiff or the proposed manager, the court, with the consent of the company, appointed the managing director of the company to be receiver and manager of the property and business of the company, on the undertaking of the plaintiff to provide money for working expenses, to be responsible for the receipts of the receiver till he should give security, and to realize the property as soon as possible.

Motion.

By the writ in the action the plaintiff claimed, as a debenture-holder, a declaration that he was entitled to a first charge on all the property of the company, an account, foreclosure or sale, and to have a receiver and manager of the company's property appointed.

The question on the motion was whether he was entitled to the interim appointment of a manager of the property and business of the company.

By the memorandum of association the objects of the company were stated to be (inter alia) "to borrow upon mortgage, or raise money in such other manner as the company shall think fit, and in particular by the issue of debentures charged upon all or any of the company's property (both present and future) including its uncalled capital," and by the articles of association the directors had power to borrow money for the purposes of the company on similar conditions.

The debentures were ten in number and for £1,000 each, carrying interest at five per cent. They were worded as follows:—"The company hereby charges with such payments all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being." There were also two other debentures in similar form for £1,500 and £500.

The principal moneys were to become immediately payable on default for six months in the payment of interest and notice in writing to the company calling in such principal moneys.

Default was made in payment of interest and notice given within the above condition, but the plaintiff was informed that the company were unable to pay.

The capital of the company was £20,000, divided into 6,000 preferred shares and 14,000 deferred shares. The whole of the preferred shares and the whole of the debentures belonged to the plaintiff, and only 6,505 of the deferred shares had been issued. Of these, 6,000 belonged to H. P. Ibotson, who had been managing director of the company since its foundation, and 500 to the plaintiff. All the shares which had been issued were fully paid up. It was stated that there was a large quantity of raw material which it was desirable to manufacture so as to be in a position to sell the business as a going concern.

The notice of motion asked that Henry Percy Ibotson might be appointed, without his being required to give security, to manage the real and personal property and the business of the defendant company comprised in the debentures in the writ in the action mentioned, and to receive the rents and profits and produce of the said business until further order of the court.

Eustace Smith, for the company, consented to the order being made.

KAY, J.—By this motion I am asked to appoint a receiver and manager of all this company's property, both present and future. No specific mention is made in the memorandum of association or in the debentures, of the goodwill of the business; the debentures are in the very same words as the memorandum of association—namely, "all its property, both present and future, including its uncalled capital." Now I am asked to appoint not merely a receiver, but a receiver and manager of the business, this being a joint-stock trading company. The first question is, Is this within the jurisdiction of the court? Supposing a mortgagee entered into possession of property of this kind, could he carry on the business of the company? It is clear he could not. But that does not completely answer the question, because he would not be an officer of the court. Were it not for authority I should hesitate very much before, on a debenture like this, I appointed a receiver and manager. The object of such an application as this is to enable the business of the company to be carried on, and supposing the receiver and manager did so fairly, his acts would bind the company. So that the result is that if the business turned out to be a losing one, the uncalled capital, if any, would have to be called up. In my opinion that would be a very strong thing to do, and if this had been the first case of the kind I should have hesitated very much to accede to such an application. The matter came before a very experienced judge, the late Master of the Rolls, in Peek v. Trinsmaran Coal and Iron Co., and there, although there was no opposition, there being an [illegible] and [illegible] for the liquidator stated the facts.

[illegible] and [illegible] for Pullman.—Pullman paid off his mortgage in advance in [illegible], together with all amounts due under the rules, and [illegible] the statutory receipt and his deeds. If he had waited for the full period to run out it is clear he should have been no longer a member, as rule 36, which applies to that case, gives express power to re-enter. Payment in advance must have the same effect.

[illegible], Q.C., and [illegible], for Charnock.—Charnock withdrew under rule 29, and was paid the value of his shares, including a bonus.

These were treated as test cases.

CHITTY, J.—Pullman was a borrowing member. He gave a mortgage to the society, and subsequently paid it off under the rules, and a statutory receipt was indorsed by the society. Charnock, on the other hand, was an investing member who has withdrawn, as he was entitled to do, under rule 29. No fraud has been suggested. They both, therefore, ceased, to all intents and purposes, to be members. They could not have claimed any profit under the triennial adjustment provided for by the 40th rule, nor were they liable for any loss. It is an ordinary case of stated account. It would be impossible to work a society like this if the accounts were liable to be ripped up in this way. The question is entirely one of contract between the members and the society, and under this contract Pullman and Charnock have got their quietus and are discharged.

The questions raised on the summons of Johnson and Greenwood, who were depositors, involved the validity of certain borrowings made by the society. The only points actually submitted arose on the 24th rule above cited, which was practically identical with section 15, sub-section 2, of the Building Societies Act, 1874.

The first question was—(1) Whether, for the purposes of rule 24, "the amount for the time being secured to the society by mortgages from its members" includes:

(a) Moneys secured to the society by mortgages from persons who were only borrowers and had no other connection with the society.

(b) Moneys secured to the society by mortgages from persons who were members of the society but not advanced to such persons in respect of their shares.

Romer, Q.C., and W. Baker, for the official liquidator, stated the points.

Byrne, Q.C., and Levett, for Johnson and Greenwood.

CHITTY, J., without requiring any argument, answered (a) in the negative, and (b) in the affirmative.

The next question was—(2) Whether, for the purposes of rule 24, moneys borrowed by the society and lent to persons who were not members ought to be included in "the total amount borrowed."

Byrne, Q.C., and Levett, for Johnson and Greenwood.—These rules only apply as between the society and its members. Outside lendings must be set off against outside borrowings before rule 24 can be applied at all.

CHITTY, J.—There is no real question here to be decided. There is a limited power to borrow given by the 24th rule, and the right way to read the rule is to look at the state of account at the time of the proposed borrowing. "The total amount borrowed and not repaid" means the total amount for the time being owing in respect of loans from anybody, and this is not to exceed two-thirds of the amount secured by mortgages from members. The first term is the total amount to be borrowed—i.e., from anyone. The second term, with which it is to be compared, is the total amount secured by mortgages from a particular class—viz., members of the society. Consequently the right way to read and work the rule is simply this: The question being at a particular time whether the officers can borrow, they have to look to their securities—i.e., their mortgages from members—and the rest of the calculation is easy. Suppose the amount secured by mortgages from members is £10,000. Then two-thirds of this—viz., £6,666 13s. 4d.—is the superior limit of their borrowing power, and if they have already borrowed, say £5,000, no matter from whom, they can borrow the difference — viz., £1,666 13s. 4d. in addition. There is no mystery about the rule, it is in plain terms, and I am not at liberty to alter it.

Matthews v. Munster, 36 W. R. 78, 20 Q. B. D. 141, distinguished.

Motion.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiffs for leave to withdraw their consent to an order made on the 7th of June, 1890, and for liberty to renew their original notice of motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant from using the word "Lewis's."

The application was made under the following circumstances:—The original motion came on before Kekewich, J., on the 17th of May, 1890, when it was ordered to stand over till the 7th of June. In the meantime negotiations for a settlement were carried on between the solicitors for the respective parties, and on the 24th of May, 1890, the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiffs' solicitors as follows:—"Our client is anxious for peace, and therefore will concede the use of the word 'Lewis's,' either alone or jointly with any initials, and will consent to a perpetual injunction restraining him from using the word as above indicated, and will pay the taxed costs. Our client is naturally anxious to avoid further costs being incurred, and with this object perhaps you will be good enough to wire your clients the purport of the above on the receipt of this letter."

On the 27th of May the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote to defendant's solicitors acknowledging the receipt of the above letter, and suggesting that, to prevent question, minutes should be prepared and agreed to before the matter was mentioned in court again. Accordingly, on the 5th of June the plaintiffs' London agents submitted to the defendant's London agents draft minutes of the suggested order, which, so far as material, were in the following terms:—"This court doth by consent order and adjudge that the defendant, his agents, &c., be perpetually restrained from using in the course of any trade or business carried on by the defendant the name 'Lewis's' or 'Lewis,' or any other name so nearly resembling the plaintiffs' name of 'Lewis's' as to be calculated to deceive," &c. These minutes were objected to by the defendant's solicitors, and on the morning of the 7th of June the terms of the proposed order had not been agreed to. On that day, before the motion came on for hearing, counsel for the respective parties met and discussed them, and ultimately the following order was agreed upon between them, and indorsed on their briefs:—"By consent perpetual injunction to restrain the defendant from trading under the style of 'Lewis's,' and also from using the word 'Lewis's' in his advertisements or otherwise in the course of his trade or business without prefixing the initials J. M., or the names James or Mossop or both. defendant to pay plaintiffs' costs of action." The plaintiffs' country solicitors, on seeing the proposed order, immediately objected to it, on the ground that it did not carry out the proposal of the letter of the 24th of May, and stopped the drawing up of the order. Counsel for the plaintiffs had previously seen that letter, but it was not before him on the 7th of June and he had forgotten it.

Plaintiffs now moved for leave to withdraw their consent to the order so made.

Warmington, Q.C., and John Cutler, for the plaintiffs.—Admitting that the consent of counsel was given to the order, we are entitled to withdraw our consent as having been given under a mistake, and not in accordance with the agreement of May 24: Harvey v. Croydon Union Rural Sanitary Authority, 32 W. R. 389, 26 Ch. D. 249.

Chadwyck Healey, for the defendant.—There was no concluded agreement—the offer contained in the letter of May 24 not having been accepted by the plaintiffs. Counsel were, therefore, on June 7 in their ordinary position, with an implied power of compromising actions on behalf of their clients. There was nothing to lead the defendant to believe that the plaintiffs' counsel was exceeding his authority, and, that being so, the court will not disturb the compromise which has been made: Matthews v. Munster, 36 W. R. 178, 20 Q. B. D. 141; In re West Devon Great Consols Mine, 36 W. R. 342, 38 Ch. D. 51.

KEKEWICH, J.—I regret that the case has come before me, because a discussion of this kind cannot but affect, to some extent, a valuable power which is placed in the hands of counsel—that of compromising cases. I mean valuable not to them, but to the clients. And I regret that I must allow this application, because, although with my small knowledge of the case I ought not to say that I am satisfied, I cannot but think that the order indorsed on counsels' brief and the judgment consented to is a good settlement of the action. However, this case does, in my opinion, fall within the exception mentioned in what must now be treated, as far as the Chancery Division is concerned, as being the leading authority on the subject—viz., Harvey v. Croydon Union Rural Sanitary Authority. From that decision, as it seems to me, the decision in Matthews v. Munster does not depart in the slightest degree. In Matthews v. Munster what the court had to consider was a compromise entered into by counsel without any instructions or authority other than such as may be implied in the employment of counsel. The judges there took care to point out that the counsel did not act on express instructions as to a compromise. In this case, however, it is obvious—whether counsel had the letter of May 24 before them or not—that they were endeavouring to the best of their ability to give effect to the intention of the parties to compromise. Knowing that the parties wished to compromise, and having some general notions on the subject, counsel endeavoured to put them into the best form, and for my own part I think they succeeded. But I do not think it possible to say that such a compromise is necessarily binding on the party who had not assented to those particular terms. I think that in that way the case entirely differs from Matthews v. Munster. Here there was, I think, a misunderstanding as to the intention of the parties, and so I must allow the withdrawal of what, though called a consent, was in reality a consent given under a misapprehension, and, therefore, in law no consent at all.

I am not satisfied that any good result will come of this application, so I will not deal with the costs now, but reserve them till the motion is disposed of.

On the action coming on for trial, without pleadings, on July 16, Kekewich, J., granted an injunction restraining defendant from using the word "Lewis's," either alone or jointly with any initial, as a trade name or in advertisements, &c.

STANLEY v. POWELL. (a.)

Trespass—Accidental injury—Shooting—Negligence.

In the absence of negligence a man who accidentally shoots another is not liable in an action of trespass.

This was an action for damages for injuries caused by the defendant's shooting the plaintiff, and was tried at Maidstone before Denman, J., and a special jury. The facts and arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Kemp, Q.C., and Payne, for the plaintiff.

Dickens and Willes Chitty, for the defendant.

DENMAN, J.—This case was tried before me and a special jury at the last Maidstone Assizes. In the statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that the defendant had negligently, wrongfully, and unskilfully fired and wounded the plaintiff in the eye, and that the plaintiff in consequence had lost his sight and suffered other damage. The defendant denied the negligence alleged. After the evidence on both sides, which was conflicting, had been heard, I left the three following questions to the jury:—1. Was plaintiff injured by a shot from defendant's gun? 2. Was defendant guilty of negligence in firing the charge to which that shot belonged as he did? 3. Damages (in any event). The undisputed facts were that on the 29th of November, 1888, the defendant and several others were out pheasant shooting, some being outside and others inside of a wood which the beaters were then beating up. The plaintiff was employed by one Greenwood (the owner of the shooting, and who was one of the party) to carry cartridges and any game that might be shot. Several beaters were driving the game along a plantation of saplings towards an open drive. The plaintiff stood just outside a gate which led into a field outside the plantation at the end of the drive. The defendant was walking along in that field a few yards from the hedge which bounded the plantation. As he was going forward a pheasant rose inside the plantation. The defendant fired one barrel at the bird, and, according to the evidence for the defendant, struck it with his first shot.

There was a considerable conflict of evidence as to details, but the jury must, I think, be taken to have adopted the version of the facts sworn to by the defendant's witnesses. They swore that the bird, when struck by the first shot, began to lower and turn back towards the beaters, whereupon the defendant fired his second barrel and killed the bird, but that a shot glancing from the bough of an oak which was in or close to the hedge, and striking the plaintiff, must have caused the injury complained of. The oak in question, according to the defendant's evidence, was partly between the defendant and the bird when the second shot was fired, but it was not in a line with the plaintiff, but, on the contrary, so much out of that line that the shot must have been diverted to a considerable extent from the direction in which the gun must have been pointed in order to hit the plaintiff. The distance between the plaintiff and the defendant in a direct line when the second barrel was fired was about thirty yards. The case for the plaintiff was entirely different, but I think it must be held that the jury took the defendant's account of the matter, for they found the second question left to them in the negative. Before summing up the case to the jury I called the attention of the parties to the doctrine which seemed to have been laid down in some old cases, that, even in the absence of negligence, an action of trespass might lie, and it was agreed that I should leave the question of negligence to the jury, but if necessary the pleadings were to be deemed to be amended so as to raise any case or defence upon the facts, with liberty to the court to draw inferences of fact, and that the damages should be assessed contingently. The jury assessed them at £100. I left either party to move the court for judgment, but it was afterwards agreed that the case should be argued before myself on further consideration, and that I should give judgment, notwithstanding that I had left the parties to move the court as though I had originally reserved it for further consideration before myself. Having heard the arguments, I am of opinion that by no amendment that could be made, consistently with the finding of the jury, could I properly give judgment for the plaintiff.

It was contended on his behalf that this was a case in which an action for trespass would have lain before the Judicature Acts, and this contention was mainly founded on certain dicta which, until considered with reference to the cases in which they were uttered, seem to support that contention; but no decision was cited, nor do I think that any can be found, going so far as to hold that if A. is injured by a shot from a gun fired at a bird by B., an action for trespass will necessarily lie, even though B. is proved to have fired the gun without negligence, and without intending to injure the plaintiff. The jury having found that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, the most favourable way in which it is now possible to put the case for the plaintiff is to consider the action as brought for a trespass, and to consider that the defendant has put upon the record a defence denying negligence and specifically alleging the facts sworn to by his witnesses, which the jury must be considered to have found proved, and then to consider whether those facts, coupled with the absence of negligence established by the jury, amount to an excuse in law.

The earliest case relied upon by the plaintiff was one in the Year-book (21 Hen. 7, p. 28a), which is referred to by Grose, J., in the course of argument in Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593, to be mentioned presently, in these words:—"There is a case put in the Year-book (21 Hen. 7, p. 28a), that where one shot an arrow at a mark which glanced from it and struck another, it was holden to be a trespass." On turning to the case in the Year-book it appears that the passage in question was a mere dictum of Rede, who was at the time (1506) either a judge of the King's Bench or Court of the Common Pleas, in a case of a very different kind from that now in question, and it only amounts to a statement that an action of trespass may lie even where the act done by the defendant is unintentional. The words relied on are, "Mes ou on tire a les buts et blesse un homme coment que est incontre sa volont; il sera dit un trespassor incontre son entente." But in that very passage Rede makes observations which show that he has in his mind cases in which that which would be primâ facie a trespass may be excused.

The next case in order of date relied upon for the plaintiff was Weaver v. Ward, decided in 1617, and reported in Hobart, p. 134. There is no doubt that that case contains dicta which per se would be in favour of the plaintiff, but it also contains the following summing up of the law applicable to cases of unintentional injury by acts which are primâ facie trespasses:—"Therefore, no man shall be excused of a trespass except it may be judged utterly without his fault," showing clearly that there may be such cases. That case, after all, only decided that when plaintiff and defendant were skirmishing as soldiers of the trainband, and the one casualiter et per infortuniam et contra voluntatem suam (which must be translated accidentally and involuntarily) shot the other, an action of trespass would lie unless he could show that such involuntary and accidental shooting was done under such circumstances as utterly to negative negligence. Such cases may easily be supposed in which there would be no two opinions about the matter, but other cases may—as the present case did—involve considerable conflicts of evidence and opinion which until recently a jury could only dispose of.

The case of Gibbons v. Pepper, 1 Lord Raymond 38, decided in 1695, merely decided that a plea showing that an accident caused by a runaway horse was inevitable was a bad plea in action of trespass—because if inevitable that was a defence under the general issue. It was a mere decision on the pleading, and laid down nothing as regards the point raised in the present case. The case of Gibbons v. Pepper is also reported in 4 Mod. 405, and the concluding words of the judgment, which show clearly the ratio decidendi of that case, are these:—"He should have pleaded the general issue, for if the horse ran away against his will he would have been found not guilty, because in such a case it cannot be said with any colour of reason to be a battery in the rider." The more modern cases of Wakeman v. Robinson, 1 Bing. 213, and Hall v. Fearnley, 3 Q. B. 919, lay down the same rule as regards the pleading point, though the former case was also relied upon as an authority by way of dictum in favour of the plaintiff, and the latter may fairly be relied upon by the defendant, for Wightman, J., in his judgment explains Wakeman v. Robinson thus:—"The act of the defendant—viz., driving a cart at the very edge of a narrow pavement on which the plaintiff was walking so as to knock him down—was primâ facie unjustifiable, and required an excuse to be shown. When the motion was first made I had in my recollection the case of Wakeman v. Robinson. It was there agreed that an involuntary act might be a defence on the general issue. The decision, indeed, turned on a different point, but the general proposition is laid down. I think the omission to plead the defence has deprived the defendant of the benefit of it and entitled the plaintiff to recover." But in truth neither case decided whether, where an act such as discharging a gun is voluntary, but the result injurious, without negligence, an action of trespass can, nevertheless, be supported as against a plea pleaded and proved, which the jury find to be established to the effect that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant. The case of Underwood v. Hewson, 1 Strange, 596, decided in 1723, was relied on for the plaintiff. The report is very short:—"The defendant was uncocking a gun and the plaintiff standing to see it, it went off and wounded him, and at the trial it was held that the plaintiff might maintain trespass. Strange pro defendente." The marginal note in Nolan's edition of 1795—not necessarily Strange's own composition—is this, "Trespass lies for an accidental hurt," and in that edition there is a reference to Buller's N.P. On referring to Buller (p. 16), where he is dealing with Weaver v. Ward, he writes as follows:—"So it is no battery if one soldier hurts another in exercise; but if he plead it he must set forth the circumstances so as to make it appear to the court that it was inevitable and that he committed no negligence to give occasion to the hurt, for it is not enough to say that he did it casualiter et per infortuniam contra voluntatem suam, for no man shall be excused of a trespass unless it be justified entirely without his default—and therefore it has been holden that an action lay where the plaintiff, standing by to see the defendant uncock his gun, was accidentally wounded."

On referring back to Weaver v. Ward I can find nothing in the report to show that the court held that in order to constitute a defence in the case of a trespass it is necessary to show that the act was inevitable. If inevitable, it would seem that that was a defence under the general issue, but a distinction is drawn between an act which is inevitable and an act which is excusable, and what Weaver v. Ward really lays down is that "no man shall be excused of a trespass except it may be judged utterly without his fault." Day v. Edwards, 5 T. R. 648, in 1794, merely decides that where a man negligently drives a cart against the plaintiff's carriage, the injury being committed by the immediate act complained of, the remedy must be trespass, and not case.

But the case on which most reliance was placed by plaintiff's counsel was Leame v. Bray. That was an action of trespass in which the plaintiff complained that the defendant with force and arms drove and struck a chaise which he was driving on the highway against the plaintiff's curricle, which plaintiff's servant was driving, and by means thereof the servant was thrown out and the horses ran away, and the plaintiff, who jumped off to save his life, was injured. The facts stated in the report include a statement that "the accident happened owing to the defendant, on a dark night, driving his carriage on the wrong side of the road, and the parties not being able to see each other, and that if the defendant had kept his right side there was ample room for the carriages to have passed without injury." The report goes on to state:—"But it did not appear that blame was imputable to the defendant in any other respect as to the manner of his driving. It was, therefore, objected for the defendant that, the injury having happened from negligence and not wilfully, the proper remedy was by an action in the case and not of trespass vi et armis, and the plaintiff was thereupon nonsuited."

On the argument of the rule to set aside the nonsuit, the whole discussion turned upon the question whether the injury was "immediate from the defendant's act or consequential only from it," and in the result the nonsuit was set aside. But it clearly appears from the report that there was evidence upon which the jury might find negligence, and, indeed, the defendant's counsel assume it in the very objection which prevailed with Lord Ellenborough when he nonsuited the plaintiff. There is nothing in any of the judgments to show that if in that case a plea had been pleaded denying any negligence, and the jury had found that the defendant was not guilty of any negligence, but (for instance) that the accident happened wholly through the darkness of the night rendering it impossible to distinguish one side of the road from the other, and without negligence on either party, the court would have held that the defendant would have been liable either in trespass or in case.

All the cases to which I have referred were before the Court of Exchequer in 1875 in the case of Holmes v. Mather, 23 W. R. 861, L. R. 10 Ex. 261, and Bramwell, B., in giving judgment in that case, dealt with them thus:—"As to the cases cited, most of them are really decisions on the form of action, whether case or trespass. The result of them is this, and it is intelligible enough. If the act that does an injury is an act of force vi et armis trespass is the proper remedy (if there is any remedy) where the act is wrongful either as being wilful or as being the result of negligence. Where the act is not wrongful for either of these reasons no action is maintainable, though trespass would be the proper form of action if it were wrongful; that is the effect of the decisions." This view of the older authorities is in accordance with a passage cited by Mr. Dickens from Bacon's "Abridgement—Trespass" (p. 706), with a marginal reference to Weaver v. Ward, where the word "inevitable" does not find a place. "If the circumstance which is specially pleaded in an action of trespass does not make the act complained of lawful (by which I understand justifiable even if purposely done to the extent of purposely inflicting the injury, as, for instance, in a case of self-defence), and only makes it excusable, it is proper to plead this in excuse, and it is in this case necessary for the defendant to show not only that the act complained of was accidental, but likewise that it was not owing to neglect or want of due caution."

In the present case the plaintiff sued in respect of an injury owing to defendant's negligence, and there was no pretence for saying that it was intentional so far as any injury to the plaintiff was concerned. It was argued, nevertheless, inasmuch as the plaintiff was injured by a shot from the defendant's gun, that was an injury owing to an act of force committed by the defendant, and therefore an action would lie. I am of opinion that this is not so, and that to any statement of claim which the plaintiff could suggest the defendant must succeed, if the defendant pleaded the facts sworn to by the witnesses for the defendant in this case, and the jury believing those facts, as they must be taken by me to have done, as regards negligence. In other words, I am of opinion that, if the case is regarded as an action on the case for an injury by negligence, the plaintiff has failed to establish that which is the very gist of such an action. If, on the other hand, it is turned into an action of trespass, and the defendant is (as he must be) supposed to have pleaded the plea denying negligence and establishing that the injury was accidental in the sense above explained, the verdict of the jury was equally fatal to the action. I am, therefore, of opinion that I am bound to give judgment for the defendant.

FENTON v. BLYTHE.
COLLARD (CLAIMANT). (a.)

Bill of sale—Registration—Non-re-registration—Avoidance ab initio—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 41), s. 11—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 3, 8.

A bill of sale, duly registered, had been granted in 1884. It was not, however, re-registered within five years as required by section 11 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

Held, that, having regard to sections 3 and 8 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, the effect of non-re-registration was to render the bill of sale void as between the parties to it, and not merely void as against the persons enumerated in section 11 of the Act of 1878.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Eddis, sitting at Clerkenwell County Court.

This was an interpleader issue arising out of the following facts:—The claimant Collard had advanced money to the defendant on the security of two bills of sale having reference to the same goods, but at different times and in different places. The first bill of sale had been executed on the 27th of September, 1884, and had been duly registered within seven days, but the defendant had failed to renew the registration of it at the expiration of the five years as required by section 11 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. The same parties subsequently executed a second bill of sale upon the same security. Upon a seizure by the sheriff at the instance of the plaintiff, an execution creditor, and at the hearing of the issue as remitted to the county court, it was contended, on behalf of plaintiff, that the second bill of sale was void on the ground that the grantor was not "the true owner" of the goods as required by section 5 of the Amendment Act, 1882, since he had previously parted with the property in the goods under the first bill of sale; that the first bill of sale, although not re-registered, remained in force as between the grantor and grantee, but that, it being void as against strangers for want of such re-registration, the execution creditor was entitled to seize the goods. It was also contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that, if the first bill was void, the consideration in the second bill was not truly stated, and that it was, consequently, also void. The judge decided against the plaintiff on the second ground.

W. J. Noble, for the execution creditor.—The decision of the judge amounts to a judgment in favour of the plaintiff, since his finding that the consideration was truly stated in the second bill becomes immaterial if he has found that the first bill was in existence as between the parties. In that case the goods were not the property of the grantor at the time of the second bill, and as regards the first bill it is void as against the execution creditor for want of re-registration.

Edward Pollock, for the claimant.—By section 11 of the principal Act, 1878, "the registration of a bill of sale must be renewed once at least everyfive years; and if a period of five years elapses from the registration or renewed registration without renewal . . . the registration shall be void." If not so renewed the bill of sale becomes void. The principal Act must, by section 3 of the Amendment Act, 1882, be read with the Amendment Act, and though by that section it is not to apply to a bill of sale duly registered before the commencement of the latter Act, yet here the first bill of sale was registered subsequent to the latter Act. It is void for want of renewal of registration. Therefore the second bill is good, and the judge has found in the claimant's favour upon that ground.

Noble, in reply.—The first bill of sale was "duly attested and registered under the principal Act within seven clear days after the execution thereof," as required by section 8 of the Amendment Act, 1882. No other section in the latter Act affects it. Section 11 of the principal Act simply enacts that the registration, not the bill itself, shall be void if not renewed. The bill remains a valid security between the parties, and is only void against strangers. It is void, therefore, against the present execution creditor, but he is entitled to argue that it is a good and existing security as between the parties to it, and for that very reason it invalidates the second bill of sale between the same parties on the same security.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The point taken is an ingenious one, and for a time I was myself beguiled by its ingenuity under the impression that the first bill of sale had been registered under the principal Act previous to the Amendment Act. But that is not so. Now the two Acts are expressly stated in section 3 of the latter Act to be treated as one Act so far as is consistent with their tenor. The Amendment Act is to be read into the principal Act, and in that process may absorb one or other of what would otherwise be distinct provisions of the earlier Act. Under the principal Act the bill of sale was to be registered within seven clear days of its execution, otherwise it was void as against certain persons, though not as between the parties executing it. Then comes section 11 of that Act, which requires re-registration, or the same consequences, as from absence of registration originally, must ensue. This bill in question, however, was made subsequent to the Amendment Act of 1882. In a sense it was registered under the principal Act of 1878, because section 8 of the Amendment Act so enacts, but then section 3 of the latter Act enacts that this Act "is, so far as is consistent with the tenor thereof, to be construed with the principal Act." By this latter Act it is provided that bills of sale are to be void as against everybody if not registered, and just as non-registration makes a bill of sale void under this Amendment Act, so does non-re-registration. The Acts are not to be construed together so much as to be read together, one into the other. Under the principal Act the bill has to be registered within seven days, and if kept back for five years to be re-registered; under the Amendment Act a bill is made void as against everybody if non-registered, and must, therefore, be void if non-re-registered. I think the judge was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. Assume that the Amendment Act of 1882 was not in existence, then it is perfectly clear that the effect of absence of re-registration under section 11 of the principal Act of 1878 is simply to put parties back into the same position as they would be under that Act if the bill had not originally been registered; that is to say, the bill would be void only as against strangers, but a good security as between the parties. Then comes the Amendment Act, 1882, enacted with the express purpose of sweeping away all these distinctions and making bills of sale absolutely void as against everybody if not registered. If a bill of sale be not then re-registered it must be treated just as if it had never been registered, with the effect that it is void as against everybody under the provisions of the Amendment Act. A bill of sale made after that Act must be either good altogether or bad altogether under the provisions of that Act unless you can bring the bill altogether under the earlier Act, but you cannot use different sections of the different Acts to bolster up a bill of sale in one respect, whilst it is deficient under another.

In the Goods of MARY HORNBUCKLE. (a.)

Probate—Married woman—Will of real estate—Exercise of power of appointment and devise—Appointment of executors—Right to probate—Existing grant of administration.

A married woman, having a power of appointment over, and being absolutely entitled to, real estate subject to the exercise of such power, by her will appointed and devised the same, and appointed executors. She had no personal estate, and her will did not purport to dispose of any. Her husband obtained a grant of administration to her estate, on the ground that she had died intestate, except as to realty. One of the devisees under the will applied for probate, the executors other than the husband having renounced or died.

Held, that the devisee was entitled to the grant, but that the court could not make a grant to him until the existing grant to the husband was revoked.

Motion for a grant of administration with the will annexed of the estate of Mary Hornbuckle, deceased, to one of the devisees under the will.

By deed executed December 23, 1863, Mary Hornbuckle was seised of and entitled to certain real estate with a power of appointment to the use of such persons as she might appoint, and in default of appointment "to the sole use and benefit of the said Mary Hornbuckle, her heirs and assigns, and for her own use and benefit, free from any control of her husband."

By her will, dated December 24, 1863, she devised this estate to her husband and children, and purported to act not only in pursuance of the power of appointment before referred to, but in pursuance of all powers enabling her so to do; and she appointed three executors, Francis Hornbuckle, her husband, and two others, one of whom renounced, and the other died. The will did not dispose of any personal property, and the deceased had none. She died in March, 1864, and in July, 1864, a grant of administration was made to Francis Hornbuckle, her husband, on the ground that she had died intestate, except as to realty.

E. Ford, in support of the application.—Inasmuch as the testatrix was possessed of the real property absolutely, she was in the position of a feme sole, and a will made by a man or feme sole disposing of realty only, has been held entitled to probate if it contains an appointment of executors: In the Goods of Jordan, 16 W. R. 407, L. R. 1 P. & D. 555. The case of O'Dwyer v. Geare, 1 S. & T. 465, 8 W. R. Prob. Dig. 7, is distinguishable, as there the testatrix had only a power of appointment. See also Brownrigg v. Pike, 30 W. R. 567, 7 P. D. 61. If the existing grant to the husband is considered an objection, this motion should stand over in order that an application may be made to revoke such grant.

Searle, for F. Hornbuckle, referred to In the Goods of Jane Barden, L. R. 1 P. & D. 325, 15 W. R. Prob. Dig. 19. The testatrix ought to have exercised the power of appointment to herself in order to bring this case within In the Goods of Jordan. Moreover, there cannot be two grants, the court has made one to the husband already, and that grant cannot be revoked on motion, it must be by action.

BUTT, J.—I do not see that anything will be gained by allowing this motion to stand over, although the cases show that where a man or feme sole dies devising by will real property only, but appointing an executor, that executor is entitled to have the will proved; that would have no application in the case of a married woman merely appointing under a power given by deed. But in this case the testatrix not only had such power, but also a vested interest in the real property apart from that power, and she really exercised, not only what rights she had under the power, but the rights she had beyond it. She was, therefore, qua this property in the position of a feme sole. But for one circumstance I should, therefore, be prepared, on the authority of the cases cited, and especially having regard to the decision of Hannen, P., in In the Goods of Tomlinson, 30 W. R. 61, 6 P. D. 209, where he points out the real principle on which the court should act, to hold the applicant entitled to probate of this will. But there is this difficulty, that administration of this estate has already been granted to the husband. Under the circumstances it appears to me impossible to make a grant to anyone else while that grant remains unrevoked. The application must be refused.

Grant refused.

"THE STAKESBY." (a.)

Shipping—Damage—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 11—Fixed stern light.

Article 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea provides that "a ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light." This article is not necessarily infringed where it is proved, in an action of damage, that a vessel required to show a white stern light under its provisions has shown from her stern to a vessel overtaking her a fixed white light.

This was an action of damage brought by the owners of the barque Dilbhur, of 1,280 tons, against the screw steamer Stakesby and her freight to recover the damage sustained by The Dilbhur on the night of the 2nd of March, 1889, when that vessel was in the North Sea in tow of the steamtug Cruiser, and was run into and damaged by The Stakesby.

The action was now heard before the President and two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

The following cases were cited:—The Palinurus,

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

36 W. R. 768, 13 P. D. 14; The Imbro, 37 W. R. 559, 14 P. D. 73.

It appeared from the evidence that at the time of the collision a white light was fixed at the stern of The Dilbhur in such a position that it would be visible to vessels having a good look out and overtaking The Dilbhur from astern within the area over which her side lights were not visible; and that when risk of collision was involved The Dilbhur was "being overtaken" by The Stakesby within the meaning of article 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which article provides that "a ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light."

On the question whether The Dilbhur, having carried a fixed stern-light, infringed the 11th article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and was consequently to be deemed to be in fault for the collision, under the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), the President delivered the following judgment:—

HANNEN, P.—A question has been raised whether there has been an infringement of article 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea on the part of The Dilbhur.

I observe that Butt, J., in his judgment in The Imbro refers to my decision in The Palinurus, but, from my recollection of that case, I do not think I had this point present to my mind, and I do not think I have given any decision upon it. Two things occur to me. First, that it cannot be that the mere fixing, of the white light spoken of in article 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is an infringement of the rule, because that would lead to this result, that the rule could only be complied with by a waving of the light; but there is nothing in it pointing to anything of that sort. The question one has to consider is, whether or not, in the state of navigation in the place where the collision occurred, it was proper that there should be a permanent light exhibited to overtaking vessels. It appears that there were a number of vessels about, and I am advised by the Trinity masters that it was not improper to have a permanent stern light on this vessel to be a guide to the vessels which were passing. It has also to be remembered that several vessels had previously passed, which would also need the assistance of a stern light. This opinion is in accord with my view. I am, therefore, of opinion that there has not been in this case an infringement of the article I have referred to. I should be inclined to construe this article thus: That the flashing of a light, which is a thing done on a sudden, is sufficient; but not, therefore, that the exhibition of a fixed light is an infringement of the article. The circumstances here justified something more than the mere flashing of a light. I should also add that there was such a bad look out on The Stakesby that it was not the difference between a flashing and a fixed light which conduced to the collision. If there had been a good look on The Stakesby the stern light and the tug's light would have been seen sooner than they were. I therefore pronounce The Stakesby alone to blame.

TAYLOR v. RUSSELL. (a.)

Mortgage—Priority—Tacking.

A subsequent mortgagee, who, at the time he advanced his money, had no notice of any prior equitable mortgage, can, by getting in the legal estate, even after notice of the existence of a prior equitable mortgage, thereby protect himself against any claim for priority on the part of such prior equitable mortgagee, provided that the legal estate has been obtained without the violation of any trust or equity in regard to the prior equitable mortgagee against whom the legal estate is set up. The fact that the conveyance of the legal estate constituted a breach of trust as against some third person does not prevent the holder of the legal estate getting the benefit of its protection in an action for a declaration of priority brought against him by the prior equitable mortgagee.

Decision of Kay, J. (reported 38 W. R. 663), reversed.

Appeal from the decision of Kay, J., reported 38 W. R. 663.

The facts of the case as stated in the judgment of the Court of Appeal are as follows:—In the year 1862 certain land was, under the will of one Robert Surtees, limited to legal uses in strict settlement, under which Robert L. Surtees and Henry Edward Surtees were successively tenants for life. The testator had conferred on his trustees, Maude and Wilkinson, powers of sale and mortgaging, and of revoking and appointing uses to carry any sale or mortgage into effect. In 1862 Messrs. Maude and Wilkinson mortgaged certain lands to Sir Francis D. Legard to secure £9,000. These lands included the property in question, together with much other property; and by some accident the deeds of the property in question remained in the custody of the Surtees trustees. It appears that the fact that the land in question was included in this mortgage was entirely forgotten, and accordingly, by a deed of the 30th of January, 1883, Wilkinson, the surviving trustee of the Surtees will, together with Henry Edward Surtees, the tenant for life, conveyed the land in question to one Toward for valuable consideration, and Wilkinson covenanted in the usual terms that he had done no act whereby the land was incumbered except by a lease mentioned in the conveyance. On completion Toward received the title deeds of the land in question. Toward, having procured this conveyance, set himself to concoct a forged deed purporting to convey the same land to himself, in order to enable him to effect two separate mortgages of it, one under the genuine and one under the forged title; accordingly he produced a document which bore date November 3, 1882, and purporting to be made between Mr. Smithson and the defendant Russell, as trustees of the will of one Samuel Smithson, Mr. Smithson as tenant for life under that will, and Toward himself. It recited a title under the will of Smithson, and it purported to convey the land in question for valuable consideration. The parties named in this forgery were real persons. There had been a Samuel Smithson, a testator who was seised of an estate near the land in question. Smithson and Russell were the trustees of that will, and Smithson was the tenant for life under it. Armed with this forged instrument, Toward obtained £2,500 from the plaintiffs on the security of a mortgage of February

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

15, 1883, by which Toward, deducing title from Smithson's trustees, conveyed the land to the plaintiffs; at the same time he deposited with the plaintiffs the forged deed of November 3, 1882. In this way the plaintiffs became possessed of a good equitable estate under Toward. Subsequently Toward borrowed money from a bank on a mortgage of the same land, deducing the true title. The subsisting incumbrance was, on October 20, 1887, paid off by the defendant Russell, and Toward thereupon executed to him a mortgage deducing the true title, and deposited with him the genuine title deed of January 30, 1883. In the year 1888 Toward absconded, and, his misdeeds coming to light, the defendant applied to Colonel Duncombe and Mr. Cayley, the trustees of Sir Francis Legard's will, in whom was then vested the mortgage of 1862, to convey to him the legal estate in the land in question, and an arrangement was come to between the Legard trustees, Mr. Wilkinson and Mr. Jennings, then the Surtees trustees, and the defendant, to the effect that the Legard trustees, who were satisfied of the sufficiency of the other mortgaged property to answer their claim, should convey the legal estate in the land in question to the Surtees trustees upon the express condition that the Surtees trustees would immediately thereafter convey the same to the defendant Russell. This arrangement was carried into effect by two deeds, the first, dated November 21, 1888, by which the Legard trustees conveyed the land in question unto and to the use of Wilkinson and Jennings in fee simple to the uses upon the trusts and subject to the powers of the Surtees will, the tenant for life under the Surtees will being a party to this deed; the second, dated November, 26, 1888, by which Wilkinson and Jennings conveyed the land to the defendant Russell, who thus at last acquired the legal estate which had hitherto been outstanding.

The plaintiffs having brought this action to realize their mortgage security, and the property in question not being sufficient to satisfy both the plaintiffs' and the defendant's mortgages, the plaintiffs claimed that they were entitled to priority over the defendant on the ground that their mortgage was prior in point of time, and that the defendant could not rely on the legal estate because it had been got in through a breach of trust.

The defendant relied, first, on the possession of the legal estate; and, secondly, apart from that, that the plaintiffs had been guilty of such negligence in taking their mortgage as to justify their postponement to the mortgage of the defendant.

Kay, J., decided in favour of the plaintiffs on both points. He held that the plaintiffs had not been guilty of such negligence as to make them responsible for the fraud subsequently committed by the mortgagor upon the defendant; and that the defendant had only got possession of the legal estate by availing himself of a breach of trust committed against the plaintiffs by the persons conveying the legal estate to the defendant.

The defendant appealed.

Scott Fox, for the appellant.—First, even before November 26, 1888, the date of the conveyance of the legal estate to the defendant, the defendant had a better equity than the plaintiffs, because the plaintiffs were guilty of negligence in omitting to require Toward to produce proper evidence that the property which he conveyed to them by the deed of February 15, 1883, was identical with the property passing under Smithson's will, and also in not requiring production of the earlier title deeds, as to which the forged deed of November 3, 1882, contained a covenant for production. In a contest between two mere equitable incumbrancers it is not necessary, in order to cause postponement of the earlier of the two, to prove the same amount of negligence as must be shown to postpone a legal mortgagee: Waldron v. Sloper, 1 Drew. 193; Worthington v. Morgan, 16 Sim. 547; National Provincial Bank v. Jackson, 34 W. R. 597, per Cotton, L.J., at p. 600, 33 Ch. D. 1, at p. 13. This latter case was overlooked by Kay, J., in his judgment, but it has been followed by North, J., in Farrand v. Yorkshire Banking Co., 37 W. R. 318, 40 Ch. D. 182. [FRY, L.J., referred to Bickerton v. Walker, 34 W. R. 141, 31 Ch. D. 151.] But, in fact, the negligence of the plaintiffs was gross enough to have justified their postponement even if they had been legal mortgagees: Peto v. Hammond, 30 Beav. 495, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 119; Northern Counties of England Fire Assurance Co. v. Whipp, 32 W. R. 626, 26 Ch. D. 482. Secondly, the defendant having got in the legal estate, he is entitled to hold it until his incumbrance is discharged: Blackwood v. London Chartered Bank of Australia, 22 W. R. 419, L. R. 5 P. C., at p. 111; Bates v. Johnson, 7 W. R. 512, 1 John. 304. The fact that the legal estate has been got in by a voluntary conveyance makes no difference, for the equity to hold it arises, not by reason of anything being paid for the getting in of the legal estate, but by reason of its being got in without any breach of trust: Goleborn v. Alcock, 2 Sim. 552; Churchil v. Grove, 1 Chan. Cas. 35; Holt v. Mill, 2 Vern. 279; Pilcher v. Rawlins, 20 W. R. 281, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 259. Legard's trustees were not satisfied mortgagees or bare trustees, and therefore Harpham v. Shacklock, 30 W. R. 49, 19 Ch. D. 207, does not apply, Dodds v. Hills, 2 H. & M. 424, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 57. Surtees' trustees only got the legal estate in pursuance of a bargain by which they were bound to transfer it to the defendant, and they never held the legal estate as trustees for the plaintiffs.

He also referred on this second point to Sadler v. Bush, 2 Vern. 30; Coote on Mortgages, 5th ed., p. 932.

Levett (Haldane, Q.C., with him), for the respondents, the plaintiffs.—A mortgagee is, except as incident to his security, a trustee of the estate for the mortgagor, and cannot deal with the estate except by sale, or transfer to the mortgagor, and in no other way can he divest himself of the estate: Matheson v. Clarke, 3 Drew. 3; and therefore Legard's trustees had no right to voluntarily transfer the estate in the way they did; the moment that Legard's trustees agreed to release this part of the property from their mortgage debt, that moment they became with respect to it satisfied mortgagees, and, therefore, trustees for the plaintiffs: Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 J. & W. 1, at p. 185. It was a breach of duty on the part of Wilkinson, the surviving Surtees trustee, to be a party to any bargain which prejudiced Toward or the plaintiffs, who claim through Toward, because Wilkinson had covenanted to convey to Toward free from incumbrance, and when Wilkinson got the legal estate from Legard's trustees he was bound to hold it for the benefit of Toward—i.e., for the plaintiffs who now represent Toward. Again, the Surtees trustees were only trustees with power of sale or mortgage for the purposes declared by the will of Surtees, and it was therefore a breach of trust on their part to take a conveyance of the legal estate in fee from Legard's trustees for the purpose of transferring it to the defendant. The defendant knew the position of the Surtees trustees, and cannot benefit by what he knew to be a breach of trust: Harpham v. Shacklock; Mumford v. Stohwasser, 22 W. R. 833, L. R. 18 Eq. 556. The plaintiffs were not guilty of wilful or unjustifiable negligence. The title of Smithson with respect to property quite close to the property now in question had been investigated only a short time before, and the plaintiffs were desirous of saving expense, and, therefore, did not insist on a reinvestigation of title. The defendant must show such wilful neglect on the part of the plaintiffs as to estop the plaintiffs from relying on the priority of their equitable mortgage: Cory v. Eyre, 1 De G. J. & S., at p. 167; Dixon v. Muckleston, 21 W. R. 178, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 155.

Scott Fox replied.

Nov. 20.—The following written judgment of the COURT (Sir JAMES HANNEN and BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.) was read by FRY, L.J.—The plaintiffs in this action have obtained from Kay, L.J., when a justice of the High Court, a declaration that a mortgage security vested in them is entitled to priority over a mortgage vested in the defendant. The defendant has appealed. The questions for decision arise from the conjoint operation of an honest blunder and a fraud. [The Lord Justice then stated the facts, as above, and proceeded:—] The defendant, being the legal owner of the property, is entitled to priority over the plaintiffs, who are merely equitable owners, unless the plaintiffs have some equity to deprive the defendant of that benefit. It has not been argued that the defendant has assisted in, or connived at, any fraud, or constituted Toward his agent, so as to become responsible for his fraud, but it is argued that the defendant procured the conveyance of the legal estate under circumstances which preclude him from claiming the benefit of it in a court of equity. In considering this question we must bear in mind that the defendant seeks no assistance from equity; he takes his stand on his legal title, and the plaintiffs must fail unless they show an equity to deprive the defendant of his legal right.

It has been argued, in the first place, that the plaintiffs, having an equitable estate prior in time to that of the defendant, had a right, and a better right than the defendant, to call on Wilkinson to assign the legal estate; that on November 21, 1888, this right attached; and that the defendant, taking the legal estate with knowledge of this equitable claim of the plaintiffs, cannot set it up against them.

It is not necessary to consider whether, if Wilkinson and his co-trustee had obtained the legal estate free from any trust or condition, this contention ought to prevail; but they did not so obtain it; it came to them from the diligence and exertions of the defendant, and it came to them clothed with a trust or subject to a condition to convey it to the defendant. Even if they ought never to have so taken the legal estate (which we see no reason to affirm), they could not, when they had taken it, refuse to perform the conditions on which they took it without a gross violation of confidence and breach of good faith, of which no equity could, in our judgment, require them to be guilty. Furthermore, it is clear that notice of the existence of an equity prior in date to that of the person who obtains the legal estate does not prevent that person from claiming its benefit when such notice is received, not before, but after, the creation of the equitable estate of him who gets in the legal estate. "There is nothing more familiar," said Lord Selborne, in expressing the opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Blackwood v. London Chartered Bank of Australia "than the doctrine of equity that a man who has bonâ fide paid money without notice of any other title, though at the time of the payment he, as purchaser, gets nothing but an equitable title, may afterwards get in a legal title if he can, and may hold it, though during the interval between the payment and the getting in the legal title he may have had notice of some prior dealing inconsistent with the good faith of the dealing with himself." "In every case," said Lord Hatherley, in Bates v. Johnson, "down to Peacock v. Burt, 4 L. J. N. S. Ch. 33, which is probably one of the most striking of the kind, it has been held that when once a subsequent incumbrancer, who, by advancing his money without notice of prior mesne incumbrances, stands in an equally good position with them in every respect except as regards time, gets in the legal estate, he has a right to avail himself of that legal estate until the whole of his incumbrance is discharged."

An argument substantially the same as that which we have already discussed was presented by the plaintiffs' counsel in a slightly different form. Wilkinson, by the deed of January 30, 1883, covenanted with Toward and his assigns that he had not incumbered; in fact, he had incumbered, and it is urged that when he got in that incumbrance, and had the legal estate vested in him, he was bound to use it to make good, in favour of the plaintiffs as assigns of Toward, the erroneous representation contained in his covenant. We cannot accede to this argument. Wilkinson may or may not be liable to damages on his covenant, but he could never be called on to make it good by conveying to the plaintiffs an estate which he had consented to take on an express trust for the defendant; and, furthermore, the defendant, as well as the plaintiffs, was an assign of Toward, and seems to have had an equal equity with the plaintiffs to require Wilkinson to make good his statements. It was, in the next place, urged on us that the Surtees trustees, by taking a conveyance of the legal estate to themselves and by executing the deed of November 26, were committing a breach of trust and acting in excess of their power to mortgage. The terms of this power are not before us, nor the position of the Surtees family or the interests of its members under the will; but it is before us that the transactions complained of were carried into effect by deeds, to one of which the tenant for life was a party. But, assuming that these acts were such as those who claim under the will of Mr. Surtees could complain of, it appears to us that they afford no assistance to the plaintiffs. A man may come to equity and successfully say to a defendant, "You have obtained the legal estate in breach of an equity which I possess or of a trust under which I claim, and you shall not set it up accordingly"; but a plaintiff cannot rely on some breach of trust towards third persons who assert no title to the estate and take no part in the litigation. The plaintiff to deprive the defendant of the benefit of the legal estate must rely on an equity of his own, not on that of a stranger. Some language of the late Master of the Rolls in Harpham v. Shacklock was pressed upon us as inconsistent with this view. He there said that "nothing is better settled than that you cannot make use of the doctrine of tabula in naufragio by getting in a legal estate from a bare trustee after you have received notice of a prior equitable claim."

The doctrine to which the learned judge referred, we understand to have been that more fully explained by Lord Eldon in Maundrell v. Maundrell, 10 Ves. 259—260, to the effect that where there is a term in gross the expressed object of which has been satisfied, the term is, according to the doctrine of equity, held upon trust for the successive equitable interests according to their priorities. It follows that if a subsequent equitable owner gets in the term with notice of the prior equity he gets it in subject to the equity of the prior equitable owner, and, consequently, is restrained from setting it up against such owner by reason of an equity vested, not in a third person, but in that prior equitable owner himself. The case of Harpham v. Shacklock, in which the late Master of the Rolls used the language referred to, is no exception to this principle. In that case the defendants got in the legal estate and set it up against the plaintiff, who had an equity to prevent their so doing; for the legal estate was in one Peck, who had assigned his security to the defendant Shacklock, and not having surrendered the legal estate held it as trustee for Shacklock, and Shacklock, having received the plaintiff's money to pay off Peck, was a trustee for the plaintiff, so that the plaintiff, and not a stranger, had an equity to prevent the defendants setting up the legal estate. "If there is a mortgage of the inheritance," said Lord Eldon in Maundrell v. Maundrell, 10 Ves., at p. 270, "and a prior mortgagee of whose title the other has no notice, if the subsequent mortgagee can get in a term satisfied, or, according to the later cases, not satisfied, by an assignment to trustees for him, he can protect himself against the prior incumbrancer, unless there are circumstances that give that incumbrancer a better right to call for an assignment." On authority, therefore, as well as principle, we are of opinion that a trust or equity to affect the conscience of him who has got in the legal estate must be a trust or equity not in favour of some third person who may have no care or desire to insist upon it, but a trust or equity, in favour of the person against whom the legal estate is set up. The defendant was a perfectly innocent holder of the equitable estate; he clothed himself with the legal estate without notice, in our opinion, of any equity in the plaintiffs to prevent his so doing, and we see, therefore, no reason to deprive him of the benefit he has acquired. Taking this view of the case, it becomes needless for us to enter upon a discussion as to any question of negligence, or as to the relative equities of the plaintiffs and defendant. We allow the appeal.

BELL & CO. v. ANTWERP, LONDON, AND BRAZIL LINE. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Service out of jurisdiction—Contract—Place of payment—Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

A contract which may be performed either within the jurisdiction or outside it is not a contract "which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction" within the meaning of ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Cave and Day, JJ.) setting aside an order of the judge at chambers giving leave to serve notice of writ out of the jurisdiction.

The plaintiffs were shipowners at Newcastle-on-Tyne. The defendants were a Société Anonyme carrying on business in Antwerp and having no place of business in England. The action was brought on a charter-party by which the defendants chartered the plaintiffs' ship to proceed to a loading berth in London or Antwerp and there take on board a cargo and proceed therewith to Rio de Janeiro or Santos and deliver the same where ordered afloat according to the custom of port. The charter-party provided that all lighterage should be at charterer's or consignee's risk and expense, charterers indemnifying owners from any and all lighterage on cargo at ports of discharge, bill of lading or any law or custom to the contrary notwithstanding, and that the freight (a lump sum of £5,850) should be paid as follows: £1,500 if required by charterers on unloading and right delivery at port or ports of discharge (so much as might be payable on bills of lading to be taken without recourse to the charterers), and the balance in London by charterers seven days after departure of the vessel from the last port of loading. There was a stipulation that thirty-five running days, Sundays excluded, were to be allowed the charterers for loading and discharging the cargo, and that demurrage if incurred was to be at the rate of £40 per day.

The plaintiffs sued for indemnity against lighterage expenses paid by them and demurrage incurred at the ports of discharge.

W. S. Robson and J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs.—The court has power to allow service out of the jurisdiction under ord. 11, r. 1 (e), since payment ought by the terms of the contract to be made within the jurisdiction. The shipowners reside and carry on business in England, and the charterers must pay them in England for the lighterage and demurrage. Where there is no agreement as to the place of payment in a contract between persons one of whom is out of the jurisdiction, it must be taken to be part of the contract that payment should be made within the jurisdiction: Robey v. Snaefell Mining Co., 36 W. R. 224, 20 Q. B. D. 152. Regard must be had to the surrounding circumstances in order to see whether the contract is one to be performed within the jurisdiction: Reynolds v. Coleman, 35 W. R. 813, 36 Ch. D. 453.

James Fox, for the defendants.—There is no authority to give leave to serve this notice of writ. Neither of the stipulations sued upon are contracts which must necessarily be performed within the jurisdiction.

Robson replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs, who are shipowners residing in England, bring an action against the Antwerp, London, and Brazil Line, which is a foreign company carrying on business abroad, and having no place of business in this country. The action is brought on certain parts and stipulations in a charter-party entered into by the company with the plaintiffs. There is a stipulation as to lighterage and indemnity, which is a separate contract by itself, and on which the plaintiffs may sue separately. There is another stipulation as to the payment of demurrage, and on that also the plaintiffs may sue as a separate contract. It is absurd to say that the charter-party itself is a contract to be performed in England, but the question is whether either of these separate stipulations is a contract "which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction" within the meaning of ord. 11, r. 1 (e). I will take the alleged contract for indemnity for the lighterage first. The ship was chartered to sail to Rio, which she accordingly did. The lighterage was undoubtely incurred at Rio. The particulars show that the claim in the present action is not for freight, but for lighterage, or for the indemnity from such lighterage when paid by the shipowner. The lighterage itself had, of course, to be paid at Rio and to Rio people, and if it was to be paid by the shipowner he would be obliged to pay it there. Then comes the question of the indemnity. It is said that the charterers have undertaken to indemnify the shipowner against such payment. Looking at the question apart from the rule, if the charterers are bound by such an indemnity where are they to pay the shipowner? Directly the lighterage was paid, the shipowner, if the indemnity is good, would have his cause of action perfect. The instant that it had been paid the money would be due. It might have been paid to him at Rio, but it was not. There is no place named at which it is to be payable, and, therefore, in such a case the debtor is bound to pay to the creditor his debt on demand. It is true that, unless by the terms of the contract a demand is a condition precedent, the creditor need not demand it at all except by bringing his action, and then he may say that the debtor owes him money and ought to come to him and pay him wherever he happens to be. If a debtor is bound to pay on demand, a creditor is not obliged to go to him to his ordinary place of business to make the demand. He may make the demand wherever he finds his debtor, and the debtor is bound to pay him then and there. The payment may therefore take place anywhere.

Now, to consider the bearing of ord. 11, r. 1 (e), upon this case. The action is brought against foreigners resident and carrying on their business abroad, and the court is asked for leave under the rule to serve them abroad with notice of the writ. The rule allows the court to give such leave if the prescribed conditions are fulfilled. The question, therefore, is whether this is a contract which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction. The court cannot break from the terms of the rule. In Reynolds v. Coleman, it is decided that it is enough if it appears from the terms of the contract, and the facts existing when the contract was made, that the contract was to be performed within the jurisdiction, and that it is not necessary for it to be stated in express terms in the contract that it is so to be performed. We must, however, construe the contract before us according to the ordinary rules. It is a contract to be performed whenever a demand for its performance is made. Therefore it cannot be said to be a contract which ought necessarily to be performed within the jurisdiction, and so it does not fall within the rule. The same is the case with regard to the contract to pay demurrage at the port of discharge. The demurrage became due directly the delay occurred, and it also was payable wherever it was demanded. Contracts which can be performed either in or out of the jurisdiction are not contracts "which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction" within the meaning of the rule.

The decision, therefore, of the Divisional Court was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree, and I think that I need add little to the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. There is nothing to show where the performance of these contracts is to take place. It may be either within or outside the jurisdiction. I should say myself that the inference was that payment should take place at Rio, but, however that may be, it is clear that they are not contracts "which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction" within the meaning of the rule.

KAY, L.J.—I only wish to add a word as to the meaning of the rule. It has reference primâ facie to contracts which, by the express terms thereof, must be performed within the jurisdiction, but I entirely agree with Cotton, L.J., in Reynolds v. Coleman, that regard must be had not only to the express terms of the contract, but also to the surrounding circumstances, to see whether this is so or not, and that it is not necessary for the contract itself expressly to state that such is the case. But in the present case it is plain that neither of these contracts were such as must necessarily be performed within the jurisdiction, and therefore the rule has no application.

Appeal dismissed.

MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF THE BOROUGH OF SALFORD v. LEVER. (a.)

Principal and agent—Bribery of agent—Action against briber to recover excess price fraudulently obtained—Right of briber to plead satisfaction by agent—Form of agreement between corporation and fraudulent agent in satisfaction of their claim against agent—Ultrà vires.

Where an agent, under the influence of bribes, persuades his principal to pay a price for goods obtained from a contractor, advancing the bribe, in excess of the price at which the contractor was in fact willing to sell, the principal has a right of action against both agent and contractor, whether jointly or severally, for two distinct and independent frauds, and it is immaterial upon which right of action he first sues. The fact that the principal, before action against the contractor, had entered into an agreement with the agent, whereby, on condition of the agent depositing securities to cover the amount of the bribes retained by him, the principal undertook to take action at the agent's request against the contractors who had advanced the bribes, and to credit the agent with the sums so recovered from the contractors by discharging his securities from liability to that amount, cannot be pleaded as a defence by the contractor, because such an agreement does not amount to the release of a joint tortfeasor, but only to the postponement of the principal's independent right of action against their agent; and (per Lord Esher, M.R.) that, in the case of a corporation, such an agreement, binding the corporation to sue at the request of their agent, was ultrà vires.

Appeal by defendant from Divisional Court (Denman, Charles, and Vaughan-Williams, JJ.) refusing to order a new trial.

The facts of this case and the agreement under consideration are fully set out in the argument in the court below (38 W. R. 771).

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (Lockwood, Q.C., with him), for the appellant, the defendant.—The agreement between the corporation and Hunter was a release of a joint cause of action against Hunter and Lever. The learned judge had misdirected the jury, because the corporation had been cheated, not by one and then the other of the parties, but by their joint operation, and as the corporation had released one of the two parties the other was equally entitled to the release. The release was given before a defence was put in in this action. If satisfaction has been made in the case of one the joint tort is satisfied. The corporation could have realized the securities given by Hunter on the 31st of December, 1889, and that was before this defence was put in. They have practically been paid for their loss, and cannot recover it over again from Lever. Lever could plead accord and satisfaction of the claim against him at any rate of £1,500 paid by him to Hunter, and recovered by the corporation from Hunter under the terms of the agreement. The point that the agreement was ultrà vires was not raised at the trial by the corporation. It is not ultrà vires, because the corporation were bound to try and recover the amounts of which they had been defrauded, and it was not against public policy to do so. Hunter is practically suing in this action because the amount recovered is to go to the credit of his securities. If the damages which the corporation can recover are the sums which found their way into Hunter's hand, they have taken possession of these damages under the securities lodged with them by Hunter, and the defendant can claim for an account of these to be rendered in respect of their claim against him.

He cited Co. Litt. 232 a; Brinsmead v. Harrison, 20 W. R. 784, L. R. 7 C. P. 547; Bird v. Randall, 3 Burr. 1345; Cocke v. Jennor, Hob. 66; Hilman v. Uncles, Skinner, 391; and Buckland v. Johnson, 2 W. R. 565, 15 C. B. 145.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and C. Gould, for the respondents, the plaintiffs.—What passed between the corporation and Hunter in no way affected their rights against Lever. They had a separate cause of action against Lever either for damages for fraud or for money had and received. The mere fact that the damages could be assessed at 1s. a ton, and so amounted to the same sum as that had and received, was immaterial. If Lever had given a piece of plate to Hunter instead of the 1s. per ton the corporation could bring an action against Lever, and could also recover the plate, or its value, from Hunter as something received by him as their agent and retained from them. There is a right of action against Hunter for the bribe received and retained by him, and a right of action against Lever for money had in excess of what was really charged. The agreement did not amount to a release of Hunter, but was only a postponement of the right of the corporation to sue him. If out of a transaction, some part of which was a common fraud, there arose a separate independent right against Lever, nothing in the document of release, if it amounted to a release, could bar that independent right. The corporation did not wish to get out of their agreement with Hunter by arguing it was ultra vires.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 1.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the Corporation of Salford brought an action against the defendant, a coal dealer. In form the action was one of tort. What tort? The defendant, having coals to sell, bargains with the corporation through their agent, Hunter. Hunter's position as agent for the corporation would be one towards which contractors of all kinds would look. The defendant knew that it was Hunter's duty to buy coals for the corporation at any price at which he or fellow coal merchants could be induced to sell. He negotiates with Hunter for a price at which he himself chose to sell; it is immaterial whether that is the market price or not, so long as it left him the profit he desired. Hunter, however, tempts him to secure the contract by saying that he will not buy at the price defendant is willing to sell, unless the defendant will help him, Hunter, to cheat the corporation out of 1s. on every ton of coal. The plan is for the defendant to put down 1s. a ton more in his bill than the price at which he is willing to sell at a profit, but that shilling is to be returned by the defendant to Hunter, who puts it in his pocket as what is called a "commission." The word "commission" in trade covers a multitude of sins. Here it means fraud. The defendant sold coals to the corporation at the price he had chosen, including his own profit, but by the arrangement he further enabled Hunter to put down a false figure for the price, and to send in the bills covering the extra shilling, subsequently returned to Hunter by the defendant as commission or bribe. If this shilling per ton was obtained from the corporation by fraud, as undoubtedly it was, the defendant is liable to pay it back to them. What was the measure of the frauds? It is the damage of 1s. per ton. Whether that be sued for as damages, or as money had and received, it is all the same as regards the liability of the defendant. The form of action is wholly immaterial. Unless something has been done to oust the corporation from their primary rights against the defendant they are entitled to recover from him this shilling per ton fraudulently obtained from them, even although it has in fact been paid over by him to his confederate. It has been in his pocket. The defendant is liable—I will add, unfortunately liable—because he was tempted to commit this fraud by a man superior to him in position, and the authorized agent of an influential corporation. But the defendant urges that the corporation are ousted from the exercise of their primary right of action against him, first, on the ground that the money went into the hands of their own agent, and has been partly recovered from the agent by them; and, therefore, that they cannot recover the same money over again from him. Without reference, for the moment, to the validity of the agreement mentioned in this case, we must begin by asking what have the corporation got from Hunter? And on what ground? He, as their agent, received a bribe in the performance of his duties as agent. There is nothing so fraudulent as the taking of a bribe by an agent in order to carry out a breach of his duty to his principal. The law strikes direct at such a fraud. Whether it is called a bribe, commission, or what not, an agent must restore to his principals what he has received by a fraud on them. But that is a wholly separate and distinct fraud of Hunter's, as agent. Hunter might have received the money without any fraud on the part of a contractor who might have thought that he was entitled to this commission. The action of such other person is immaterial to the right of the principals to sue their agent for his fraud, whether it be by way of damages, or as money had, or on whatever plea. The foundation of their claim against him is the separate and distinct fraud by him as their agent. But how does this prevent the same principals from suing another person, not as their agent, for fraud committed by him against them? That other person cannot say, "You must not sue me until you have sued your own agent." Which action is taken first is immaterial, because there are two distinct frauds. The agent here happens to be guilty of both—of fraud against his principals and of a combination fraud by conspiring with another independent person to defraud them, but that does not affect the right of action in this case. Leaving out the question of the agreement, then, the defendant here cannot diminish the damages or absolve himself from liability by reason of the prior recovery by the plaintiffs, as principals, from their agent of bribes received in the carrying out of an independent fraud.

But the second question arises, Has the corporation entered into an agreement which prevents them suing the defendant in respect of the combined fraud by him and Hunter? It is a clear rule that if a principal releases one of two joint tort-feasors it acts as a release of the other. That is well known law. Whether such release can be pleaded under the form of award and satisfaction is immaterial. Now here it may be answered, first, that there is no agreement by the corporation to release Hunter, because this undertaking, whatever it is, between them and Hunter is not signed by them or sealed with the corporation seal. The plaintiffs declined to argue in support of this objection, but I am not sure that it is not the duty of the court to raise this objection, since it cannot be said that a fraudulent accessory ought to be assisted by the court in any way over legal difficulties. I say, then, that there is no real agreement here between the corporation and Hunter, because it is not a document sealed with the corporation seal. But, secondly, supposing the agreement to be sufficiently valid, does it produce the effect which the defendant relies upon? Supposing this agreement to mean that the corporation undertake to bring an action against the defendant at the request of Hunter and at his expense, so that practically Hunter is bringing the action under the name of the corporation, that is no compromise by the corporation of their rights against Hunter. It would not amount to a release. It would be an absolute agreement to sue the defendant upon these terms entered into by the corporation officials on their behalf. But, taking this agreement to amount to that and to be binding, the corporation are bound by its terms to bring the action against the defendant, and whatever the agreement may say, they would be primarily liable for the costs if the action should fail. They would be giving away their independence of action and pledging the ratepayers to pay costs only on the chance of their subsequent recovery from Hunter. Under the circumstances I, speaking for myself, am of opinion that the agreement is wholly ultrà vires. The corporation had no mandate to enter into such an agreement, and I say that, even if it could be said to be a binding agreement under seal, it would be ultrà vires. But, even if under seal and not ultrà vires, is this agreement a release of Hunter? It is not, nor does it pretend to be, a release of Hunter, and, if it did, I say again, it is not a valid one under seal, for certainly that objection must be raised at this point, if not pressed at first. It is not a release of Hunter, but merely an agreement to suspend the action open to the corporation against him. It leaves a way open to them to bring any action they like against him afterwards. It is only a postponement of their right of action against him, and cannot prevent them from suing the defendant. On almost every ground, therefore, there is no such defence open to the defendant as he has urged. The result of this, I know, is to do what I ventured to say in the course of the case I felt great objection to bring about. If money is recovered from this or other defendants, the corporation cannot pay it over legally to Hunter, but the coal dealers, who have been tempted or over-persuaded by Hunter through his position as agent for the corporation, practically have to bear the burden. They may be ruined and driven into bankruptcy, but the securities of Hunter must remain wholly or to a large extent untouched, and therefore Hunter will, in reality, take the money recovered in this way by the corporation, and, with the exception of what they may get from him as subject-matter of the bribe offered to him, he will, on coming out of prison, be in the same position financially as he was before.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Apart from the agreement produced in this case, the action is really an undefended one. It is an action brought by the corporation against a certain coal merchant for charging them 1s. per ton in excess of the market price—that is to say, the price at which he chose to sell his coal. This excess they are entitled to recover, whether as money had and received, or in any other way. It is not disputed that there would be any difficulty in shaping the action in that or any other appropriate form. But the defence is substantially based on the agreement entered into by the corporation with Hunter. That agreement can only be understood by estimating the position of the respective parties to it at the time. The corporation, on discovering certain facts, prosecute Hunter, their agent, for forgery and perjury, for which he is convicted, but they recover none of the money of which they, and, through them, the ratepayers, had been swindled. The amount was £10,000 at least. They were bound to take any possible steps open to them to recover some or all of this amount. Whether they could have got it all back from Hunter direct, I do not know. But they could not get it back from the various coal merchants inculpated, including the defendant, without Hunter's assistance. They accordingly make this agreement with Hunter. He is to deposit securities to the amount of £10,000, and to put the corporation by his information in a position to recover the actual £10,000 or a large amount of it. On that condition the corporation undertake to sue the several coal merchants at Hunter's expense, and to credit to Hunter's account, i.e., to release his securities to, the amount which they recover from the coal merchants. By this agreement the corporation stand to recover £10,000, either from Hunter by realizing his securities, or from the coal merchants against whom they bring actions at Hunter's expense. I am not prepared to say that such an agreement is illegal or ultrà vires under the circumstances. True, it is not under seal and cannot therefore be held binding upon the corporation. It is only an ordinary undertaking between Hunter and the particular members of the corporation. It has, however, been treated in the case as one by which the corporation are content to abide. But does that affect in any way the defendant's obligation? Not at all. The corporation have a right to recover the 1s. a ton from the defendant whether given to Hunter as a bribe or retained by the defendant. It would be paradoxical to say that their right of action on two distinct frauds depended upon whom they sued first. If the corporation sued defendant first, as they have done, and afterwards chose to sue Hunter, that would not affect their right against Hunter. Nor can defendant plead by way of defence that, because his co-conspirator, as the corporation's agent, has to account to the corporation, they are thereby debarred from suing him. If the corporation had released Hunter from the liability for which he is jointly liable with the defendant that would be arguable, but the defendant has no real defence unless he can prove this action to be in substance, and not merely in form, an action by one thief against another. Here the corporation would never have got defrauded without the assistance given by the defendant to Hunter's proceedings. Their action is not in substance or in form to recover sums to be handed over to Hunter. They cannot part with the sums recovered by this and similar actions to Hunter, even if they wished to do such a thing. The action is one by defrauded principals to recover for themselves the amounts of which they have been defrauded through the action of the defendant, as well as of their agent. This appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I give no opinion whether this agreement be ultrà vires or illegal as contrary to public morality. Nor am I prepared to say that the conduct of the corporation in entering into such an agreement, if valid, was improper. Such matters would require further consideration, and are immaterial to the decision of this appeal. I assume the agreement to be a good and valid one. That assumption does not in any way affect, in my opinion, the right of action in the corporation against Lever. It is, in fact, not admissible in evidence by Lever as being irrelevant to the issue between the present parties. The effect of that agreement with Hunter cannot be pleaded as accord and satisfaction of the claim of the corporation against Lever. It does not amount to the release of a co-tort-feasor. As the Master of the Rolls said, the right of action in the corporation against their agent,

Hunter, and against Lever are for separate and distinct frauds. Their right of action against Hunter is for secret profit or concealed bribes out of their pockets. Their right of action against the present appellant and other coal merchants, who have similarly acted, is for the excess of price which he charged to cover the amount he subsequently paid over to Hunter in connivance of Hunter's fraud. It is said that the two actions cannot co-exist. That argument cannot be supported when the frauds are distinct. The illustration given by the counsel for the corporation disposes sufficiently of that argument. Suppose, said Mr. Henn Collins, that the bribe had been in the shape of a piece of plate instead of this 1s. per ton, there could have been no doubt that the corporation could have first sued Hunter and then the defendant, or vice versâ. It is immaterial which right of action is first sued on. I may add that I agree with the judgments as delivered by Denman and Charles, JJ.

CULLERNE v. LONDON AND SUBURBAN GENERAL PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Building society—Liability of director—Advance of money on security of scrip—Building Societies Acts, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32), s. 4, and 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), ss. 13, 15.

A., the director of a building society, was party to a resolution that advances should in future be made to members on the deposit of their scrip. In pursuance of this resolution, advances were from time to time made on this security, but A. was not a party to any of the resolutions to make such advances: a loss having been sustained by the society in consequence of these advances,

Held, that, under the Building Societies Acts, the resolution authorizing the advance was invalid, but that, since the real cause of the loss was the advance, and not the resolution authorizing it, A. was not liable to the society for the loss.

Appeal from a judgment of Mathew, J.

The action was brought to recover a sum of money which the plaintiff had deposited with the defendant society. They counter-claimed in respect of certain sums of money which they alleged had been lost to them by being improperly advanced by the directors, of whom the plaintiff was one, to members upon the security of deposits of certificates of their shares. There was a further counter-claim to recover damages for a loss incurred by the society, and alleged to be due to the negligence of the plaintiff in making an advance out of the funds of the society on insufficient mortgage security. The claim was not disputed, and the only question was as to the liability of the plaintiff on the counter-claim.

The society was registered under the Building Society Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32), and the rules were certified by the registrar.

The society was also registered under the Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42). By the rules, the object of the society was declared to be to raise by the subscriptions of its members, and in shares of £50 each, payable by monthly instalments of 10s. per share, a fund, out of which each member should receive the amount or value of his share for the erection, or purchase, of a dwelling-house or dwelling-houses, or other real or leasehold estate. By rule 8 the funds of the society were to be advanced to the members, or invested in such manner, on such terms, and upon such mortgage of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold tenure, as the board should determine. The plaintiff was a director of the society from its formation, and in December, 1876, he was present at a meeting of the board when a resolution was passed that advances should, in future, be made to members, on deposit of their scrip, at the rate of six per cent. per annum; and in February, 1883, he was party to a resolution that not more than four-fifths of the amount paid up on any share should in future be advanced. In pursuance of these resolutions advances were from time to time made out of the funds of the society to members on the security of their shares, and losses amounting to £791 were sustained by the society thereby. The plaintiff was not a party to any of the resolutions to make the advances. The other ground of counter-claim related to an advance of £500 on the security of some leasehold cottages, on which transaction the society incurred a loss.

The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the claim and counter-claim. The defendants appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29, 1890.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., and LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ.), was read by LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case the defendant society seeks by a counter-claim to make the plaintiff, one of the directors, responsible for losses which the society has sustained, first, by reason of advances made to members on the security of their shares in the society, and secondly, by reason of advances made on the security of some cottages of insufficient value.

To deal with the last loss first. A sum of £500 was advanced on the security of a mortgage of ten cottages, which were let at rentals considerably greater than the instalments by which the loan and interest had to be repaid. The cottages were inspected by one of the directors of the society, and he reported the security sufficient. But he does not appear to have considered what the houses were worth if put up for sale, and the advance was, no doubt, injudicious. The transaction, however, was clearly intra vires, and was perfectly honest. The most that can be said about it is that there was an error of judgment on the part of the directors. But this is not enough to make them liable for the loss. The learned judge who tried the case acquitted the plaintiff of all culpable negligence in this matter, and I see no reason to differ from him. Indeed, rule 29, indemnifying the directors, is clearly applicable to this part of the case. On this point, therefore, the society fails.

The other loss complained of is of a very different character. The society was formed in 1866, and was registered in 1879 under the Building Societies Act of 1874. The rules of the society were certified to be in conformity with the law by the registrar of building societies. One of those rules, viz., the 8th, is so worded as to admit of more constructions than one, and the directors unfortunately appear to have regarded it as authorizing advances to members on the security of their shares in the society. Accordingly, in December, 1876, a resolution was passed by the directors authorising such advances, and in February, 1883, another resolution was passed limiting the amount to be advanced to four-fifths of the amount of the borrowing member's shares. The plaintiff concurred in both these resolutions. Advances were accordingly made by the directors to members on no other security than their shares, and the evidence warrants the inference that the plaintiff knew that this was frequently done. The plaintiff, however, was no party to the particular advances mentioned in the counter-claim, and the loss of which is sought to be recovered from him. The learned judge held that he was not responsible for this loss on the ground that no negligence on his part was proved. The society, however, contend that, however this may be, the plaintiff is responsible for the loss on the ground that the advances were altogether ultrà vires, and are attributable to the illegal resolutions which authorized them.

On looking carefully at the statutes by which these societies are governed—viz., 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 4, and the previous statutes there referred to—viz., 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, ss. 2, 13, 30, and 31, and 4 & 5 Will. 5, c. 40, s. 9—it certainly does appear that building societies can only advance money on the security of landed property, freehold, copyhold, or leasehold. The later Act, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 42, ss. 13 and 25, is to the same effect, except that the public funds are added. The 8th rule must be construed with reference to these enactments, and if it authorizes advances on other securities, or on no security, it must to that extent be regarded as contrary to law, and invalid. The resolutions founded upon that rule, and authorizing advances other than on the security mentioned in the statutes, must also be treated as of no validity. No director, therefore, who has in fact advanced money of the society upon any other security than land, can avail himself either of the rule or of the resolutions as a defence to an action by the society for the restitution of the money so advanced. Nor does rule 29, relating to the indemnity of the directors, extend to acts which are ultrà vires, and beyond the powers which the society itself could confer upon them. It does not, however, also follow that because the resolutions of December, 1876, and of February, 1883, are contrary to law, and are invalid, the plaintiff is responsible for what other people did on the faith of them. It probably is true that if no such resolutions had been passed no such advances as they authorized would have been made; but the real cause of the loss sustained by the society is the improper advance; the resolution was not the causa causans of the loss, but only a causa sine quâ non. If the resolution alone had been passed nothing would have happened; it would have had no result. A new wrongful act by independent persons was the real cause of the loss. The resolution, therefore, was not the real cause, not the causa causans. It must be borne in mind that the resolutions in question were not orders given to subordinate officers for them to carry out; the resolutions merely expressed the views of the directors as to their own powers under the society's rules, and their views, of what should be done as regards advances. The resolutions no doubt introduced the practice of making advances without proper security; but no one was bound to act in any particular case in conformity with them, and every director ought to have known that the resolutions were ultrà vires. They were bad on the face of them. Everyone acquainted with the statutes would have seen that they were bad without any further inquiry. The plaintiff ought not to have passed the resolutions, and his co-directors ought not to have acted on them. I am not aware of any authority which goes the length of deciding that under these circumstances the plaintiff is liable for what they have done. They were not his servants or agents; their authority was as great as his; their knowledge the same as his; and, even assuming that he misled them upon a point of law, this does not make him liable to the society for the loss of money which they advanced and not he.

The cases to which Mr. Buckley referred do not decide the point now under consideration. In In re Oxford Benefit Building and Investment Society the directors declared dividends out of capital, and, in effect, directed the payment of them. They acted on the resolutions they passed, and were held liable for what they did, and not for what they only resolved to do. I have carefully looked at the decree in Evans v. Coventry, and I infer that the directors there held liable, not only passed resolutions that were ultrà vires, but also acted on them. The decree as to the increased remuneration of the directors (pp. 844 and 845) only charges each director with what he received. The decree as to dividends paid out of capital (p. 845) appears to me only to charge the directors who declared the dividends, and, in effect, ordered them to be paid. The decree as to the purchase of shares (p. 846) only charges those directors who concurred in the purchases—i.e., as I understand, who made them or ordered them to be made.

In Joint-Stock Discount Co. v. Brown the directors who were held liable had done much more than the plaintiff did in this case. They were all parties to what James, V.C., characterized as the fatal resolution, that the shares improperly bought should not be sold for less than a certain sum. They were thereby implicated in the whole transaction which produced the loss.

In Salisbury v. Metropolitan Railway Co. directors were held liable to make good dividends wrongly paid out of capital; but the point which has to be considered in the present case did not arise there.

Reliance was placed by the counsel for the plaintiff on the judgment of Wickens, V.C., in Pickering v. Stephenson, 20 W. R. 654, L. R. 14 Eq. 322, and followed in Studdert v. Grosvenor, 34 W. R. 754, 33 Ch. D. 528. But if a director acting ultrà vires —i.e., not only beyond his own power, but also beyond any power the company can confer upon him —parts with money of the company, I fail to see on what principle the fact that he acted bonâ fide and with the approval of a majority of the shareholders can avail him as a defence to an action by the company to compel him to replace the money. I never could understand that part of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment; nor can I understand it now. I think he was wrong.

For the reasons stated I am of opinion that the plaintiff is not liable, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

The Master of the Rolls and my brother Lopes concur in this judgment.

Costs—Scale fee—Negotiating sale—Conditional offer—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44)—General Order under Act, Schedule I., Part. I., r. 11.

To entitle a solicitor to charge the scale fee for negotiating a sale, the negotiation must be a complete negotiation resulting in a binding contract, and must have been carried through by the solicitor himself without assistance.

A contract for the sale of property, the subject of an action, conditional upon the sanction of the court being obtained, does not entitle the solicitor who conducted the negotiations to the scale fee.

"Arrange" in rule 11 to Schedule I., Part I., of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, means "finally arrange."

Adjourned summons.

The solicitors to the defendants, who were the trustees of certain real estate which was the subject of this action, received instructions from their clients to sell the property, and succeeded in obtaining an offer from a bank, conditional upon the contract being sanctioned by the court, to purchase the property for £5,000.

The solicitors obtained evidence to induce the court to sanction the sale, including the opinions of two skilled valuers, who made affidavits to the effect that the proposed price was fair and proper. The sale was sanctioned by the court, and the solicitors claimed to be entitled to the scale fee under Schedule I., Part I., r. 11, of the General Order to the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, for negotiating the sale. The taxing master disallowed the fee, and this summons was taken out to review the taxation.

D. 30; Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, General Order, r. 2, and Schedule I., Part I., r. 11.

Levett, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

KAY, J. [after stating the facts as set out above, continued:—]. In this case the solicitor has had the scale fee for completing the sale, according to the decision in Stanford v. Roberts, and now asks for the scale fee for negotiating the sale, and also to have the costs of obtaining the sanction of the court to the sale. This must be on the footing that a conditional contract would entitle him to the scale fee. But can he be said to have arranged the price and terms and conditions of the sale? A vendor's solicitor is to have a scale fee for deducing title and perusing and completing a conveyance, and another scale fee for negotiating a sale; rule 11 does not apply to the former scale fee, but to the latter only. [His lordship then read rule 11.] Taking the words "and no commission is paid to an auctioneer, or estate or other agent," the meaning of the rule is plain, that when the solicitor has done all the work without having paid an auctioneer or other agent to assist him, and that work results in a complete contract, then the scale fee applies. But if he does not do all the work, but part is done by an agent whom he pays, then he is not entitled; because that part of the work was not done by him.

The question is, did this solicitor arrange the sale and the price and the terms and conditions? He did not do so finally, because that was done by the court. And it is obvious that arrange means finally arrange; the scale fee applies when the solicitor makes the contract himself. In the present case a complete arrangement was never made by the solicitor without assistance.

Then, as to the price, he negotiated with the bank for sale if the court approved the price. There was clearly no binding contract made until the court sanctioned it. If the court had said that the price was not a fair and proper price, there would have been no contract at all.

"Arrange," in rule 11, which only applies to negotiations, means that the negotiation must be a complete negotiation resulting in a binding contract, and then the solicitor must have carried it through himself, without assistance. Suppose that the contract had been to sell to the bank for £5,000, if the price should be stated to be a fair one by A. B., in my opinion the solicitor could not have been said to have arranged the price. The rule means that he must, unaided and without paying others, have arranged a complete and binding contract.

The cases cited are upon the other part of the Act and rules relating to completing the conveyance, and do not touch rule 11, which applies only to negotiations.

Summons dismissed.

In re EARL OF LUCAN.
HARDINGE v. COBDEN. (a.)

Administration—Voluntary charge—Equitable reversionary interest—No assignment of fund—Creditors for value—Volunteer—Priority.

A mere voluntary charge on an equitable reversionary interest, although coupled with covenants for payment and further assurance, cannot be held equivalent to an assignment pro tanto so as to give the volunteer claiming thereunder priority as against creditors for value.

Donaldson v. Donaldson, 2 W. R. 691, Kay, 711, discussed.

Adjourned summons.

The action was for administration of the estate of the late Earl of Lucan. The only point calling for report was as to the validity, as against creditors for value, of the charge created by the following indenture.

By a voluntary deed dated the 10th of October, 1867, the Earl of Lucan granted a life annuity of £300 to Miss Ellen Cobden, and charged it upon his real and personal estate as appears below. The operative part of the deed was as follows:—

"He, the said Earl of Lucan, doth by these presents grant, bargain, and sell unto the said Ellen Cobden one annuity, clear yearly rent-charge, or sum of £300

sterling to be issuing or payable out of, and charged or chargeable upon, all that and those the said several lands, tenements, and hereditaments the property of the said Earl of Lucan, and also upon the said several chattels, goods, moneys, securities for money, and other effects of the said Earl of Lucan."

The deed also contained a covenant by the earl for payment of the said annuity and a covenant for further assurance. It was admitted that a valid rent-charge issuing out of the said real estate had been created, but, such real estate being insufficient to pay the annuity, the annuitant sought to charge the personal estate. The chief clerk, in answer to an inquiry, certified in favour of the charge, and the executor thereupon took out a summons to vary this finding.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the executor, stated the facts.

Edward Ford, for Miss Cobden.—Having regard to the Bills of Sale Acts, I cannot contend that any chattels are charged, but there was an equitable reversionary interest in a sum of railway stock which was vested in trustees at the date of the annuity deed and which is still reversionary. The cases show that a voluntary assignment of such an interest is good, and I contend that a charge, although without consideration, operates as a partial assignment, and is therefore good: In re Way's Trusts, 13 W. R. 149, 2 De G. J. & S. 365; Kekewich v. Manning 1 De G. M. & G. 176; Donaldson v. Donaldson, 2 W. R. 691, Kay, 711; Milroy v. Lord, 4 De G. F. & J. 264, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 120; Richards v. Delbridge, 22 W. R. 584, L. R. 18 Eq. 11; Rycroft v. Christy, 3 Beav. 238; Woodroffe v. Johnston, 4 Ir. Ch. Rep. 319; Wilcocks v. Hannyngton, 5 Ir. Ch. Rep. 38.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the executor.—The charge must operate at law if at all; but as the law stands a voluntary assignment is good, a mere charge is bad. You cannot charge a chattel except for value: Lewin on Trusts, 8th ed., p. 70; Sloane v. Cadogan, reported in Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers, App. No. xxiv., 11th ed.; Edwards v. Jones, 1 My. & Cr. 226, 237, followed in Voyle v. Hughes, 2 W. R. 143, 2 Sm. & Giff. 18. Nothing short of an assignment will do. The case is one of contract, and must come under the rule that equity will not aid a volunteer to obtain specific performance. Lord Macnaghten in Tailby v. Official Receiver, 37 W. R. 513, at p. 519, 13 App. Cas. 523, at p. 549, says that "a contract for value for an equitable charge is as good an equitable charge as can be." The words "for value" are essential to the proposition: Cochrane v. Moore, 38 W. R. 588, 25 Q. B. D. 57. The document must be such as to constitute a trust for the donee. A transfer of an equitable interest does this. It the best gift that can be made when the interest is reversionary, but a mere charge effects nothing of the sort. The trustees could not have paid on production of this deed. The subject of the charge is the equitable reversionary interest, not the stock, and the trustees could not be made parties to an action to sell or enforce the charge as the trust for the earl himself does not arise till the tenant for life dies.

CHITTY, J.—The deed I have to deal with is a voluntary one. Four points arise on it. First, it creates a rent-charge on certain hereditaments to which the Earl of Lucan is entitled—i.e., a valid rent-charge which issues out of land, but does not, of course, issue out of chattels. Secondly, there is a covenant by the earl for payment of the annuity or rent-charge which creates a good debt answerable from the real and personal assets of the testator, but, the deed being voluntary, the covenantee is postponed to creditors for value. Thirdly, there is a covenant for further assurance, but, again, the deed being voluntary, the grantee of the annuity cannot have specific performance. Fourthly, at the time of the execution of the deed the earl had an equitable reversion in a fund vested in trustees. The deed recites that the earl was possessed of various properties, chattels, moneys, and securities, and the operative part charges them. There is no question of construction. If the deed had been for value, the reversionary interest would have been charged. But it is not conceded that the deed has any direct operation on the reversionary interest itself. Its operation, if any, is indirect, and by way of equitable charge or assignment.

Kekewich v. Manning, Donaldson v. Donaldson, and In re Way's Trusts have been referred to, and it has been argued that the earl, as owner of the reversion, had a right to assign it by way of gift so as to place the donee in the same position as himself by way of substitution. This proposition is accepted by the other side. The donee in such a case could have given notice to the trustees, and when the life dropped and the reversion fell in she could have gone to the trustees and asked for an assignment. But the question is whether in fact this deed does create a perfect equitable charge. Equity will not assist an imperfect gift, though it will aid in protecting a perfect gift. In Donaldson v. Donaldson Wood, V.C., said the transferee could go to the trustees and ask for a transfer, and could enforce his right in an action against them without making the donor a party. Now I cannot hold that proposition here in favour of this annuity, because the thing itself is not transferred. The utmost that has been done is to create a charge. If three years after the annuity was granted the tenant for life was still living, could the lady have instituted an action against the trustees for the purpose of having her annuity raised out of the reversionary interest? It is clear she could not. Could she have sued the donor? Clearly.

The point of the case is that what is given is not the thing itself, but a charge on the thing. Could the court order the thing which was not given to be sold for the purpose of raising an annuity? Clearly not; and the conclusion is that the gift is not perfect as it stands. The right, when carefully analyzed, depends on contract, and equity in such a case gives no assistance to volunteers seeking specific performance. The right which is claimed is not a mere right of having the thing which is given protected, but to have something which has not been given sold to make good what has been given.

simple bracket lever by which the ladder is secured at any required length." The patentee subsequently amended his specification by leave by striking out (1), (2), and (3), and substituting "The combination in a telescope ladder herein described, of means for raising, lowering, and stopping, all as herein described and shown in accompanying drawings." In an action for infringement,

Held, upon the construction of the entire specification before amendment, that the claim was really for a combination, and that therefore the amendment was only "a correction or explanation" within section 18 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, and did not make the specification as amended claim an invention substantially larger than, or substantially different from, the original claim; and consequently that amendment did not render the patent invalid.

Trial of action.

The plaintiff, as patentee, claimed in this action an injunction for the infringement of his patent, and damages or an account of profits. The defendant denied infringement, and also alleged that the patent was invalid, and by his particulars of objection alleged—(1) That the specification did not sufficiently distinguish which of the matters and things therein described were new and which were old; (2) That the amended specification claimed an invention larger than and differing from the original specification; (3) That if the defendant's apparatus was covered by the plaintiff's specification the alleged invention was not new, having been already published in six earlier specifications.

The plaintiff's patent was dated the 5th of October, 1886, and was for "a telescope ladder for domestic and other purposes."

The invention was described in the provisional specification as "A telescope ladder, designed to take the place of the cumbrous ladders now in use, being two distinct ladders of equal length, one drawing out of the other by pulling a cord at the side of the ladder, both ends of such cord being attached to the inner or sliding ladder, which is drawn out to its full extent with perfect ease in a few seconds of time. It can be adjusted to any height and stopped at every tread or nine inches in ascending or descending by means of a light strong lever bracket fixed to the lower ladder. This lever is raised by the ascending ladder and drops down under each tread, becoming locked by the sliding ladder descending and resting on it. This lever is raised and the sliding ladder released by a simple sliding rod running down the side of the lower ladder like the cord for raising, to within the convenient reach of the person working the ladder. The raising cord runs through pulleys near the top and bottom of the lower ladder. The steps or treads are flat, and placed edgewise near the face of each ladder: thus, being close behind each other, no inconvenience is felt when in use."

The complete specification contained a description of the invention by reference to drawings which accompanied it, and the claim was as follows:—

"Having now particularly described and ascertained the nature of my said invention and in what manner the same is to be performed, I declare that what I claim is—

"(1) The two ladders occupying the space of one only.

"(2) The ready means of working by the cord.

"(3) The simple bracket lever by which the ladder is secured at any required length."

Leave was subsequently obtained to amend this specification, which was done by striking out paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) from the claim, and substituting for them the following:—

"The combination in a telescope ladder as herein described with means for raising, lowering, and stopping all as herein described and shown in accompanying drawings."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Macrory, Q.C., for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff claims a combination, and none such exists in any of the alleged anticipations.

W. R. Bousfield, for the defendant.—All the parts of the plaintiff's invention are old. The original specification claimed three things, each of which was old; and no claim was made for a combination. A patentee cannot strike out of his specification things he has claimed and introduce instead a claim for a combination of them: 46 & 47 Vict. c. 57, s. 18, sub-section (2), and s. 5, sub-section (5). The combination is not the subject-matter of a patent: Williams v. Nye, 7 Rep. Pat. Cas. 62.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—Plaintiff has practically used old elements for a combination previously unknown, and it is good subject-matter for a patent. The original specification shows a manifest intention to claim the combination, and the amendment does not increase the claim: Hayward v. Hamilton, Griffin Pat. Cas. 1884-6, p. 115; Bateman v. Gray, 8 Ex. 906.

NORTH, J.—The claims in the original specification are not well expressed, but I have no doubt the plaintiff meant to claim the combination of the various things specified.

It is suggested that the claim does not accord with sub-section 5 of section 5 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, which says that "a specification, whether provisional or complete, must commence with the title, and in the case of a complete specification must end with a distinct statement of the invention claimed." So that whereas formerly a claim was not necessary, it is now required. But any difficulty caused by the section itself is removed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Siddell v. Vickers, 39 Ch. D. 92, 37 W. R. Dig. 133, which says that noncompliance with this section does not make the patent void, but that it is merely a directory provision to the comptroller or other law officer who deals with the matter when it comes before him, and if he is satisfied, mere noncompliance with this provision will not of itself make the patent void. In my opinion the original specification claimed what is expressly claimed in the amended specification; and as the whole combination is claimed there is no ground for saying that there ought to be a distinction of the specific parts claimed and which of them are old.

A further objection is taken that "the specification as amended claims an invention substantially larger than and different from the invention claimed by the specification as it stood before amendment." Now, sub-section 8 of section 18 of the Act of 1883 provides that "no amendment shall be allowed that would make the specification, as amended, claim an invention substantially larger than or substantially different from the invention claimed by the specification as it stood before amendment." But sub-section 1 provides that amendment may be made "by way of disclaimer, correction, or explanation," and in my opinion what has been done in this case is by way of correction or explanation, and not by way of disclaimer, and the result is that the plaintiff has not claimed an invention substantially larger than or substantially different from that which was claimed by the specification as it originally stood.

Another objection is that the invention is not new, as six prior specifications anticipate the plaintiff's invention. The evidence does not justify my arriving at such a conclusion. I am satisfied that, so far as the witnesses know, none of them have ever been employed at all, and the defendant has not been called as a witness, and he must necessarily have some knowledge upon the subject. The only other point is that the invention is not the proper subject-matter of a patent. It is said that telescopic ladders are old, and that endless cords and other means for working them are old, and that brackets or something similar for supporting the extended ladder are old, and I am asked to say that as this invention is merely a combination of certain old matters, it is not the proper subject-matter of a patent. I see no grounds for that conclusion. I should have anticipated evidence to be adduced to show that there was really nothing new in this invention, but it is entirely wanting. I am without evidence of public knowledge which might have rendered it a serious question whether there was a proper subject-matter for a patent. Having regard to this, and to the fact that at a time when he was acting as the plaintiff's agent he published a circular with reference to the plaintiff's ladders in which he referred to them as "in point of utility there is nothing better." With such a statement from a man experienced in this class of business I cannot come to the conclusion that this is not a proper subject-matter for a patent.

The question of infringement is not really in dispute. The suggested difference between the lever bracket of the defendant and the plaintiff's is apparently that the defendant's is a trifle less useful from a mechanical point of view. There is no defence in substance, and the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction and an account.

BILKE v. ROPER. (a.)

Will—Republication—Will of married woman during coverture—Death of husband—Subsequent testamentary instrument of widow containing no reference to will—Will and testamentary instrument admitted to probate.

In order that a will may be republished by a subsequent testamentary instrument, that instrument must contain sufficient reference to the will to raise the inference that the testator had in his mind the republication of his will, though no expression of direct intention is absolutely necessary.

By marriage settlement M. S. had a power of appointment over certain freehold messuages and a sum of £2,000 New £3 per Cents., being property comprised in such settlement. By her will, made in 1878, in her husband's lifetime, she exercised this power, and also purported to dispose of all other property over which she had any power of disposition. After her husband's death, M. S. executed a testamentary instrument, subsequently admitted to probate with the will, not referring in any way to the will. M. S. died in 1888, possessed of other estate, including the property mentioned in the testamentary instrument, to which she was absolutely entitled, besides the settled property and certain separate estate.

Held, applying the principle of Barnes v. Crowe, 1 Ves. jun. 497, that, as the testamentary instrument did not contain anything from which it could be, directly or indirectly, inferred that the testatrix had in her mind the republishing of her will, such instrument did not act as a republication.

Rowley v. Eyton, 2 Mer. 128, explained.

(a.) Reported by W. H. QUARRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By an indenture of settlement made the 14th day of November, 1864, between Maria Smith, then Maria Rockhill, widow, of the first part, Joseph Smith, of the second part, and the defendants R. Roper and H. C. Smith of the third part, prior to the marriage afterwards solemnized between the said Maria Smith and Joseph Smith, a freehold messuage at Dunmow, in the county of Essex, and two messuages at Upway, in the county of Dorset, and a sum of £2,000 New Three per Cent. Annuities were settled by the said Maria Smith in trust for herself during her life, and after her decease in trust for her husband during his life, and after the decease of the survivor of them in trust for such persons as she should by deed or will appoint.

Maria Smith, by her will, dated the 17th of December, 1878, in exercise of the powers in the settlement contained, appointed the messuage at Dunmow, after the decease of herself and her husband, to Richard Roper and his heirs, and as to the premises at Upway, and all other the real estate, if any, not thereinbefore disposed of, and comprised in the said indenture, she appointed the same, after the death of the survivor of herself and her husband, to the use of the defendants Richard Roper and Henry Clark Smith and their heirs, in trust for sale, and to hold the proceeds upon the trusts thereinafter declared; and in further exercise of the said powers, and of every other power enabling her thereunto, she directed, limited, and appointed that the said sum of £2,000 New £3 per Cent. Annuities should be sold and the money arising therefrom disposed of as thereinafter mentioned; that was to say, she directed and appointed that the proceeds of the sale and the money arising from the sale of her real estate, and all other, if any, her moneys, property, and effects over which she had any power of disposition, should be disposed of in manner thereinafter mentioned, and the residue, subject to the payment of expenses of proving and executing her will, unto and amongst all her nephews and nieces (the children of her brother, the defendant H. D. Darden, and sisters, the defendant Elizabeth Bowdith, widow, and Mary Ann Bowditch, deceased) living at her decease, and their child or children in manner therein directed, and the testatrix appointed the defendants R. Roper, H. C. Smith, and her nephew, the defendant John Durden, her executors.

Joseph Smith died on the 24th of June, 1884. After the death of Joseph Smith, Maria Smith executed an instrument of a testamentary character in the following terms:—

"Dunmow, July 30th, 1885.

"This is a present to Oswald Newman Roper from his aunt Maria Smith, by the express wish of his late uncle, Joseph Smith, a few weeks before his death. 10 shares of £10 each in the Dunmow Gas Company.

"MARIA SMITH.

"Witness—
"HENRY C. SMITH.
"ELIZA CLARK."

Maria Smith died on the 19th of June, 1888, and her said will and codicil were proved at the principal registry on the 26th of September, 1888, by the executors therein named.

Maria Smith died possessed of the following property, in addition to the settled property and dividends and rents accruing thereon, and the ten gas shares bequeathed to the said Oswald Newman Roper—namely, £1,000 Consolidated Annuities, with dividends accruing thereon; nineteen shares of £10 each in the Dunmow Gas Co.; a sum of £250 secured upon mortgage from a Mr. Whiffin, with interest thereon; household furniture of the value of £144, or thereabouts; cash in the house, at her bankers, and in the savings bank, amounting to £73, or thereabouts.

The sum of £1,000 Consols and the gas shares were the property of the testatrix before her marriage, and remained up to the time of her death standing in her name.

The question arose whether the testatrix was or was not intestate as to this last-mentioned property. This depended upon this point—whether the document of the 30th of July, 1885, operated as a republication by her, after she acquired a complete power of disposition, of a will made while she had only a limited power of disposition (her will being made by her when a feme covert) in order to make that will speak from the time of republication and pass that property to which she was, at the time of her death, absolutely entitled.

E. Crawley, for one of the legatees.—If the document or codicil admitted to probate was a republication of the will, everything passes under it; if not, there must be an inquiry as to the separate estate. Republication is necessary, applying the principle of the decision in Willock v. Noble, 23 W. R. 809, L. R. 7 H. L. 580. By section 34 of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26) the will dates from the time of republication. Du Hourmelin v. Sheldon, 2 W. R. 639, 19 Beav. 389, is no authority. In that case the will was made in 1824, and confirmed in 1829. The principle of constructive republication is given in 1 Jarm., 4th ed., p. 193. In Rowley v. Eyton, 2 Mer. 128, the codicil was held to be a republication of the will so as to subject after-acquired copyholds subject to a devise for payment of debts. In Skinner v. Ogle, 4 Notes of Cas. 74, the will was made before the Wills Act, the codicil after. The cases show that the very act of making a codicil is a recognition of the will then existing, and everything admitted to probate counting as a will has effect as such: 1 Powell on Devises, 3rd ed., p. 610; Utterton v. Robins, 1 A. & E. 423, 2 Nev. & M. 819. Burton v. Newbery, 24 W. R. 388, 1 Ch. D. 234, seems to be against my contention, but that case is explained in Green v. Tribe, 27 W. R. 39, 9 Ch. D. 231, and in Follett v. Pettman, 31 W. R. 779, 23 Ch. D. 337. In the present case the testatrix did not call the instrument a codicil; if she had done so there is no doubt it would have acted as a republication.

He also referred to Herbert v. Turball, 1 Keb. 589.

Waggett, for H. Durden, one of the next of kin.—The will can only operate on the separate estate. There has been no republication. An intention to revive must be shown: section 22 of the Wills Act. The admission to probate does not affect the rights of the parties. The intention is the point, and there is no reference to any previous testamentary disposition: In re Steele, 17 W. R. 45, 1 P. & D. 575. The fact that the document is not called a codicil is important.

He also referred to Price v. Parker, 16 Sim. 198.

H. Robertson, for Elizabeth Bowditch, one of the next of kin, argued to the same effect.

V. R. Smith, for the trustees of the will.

Crawley, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

August 6.—STIRLING, J.—This case raises a singular point, and one not entirely covered by authority. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] In the document of July 30, 1885, there is no reference whatever to the prior will of December 17, 1878, the document is not called a codicil, and there is no attestation clause attached to it. Probate has been granted of both these instruments, and the question is whether the second testamentary instrument of July 31, 1885, constitutes a republication of the will of December 17, 1878.

Now, according to the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Willock v. Noble, it is quite clear that, as regards property acquired by a married woman after the death of her husband, a will made by her during the coverture would have no effect, unless it was republished after the determination of the coverture. Apart from any statutory requirements, it has long been settled that a will may be republished, either by a re-execution of it or by a codicil, and according to the notes to Duppa v. Mayo, 1 Saund. 278, 6th ed., 1845, "anything which showed an intent that the will should be of subsequent date was a sufficient republication." Of course a codicil to a will, if it refers to the will and shows such an intention, would be a republication. Now the learned author of Williams on Executors, Vaughan-Williams, J., says, 1 Williams' Executors, 7th ed., p. 211:—"A codicil will amount to a republication of the will to which it refers, whether the codicil be or be not annexed to the will, or be or be not expressly confirmatory of it, for every codicil is, in construction of law, part of a man's will, whether it be so described in such codicil or not; and as such furnishes conclusive evidence of the testator's, considering his will as then existing."

It must, however, be borne in mind that the learned author was there speaking of a codicil which refers to the will, and while the long list of cases stated in the note forms an ample justification to the learned author's proposition of law, in every one of those cases, with one apparent exception, with which I will deal presently, there appears to have been an express reference in the codicil to the preceding will. In most of those cases there were the usual formal words, but in some of them that did not occur. In Serocold and Hunter v. Heming, 2 Lee's Eccl. Reports, p. 490, Richard Heming, the testator, had written at the bottom of his will immediately under his name and seal affixed to the last sheet, as follows:—"London, 16th of October, 1755.—I likewise give to Mrs. Lucretia Luxford £25 a year for her life, and to my black servant, Peter Saville, £10 a year for his life, the said annuities to be paid out of my estate by my executors above-named: Witness my hand, Richard Heming. Witnesses, John Serocold, J. Straw." In that case, although the will was not mentioned in terms, there was a plain reference to it, and it was held by Sir George Lee that the words "my executors above-named" constituted "such a reference to the first will as would revive it at least as to the personal estate which alone was in question." The case, however, which approaches the most nearly of any of them to the present case is Rowley v. Eyton, and, according to the report, the testator, after making his will, purchased several copyhold estates, which he surrendered "to such uses as he should by will or any codicil thereto appoint"; and he subsequently made a codicil to his will, also duly executed, to pass real estates in the words following:—"I hereby give, devise, and bequeath unto my son, Thomas Eyton, and his heirs for ever, all my copyhold estates within the Manor of Wrockwardine." Apparently, therefore, there was in the codicil no reference to any prior will. I have, however, examined the registrar's book, and I have also referred to the original will, and I find that the report does not state the whole of the codicil, and that the codicil, as a matter of fact, began with the formal words, "This is a codicil to the will of," &c. Consequently, none of the cases which are referred to by Vaughan-Williams, J., or have been cited to me, constitute an authority for what I am asked to do in this case, or support the proposition that a reference to the will is unnecessary.

I think that the best statement of the law upon the subject occurs in Barnes v. Crowe, 1 Ves. jun. 485. In that case Lord Commissioner Eyre says this (p. 497):—"If we disentangle ourselves from the rule that there shall be no republication without re-execution, the principle that a codicil attested by three witnesses shall be a republication seems intelligible and clear. The testator's acknowledgment of his former will, considered as his will at the execution of the codicil, if not directly expressed in that instrument, must be implied from the nature of the instrument itself; as by the nature of it, it supposes a former will, refers to it, and becomes part of it, and, being attested by three witnesses, his implied declaration and acknowledgment seems also to be attested by three witnesses. Before the statute it was no part of the essence of the obligation that the will should be re-executed. Anything that expressed the testator's intention that the will should be considered as of a subsequent estate was sufficient. Since the statute re-execution of the will is not necessary, but nothing more is required than a writing, according to the provisions of that statute, expressing that intent. Therefore, Lord Hardwicke might well say he saw no great difference between the words 'I desire this codicil may be part of my will' and the words 'I republish,' which it was there admitted would have done. In the Attorney-General v. Downing Lord Camden supposed a particular intent to republish ought to appear, and that annexation or particular expressions in the codicil would demonstrate that intention. If that was necessary, not only Lord Hardwicke's opinion cannot stand, neither can Acherly v. Vernon, for there was no particular intention to republish, but the testator referred to the will, made alterations, and gave sufficient demonstration that when making and executing the codicil he considered the will as his will, and from that republication was implied, but it was not particularly in his thoughts to do any formal act of republication. Upon considering these cases, I confess I am inclined to stand upon the general proposition stated by Lord Hardwicke to show the will in the case before us was republished."

It seems to me that we must find something from which to draw an inference that the testator, when making the codicil, had in his mind the republishing of his will. If I apply that test to the present case I find nothing from which I can draw any such inference, and I accordingly think that this testamentary instrument does not amount to a republication of his will. The application therefore fails upon that ground.

County court—Costs—Refresher—Adjournment for want of time—Continuous sittings—County Court Rules, 1889, Costs, item 78.

Where a county court is held from day to day, it rests with the judge to say whether the sittings shall be one continuous sitting or a succession of several sittings, so that, when a case which appears in the list is not reached on one day, but is heard in its turn upon another day, a refresher may be allowed by order of the judge as upon an adjournment for want of time under item 78 in the scale of costs of the County Court Rules, 1889.

This was an application on the part of the defendant in an action for a prohibition against the county court judge at Birmingham to prevent the recovery of a sum of £1 3s. 6d. which the judge had allowed to the plaintiff by way of a refresher to counsel under item 78 of the County Court Scale of Costs in the County Court Rules of 1889.

The case was in the list for hearing at the Birmingham Court on June 18, 19, and 20, but only came on for hearing on June 20, when it lasted for an hour, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. Counsel then applied for a refresher, and the question was referred to the registrar, who allowed the fee, and the judge, before whom the matter was brought on appeal, confirmed the decision of the registrar.

Willes, for the defendant.—This is a case which is not provided for by the County Court Rules of 1889, and by section 164 of the County Court Act of 1888 in such a case the rules of the High Court shall apply. In the High Court there is no such practice of allowing a refresher for a case which has not been commenced. The words of item 78 are, "where the trial lasts more than one whole day, or is adjourned for want of time, further consideration, or upon payment of the costs of the day, a refresher may be allowed by order of judge not exceeding £1 3s. 6d. where the subject-matter does not exceed £50." Here there was no application for adjournment. The case remained in its place in the list and came on in its turn exactly as it would have done in the High Court. The trial did not last more than an hour.

Muir Mackenzie, for the plaintiff.—The cases which apply to refreshers in the High Court, such as Brown v. Sewell, 29 W. R. 295, 16 Ch. D. 517, and The Neera, 28 W. R. 816, 5 P. D. 118, do not apply to a county court, which is regulated by its own rules. The words of item 78 referred to distinctly cover this case. County courts do not sit continuously, but only "on such days as the judge shall appoint for the purpose, and notice of the day and hour on which each court is to be held shall, three months before the holding thereof, be affixed in some conspicuous place; but any judge may from time to time hold additional and adjourned courts." Each of these days was a court day as fixed by the judge, and it is a mere accident that they should have followed in succession, as he himself has said in his notes. [HAWKINS, J.—A summons to attend a sitting is not repeated for each day.] It is a matter of discretion, and the judge is entitled to treat each day as a separate sitting. Under item 63 it is the practice to allow the solicitor's fee for attendance as a matter of course.

Willes, in reply.—Each day is not a separate sitting, or there would be a distinct adjournment each day and a separate list, which is not the case. It can only be held an adjournment by operation of law. [HAWKINS, J.—Is there any form of order for adjournment?] No; there is no such form, and the Act clearly contemplates a continuous sitting, for in section 88 it says, "If upon the return-day, or at any continuation or adjournment," and the same words are used in section 91. By section 106 the judge "may adjourn from time to time." What is contemplated is a judicial act, and not a mere lapse of time. [HAWKINS, J.—Is there any rule which prevents a judge from making each day a special sitting?] There is no such rule, but here the judge is expressing a judgment on what should be inferred, not relating what he did as a matter of fact. The adjournment refers to a trial which has actually commenced.

HAWKINS, J.—In the result we come to the conclusion that we cannot interfere with the jurisdiction of the county court judge. We cannot say that the judge had no jurisdiction. I do not pretend to say that I should have allowed the refresher, but as to the character of the adjournments it may be possible to extend the cause lists from one day to another. The real question is whether, inasmuch as the case was not reached, the judge had a right to allow a refresher. That depends on whether the sitting was a continuous one or, as he contends, a succession of adjournments. The judge says on the record what has been his practice in regard to this matter. He says that under item 63 the attendance fee of a solicitor is allowed under similar circumstances without an order. He says also that it is a mere accident that sittings in Birmingham are from day to day. If we adopt this view, and the judge certainly had the jurisdiction to make them separate sittings, we are not at liberty to deny that he did so as a matter of fact. But it is said that item 78 only applies to trials which have begun. I do not agree with that reading, and think it means rather when the cause cannot be tried. It provides for two states of things—(1) When the trial begins and lasts for more than a day; and (2) when the court is wholly adjourned for want of time. The case is not the less adjourned in either of these cases; I cannot, therefore, help coming to the conclusion that this rule is not limited in the way suggested. We ought not, therefore, to interfere with the discretion exercised, but, under the circumstances, we think that the appeal should be refused, without costs.

STEPHEN, J.—This is a case in which I should be peculiarly reluctant to take a course adverse to that of the county court judge. The rules affecting such questions are administered by the county court judges, and are peculiar to their courts. They must know a great deal more than we can on such a point, whether of adjournment or refresher. The judge has here allowed the refresher on the ground that each day is a distinct sitting, and, looking at all the circumstances, I am not disposed to dispute his jurisdiction. If there is any doubt, the Rule Committee can alter it; but so long as the rule stands the county court judge is the best interpreter of it. As to what is adjournment and what continuation, it seems to me very much a matter of words, and not easy to distinguish. It does not seem to be of much importance whether you say that you will sit for several days or hold several sittings in succession. I think the appeal should be dismissed, without costs.

ROLLES v. NEWELL. (a.)

Shipping—Thames navigation—Steamboat towing barges into dock—"Navigating"—Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii.), ss. 8, 10—Bye-law 59.

The towing of barges into a dock by a steamboat is not "navigating a steamboat on the river" so as to render the master of the steamboat liable to a penalty under bye-law 59 made under the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act, 1859, which prohibits "a person in charge of and navigating any steamboat on the River Thames" within certain limits, from towing at the same time more than six barges exceeding ten tons each.

Case stated by a deputy stipendiary magistrate. The master of a steamboat having collected thirty-one barges immediately outside the Victoria Docks, towed them all into dock at once, under the directions of the pierhead foreman of the London and St. Katherine Docks Co., in accordance with the orders of the dock master of the company. The barges were towed four abreast, and exceeded ten tons each. The plan of so towing barges had been practised for many years at the docks under the regulations and direction of the dock officials. These regulations were made under the London and St. Katherine Docks Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii.), and the Acts incorporated therewith. By section 56 of the Victoria (London) Docks Act, 1853, a distance of 100 yards into the river is prescribed as the limit within which the powers of the dock master shall be exercised, and by section 52 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), the harbour or dock master may give directions for regulating the manner in which any vessel shall enter into the dock. The steamboat and barges started within the distance of 100 yards from the dock entrance. The master was summoned for infringing bye-law 59 of the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act, 1859, which provides that "if any person when in charge of and navigating any steamboat on the river between Vauxhall Bridge and the entrance to the Victoria Docks shall at the same time tow more than six barges—exceeding ten tons each—attached thereto the person in charge of or navigating the same shall incur a penalty." The magistrate convicted the defendant, who appealed.

Cohen, Q.C. (H. Avory with him), for the appellant.—The tug was not being navigated within the meaning of the bye-law. To so hold would be unreasonable, because the time required to take thirty barges in separate batches of six would be excessive and impossible with a falling tide, unless several tugs were employed. That would entail unreasonable expense. Nor does the bye-law apply to that portion of the river where the navigation took place, because by section 100 of the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act, 1859, nothing in that Act is to lessen the rights and privileges of any company of proprietors of any docks within the limits of the Act, or any of their officers, with respect to the navigation in the said docks, or in anywise relating thereto. That section keeps alive the jurisdiction of the dock master within 100 yards from the dock entrance, as prescribed by section 52 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, and bye-law 59, if applicable to these limits, is inconsistent with it.

C. E. Jones, for the respondent.—The act of towing barges into dock by means of a tug necessitates the navigation of the tug. The case of Elmore v. Hunter, 26 W. R. 215, 3 C. P. D. 116, decides that such a use of a steamboat is navigation within the meaning of this Act and its bye-laws. The use of motive power on the river is distinguished as navigation from the use of motive power from the shore. That is shown by bye-law 61, which permits unlicensed persons to be employed in hauling, but not in rowing. The exception of rowing covers all means of propelling on the river, and of course includes a steamboat.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—We have in this case to construe a bye-law which, if fairly construed and confined within reasonable limits, is a very reasonable and useful bye-law. The words are these: "That if any person, when in charge of and navigating any steamboat on the river between Vauxhall Bridge and the entrance to the Victoria Docks, shall at the same time tow more than six barges, lighters, or other craft exceeding ten tons each, attached thereto, or if such barges, lighters, or other craft shall not be well and sufficiently attached and fastened to such steamboat and to each other so that the same or either of them shall go adrift, the owner thereof, or the person in charge of or navigating the same, shall incur a penalty not exceeding forty shillings." What is the fair construction of that? It seems to me that the difficulty in the way of the respondent's contention is to bring the facts of the case within any reasonable construction of the word "navigating."

I do not express my opinion with any great degree of confidence because I know that on such questions as these different minds will take different views. But one must look at the object of the bye-law, and that object, as it seems to me, was to prevent the danger pointed out by Grove, J., in Elmore v. Hunter, that where a tug was towing a long string of barges up or down the stream, and came to the bends of the river, the tug, on rounding the curve, might lose control, and the barges proceed on their former course. It is quite reasonable to suppose that when navigating along the course of the river a tug would not have proper control over more than six barges, and, therefore, so far as the ordinary navigation of the river is concerned, this is a very proper bye-law, and had the tug in the present case been towing the barges along the stream it would undoubtedly have come within the bye-law. But that was not what happened here. All that the tug did was to haul the barges, which were already collected immediately outside the dock gates, through the gates into the dock. I asked whether, supposing that the hauling power, instead of being a steamboat, had been a steam-engine fixed on the land, the process of hauling the barges into the dock could have been said to be "navigating" them, and it was admitted that it could not, but then the reason given for that was that that method of shifting the position of craft was expressly excepted by bye-law 61. It may be that it was so excepted, but I do not agree that the mere fact that one mode of shifting craft was excepted from the term "navigation" necessarily goes to show that every other mode of shifting them was intended to be included within it.

No doubt, as an abstract proposition, the word "navigate," if used in the widest sense of the term, would include such an operation as was conducted here, but I do not think that that operation was a navigation of the tug within the meaning of the bye-law, having regard to the object with which it was framed.

The question whether the bye-law applies to this particular portion of the river, I will not decide, as we have not heard the respondent's counsel upon the point, though, as at present advised, I am strongly of opinion that it does not.

The magistrate's decision was wrong, and the conviction must be quashed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

Conviction quashed.

HANDLEY v. HANDLEY AND WROUGHTON. (a.)

Divorce—Practice—Guilty wife—Access to children—Discretion of judge—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 35—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 4.

There is no general rule of practice to compel a judge of the Divorce Division to refuse a mother, who has been divorced on account of her adultery, access to the children of the marriage. The judge of that Division is, by section 35 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, given the fullest discretion in the matter.

In January, 1886, a decree for dissolution of marriage on account of the wife's adultery was made absolute, and the custody of the children—two boys, now aged respectively eleven and thirteen years—was given to the father, but the decree contained no declaration as to access by the mother.

The mother (who, in February, 1886, married the co-respondent) did, in fact, however, from time to time visit the children, with the permission of the father, until June, 1890, when the father, who had then recently married again, withdrew such permission.

An application to the court by the mother for an order for access was refused by Hannen, P.; and the Court of Appeal now affirmed this decision.

Appeal from the refusal of an application made to the Divorce Division by the respondent in the suit for an order that she should have liberty of access to the children of the marriage which was the subject of the divorce suit.

On July 16, 1885, Mr. J. W. Handley Davenport Handley obtained a degree nisi for divorce from his wife, on the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent, E. N. Wroughton. By the decree nisi the custody of the children was given to the father, but the decree contained no order that the mother should have access to the children of the marriage, two boys now aged respectively 13 and 11½. On January 26, 1886, the decree was made absolute, but it contained no order as to access to the children. In February, 1886, the divorced wife married the co-respondent. From the date of the decree absolute down to June, 1890, the mother was in fact allowed by the father to have access to the children, whom she was frequently in the habit of visiting at their school. They were also allowed to be with her in the holidays. In March, 1888, she applied to the court for an order giving her the right of access to the children, but the application was refused, an affidavit having been made by the father's solicitor to the effect that the father was willing to allow the mother access. She continued to visit the boys at their school until June, 1890, when, without any previous intimation, just as she was about to pay them a visit, she was informed by the schoolmaster that, in consequence of the father's directions to that effect, she could no longer be permitted to see them. She then made the application now in question, for an order that she should have access to the children. The application was heard before Sir James Hannen, P., on July 23, 1890, and was resisted by the father on the ground that he had been informed that on her visits to the children she had endeavoured to prejudice them against himself and his present wife (he having recently married again), and that she was likely to estrange the children from him. The mother, in her evidence, entirely denied this charge.

The President said that the substantial question was tried before him on the previous application (March, 1888), and he referred to the fact that the general course of practice in the Divorce Court was not to grant a guilty wife access to the children of the marriage. That in the present case, however, the mother had been allowed access by the father's indulgence, but that the father was not bound to allow his children to associate with the co-respondent which might create confusion in their minds, and he accordingly refused the application.

From this refusal the mother now appealed.

By section 35 of the Divorce Court Act of 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), "in any suit or other proceeding for obtaining a judicial separation or a decree of nullity of marriage, and on any petition for dissolving a marriage, the court may from time to time, before making its final decree, make such interim orders, and may make such provision in the final decree, as it may deem just and proper with respect to the custody, maintenance, and education of the children the marriage of whose parents is the subject of such suit or other proceeding, and may, if it shall think fit, direct proper proceedings to be taken for placing such children under the protection of the Court of Chancery." Section 4 of the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61 extends this power by enabling the court to make such orders from to time after a final decree.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., and Oswald, for the appellant.—The President seems to have acted on what has been considered to be a rule of practice binding the Divorce Court—viz., that a guilty wife ought never to be granted access to the children. This practice originated in consequence of section 4 of Talfourd's Act (2 & 3 Vict. c. 54), which was passed in 1839, and the practice continued after the passing of the Divorce Act of 1857: Clout v. Clout and Hollebone, 30 L. J. P. & M. 176, 9 W. R. Div. Dig. 11; Bent v. Bent and Footman, 30 L. J. P. & M. 175, 9 W. R. Div. Dig. 18; Seddon v. Seddon and Doyle, 31 L. J. P. & M. 101, 10 W. R. Div. Dig. 18; although in Taylor v. Taylor and Wolters, 39 L. J. P. & M. 23, 18 W. R. Div. Dig. 6, that practice was departed from. But Talfourd's Act was repealed in 1873 by the Infants Custody Act (36 Vict. c. 12), ss. 1 and 2, and therefore no such rule of practice ought now to be accepted as binding on the Divorce Division. Further, section 35 of the Divorce Act, 1857, in fact gives the judge of the Divorce Court discretion to deal with such matter: Symington v. Symington, L. R. 2 Sc. App. 415; having regard, however, to the interest of all parties concerned. In the present case the evidence shows that the children regard their mother with affection, and the father having allowed the mother to have access to them until June last, it is unfair and cruel of him now to deny her access to them.

Inderwick, Q.C., and Searle, for the father, admitting that there was no inflexible rule binding the judge of the Divorce Division in the matter, were not further called on.

LINDLEY, L.J., after stating the facts, proceeded.—The President of the Divorce Division declined to make any order on the application made by the mother, the respondent in the suit, and the practical effect of that refusal is to allow the father to exercise his discretion as to the amount of access, if any, which the mother should have to the children. The question turns upon the true construction of section 35 of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, which, though it had been enlarged as to the time within which orders might be made, by section 4 of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61 is still the guiding section. The language of section 35 is express and unmistakable. It gives the judge of the Divorce Court a discretion (I do not say an unappealable discretion) to make such orders as to the custody of the children as he may deem "just and proper." The force of those words is apparent to any lawyer who bears in mind the doctrines of common law courts and courts of equity as to the custody of children. Both the common law and the chancery doctrines are excluded by the section, and the judge of the Divorce Court is to have power to make such order as he may think "just and proper," though of course any judge in exercising his discretion would consider the whole of the law and the special circumstances of the case. This construction has, as I understand it, been put on section 35 from the first, and is the construction warranted by the language of Lord Cairns in Symington v. Symington. It appears to have been the practice of the Divorce Court, founded on Talfourd's Act, not to give the custody of children to a wife who had been found guilty of adultery, or even to allow her access to them, and the cases of Clout v. Clout and Hollebone and Bent v. Bent and Footman illustrate that, though in Taylor v. Taylor and Wolters, with the consent of the husband, Lord Penzance allowed the guilty wife access to the child. I do not say that there is any hard and fast rule that the custody of children can never be given to a wife under such circumstances; in some cases it may be just and proper to do so. The question, then, is whether under the circumstances of the present case this court can take a view of what is just and proper, different from that which the learned President has taken. I do not think we can. To induce the court to differ from a discretionary order it must be shown that the judge had overlooked some special circumstance or had professed to act upon a hard and fast rule. That is not the case here. The husband, until he remarried, allowed his late wife to have access to the children. His marrying again made a great difference. He might well say then, "My late wife broke up my first home; if I do not take care she may break up my second home too." I am not prepared to say that on that ground alone the husband was not justified in desiring that his late wife should not have access to the children.

The appeal must be dismissed.

comprise the whole context of the Act, and are not limited to the context of section 125.

In the case of a debtor residing at his decease, and for the greater part of the six months previously, out of England, the provisions of section 95 will apply, giving jurisdiction to the High Court—i.e., the Court of Bankruptcy—over the estate in England of a debtor not resident in England.

Appeal from an order of the registrar, for the administration in bankruptcy of the estate of a debtor dying insolvent.

R. M. Evans had died insolvent at Mayumba, on the West Coast of Africa, a place not in British territory. He was a British subject, whose wife and family were domiciled in England, but who had resided on and off for several years in West Africa, where he traded and "had carried on business there for the greater part of the six months immediately prior to his decease." His property vested in his wife as executrix, but, a petition having been presented by a creditor, the registrar made an order for the administration of the estate in bankruptcy. Against this order the executrix now appealed.

Rutherford, for the appellant.—By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 125, sub-section 10, the court having jurisdiction over a deceased debtor's affairs means "the court within the jurisdiction of which the debtor resided or carried on business for the greater part of the six months immediately prior to his death." There was no such court in this case, and no bankruptcy court has any jurisdiction over this debtor's estate. The registrar held that the note to Form 11 in the Bankruptcy Rules of 1886 brought section 95 of the Act into operation, giving the High Court in London bankruptcy jurisdiction in the case of a debtor not resident in England. Form 11, for a petition in the case of a deceased debtor, runs as follows:—"That the said A. B. for the greater part of the six months next preceding his decease resided (or carried on business) at ———, within the jurisdiction of this court (or, as the case may be, following the terms of section 95)." This last note is not sufficient to enlarge the jurisdiction given under section 125: In re Baker, 38 W. R. 417, 44 Ch. D. 262.

Cummins, for the respondent.—The forms and rules must be read into the Act. Sub-section 1 of section 125 specifically refers to the form prescribed, and sub-section 6 mentions that Part III., as to the administration of the property of a bankrupt—with all the modifications introduced by section 125 for the case of a deceased debtor, is to apply. Section 95, in reference to debtors "resident out of England," applies to Part III., and must, therefore, be read into the provisions of section 125. By section 95 the High Court is given jurisdiction over such cases. The petition here was, therefore, properly presented in the High Court, since there was no local court having jurisdiction.

Rutherford replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 14.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the registrar made an order under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, for the administration of a deceased debtor's estate. The executrix appeals on the ground that the registrar had no jurisdiction in this case to make such an order. The debt of the deceased debtor was undoubtedly of sufficient amount to support a petition in bankruptcy, but he had lived for more than six months previous to his decease on the West Coast of Africa out of British jurisdiction, and he died there. Section 125 provides for the petition of a creditor for the administration of a deceased debtor's estate in the prescribed form. Sub-section 10 of this section goes on to say that "unless the context otherwise requires, 'court' in this section means the court within the jurisdiction of which the debtor resided or carried on business for the greater part of the six months immediately prior to his decease." There was clearly no court within the jurisdiction of which the debtor had for the last six months of his life resided, therefore the words "unless the context otherwise requires it" come into operation. The context referred to embraces the whole Act, and not merely the context of section 125. Now section 95 provides that "if the debtor is not resident in England" the petition shall be presented to the High Court. That means the Court of Bankruptcy. Looking at the prescribed form under section 125, Form 11, in the Bankruptcy Rules of 1886, we find that there is a provision in it for following the terms of section 95 where necessary "as the case may be." It is clear that section 125, for the administration of a deceased debtor's estate, was to comprise cases coming within the general description given by section 95, that is to say, debtors at the time of their decease and six months previously resident out of England. The context in section 95, read with section 125, gives the High Court—i.e., the Bankruptcy Court—jurisdiction over such cases. This appeal must be, therefore, dismissed.

A., who was a shareholder in the defendant company, sold his shares, and the purchaser was entered on the register as the owner of the shares. Subsequently A. purported to transfer some of these shares to another person, from whom the plaintiffs bought them. Before the transfer was executed by the plaintiffs or the price paid, the transfer form was taken to the defendants' office, and the defendants' secretary wrote upon it the words "certificate lodged." No certificate had in fact been lodged. The plaintiffs, relying upon this "certification," paid the price of the shares. The defendants subsequently discovered that the transferor had no title to the shares, and refused to recognize the plaintiffs' title. The plaintiffs then brought an action to recover the value of the shares.

Held, that the "certification" amounted to a representation that the transferor had produced to the person certifying, such documents as on the face of them showed a primâ facie title in the transferor to transfer the shares, but did not amount to a warranty of the title of the transferor to the shares; that the giving of the "certification" by the secretary of the company was not ultrà vires, and, though the company were estopped from denying the truth of the facts certified, they were not estopped from denying the title of the transferor to transfer the shares; and that, as the company could not be held liable for a mere careless misrepresentation, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover.

Held, further, that the "certification" was not a representation as to the credit and ability of the transferor within section 6 of Lord Tenterden's Act.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.) was read by LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an action brought by the purchasers of shares in the defendant company against the company for the value of 195 shares which the plaintiffs have bought, and the value of which the plaintiffs say they have lost by reason of the wrongful acts of the company.

The 195 shares are divisible into two parcels—viz., 135 shares bought from a person named Lupton, on the faith of what is called a "certification," and 60 shares bought from a person named Angel. As regards these 60 shares it appeared, however, when the facts were investigated, that the company never had refused to recognize the plaintiffs' title to them, and that the company had done nothing wrong. There is no necessity for alluding further to them.

The facts as to the 135 shares are as follows:—One Powter was the registered holder of 1,000 shares in the defendant company, and he had the usual certificate under the seal of the company certifying him to be so. He sold and transferred the whole of these shares to Maitland and Balfour, and his certificate was lodged with the company to enable them to complete their title. After this Powter purported to sell and transfer 135 of these same shares to Lupton, and Lupton in his turn transferred them to the plaintiff Cuthbert, to whom he had agreed to sell 135 shares in the company. Both transfers were certificated, as it is called, by the secretary of the company, or by someone acting for him. The plaintiff Bishop was Cuthbert's principal in this transaction, and on the faith of the certification of the transfer from Lupton to Cuthbert Bishop paid Lupton the price of the shares; and as the shares really belonged to Maitland and Balfour, and not to the plaintiffs Cuthbert and Bishop, the company refused to recognize their title. The plaintiffs contend that the company is estopped by the certification from denying Lupton's title, and is bound, therefore, either to accept Cuthbert as the present owner of the 135 shares or to pay the value of them to Bishop. This contention renders it necessary to ascertain the precise meaning and legal effect of a certification, a term better known to business men than to lawyers. The certification is in these terms:—"Certificate lodged." Then follow the name of the company and the signature of the secretary, or of the person signing for him. The certification is on the margin of Lupton's transfer to Cuthbert, and the transfer identifies by their numbers the 135 shares transferred to him. The practice of giving certifications has arisen from the difficulty felt by members of the Stock Exchange in settling their accounts as buyers and sellers of shares when the seller's certificate of title does not accompany his transfer. If the seller's certificate includes more shares than he sells, he does not deliver it to the buyer with the transfer, but the seller produces his certificate and the transfer to an officer of the company, and he certificates the transfer, and buyers and their brokers act on the faith of this certification just as they would if the certificate produced to the company had been produced to and lodged with themselves. No fee is paid for a certification. In every case the certification must be read in connection with the transfer on which it is put. The object of the certification is to enable the transferor to satisfy the transferee that he, the transferor, can make a good title to the shares mentioned in the transfer. This he can only do if he is himself the registered owner of the shares mentioned in the transfer, or if he has a transfer from the registered owner to himself, or someone through whom he claims by a transfer or series of transfers. The certification, therefore, to be of any use at all, must amount to a representation that the transferor has produced to the person certifying such documents as on the face of them show a primâ facie title in the transferor to transfer the shares mentioned in the transfer, or, in other words, that the transferor has produced to the person certifying either what purports to be a certificate of the title of the transferor to the shares mentioned in the transfer, or the equivalent of such a document—in other words, what purports to be a certificate of the title of someone else to those shares, and one or more documents purporting to transfer those shares from such person to the transferor.

The evidence in this case shows that the certification does mean this. But the certification means no more, nor can it reasonably be supposed to mean more. The certification is made by the secretary or some other officer who has no time to do more than look at the documents produced to him. If, in business language, they are in order—i.e., if they are right on the face of them—he certifies; if they are not, he refuses to certify. But he has no means of ascertaining, and no time to inquire, whether the documents produced to him are genuine or not, nor whether the various transfers are valid or invalid in point of law. He acts on what he sees, and there is no pretence for saying that he does more, or is understood by business men to do more. He does not warrant the title of the transferor nor the validity in point of law of the various documents which together establish his title. That this is the true view of the effect of a certification will be apparent if it is remembered that certifications are sometimes made by an official of the Stock Exchange, and not by any officer of the company the shares in which are the subject of transfer.

Having ascertained the true effect and meaning of a certification, it is necessary to consider how far the defendant company is affected by the certification given by its secretary or clerk in the present case. It was said to be no part of the business of the company to give certifications, and that the company was in no way bound or affected by the certification given. This, however, is, in our opinion, a complete mistake. It is part of the business of the company to give certificates of title to shares in it, and to register transfers of such shares and to place the names of the transferees on its own books. It is, moreover, to the interest of every company to do what it can to assist its shareholders to deal with their shares in the way in which shares in other companies are ordinarily dealt with, and if the officers of a company conform to the ordinary practice in such a matter as we are considering, it is absurd to say that they are acting beyond any power the company can confer on them, and that the company is not bound by what they do.

In our opinion it is proved that to give certifications is incidental to the transaction in the ordinary business way of part of the legitimate business of all companies having their capital divided into shares which are transferable by deed or other instrument; and the certification in this case, having been given by the proper officer of the company in the ordinary way of business, is binding on the company, and the company is estopped from denying the truth of the facts certified, either expressly or by necessary implication. What these facts are has been already stated in general terms. The facts necessarily implied in this case are that Lupton produced a certificate purporting to show that he, or some registered owner, through whom he claimed by transfers, also produced, was entitled to transfer to Cuthbert the shares mentioned in the transfer. In truth, however, Lupton produced no such certificate. He had none of his own, and he did not produce Powter's, through whom he claimed. This had been lodged long before by Maitland and Balfour. The plaintiff, however, was induced by the certification to part with his money, and he has lost it, and if an action would lie for a careless misrepresentation we should be of opinion that the plaintiff could recover the money thus lost from the defendants. But no action lies for such a misrepresentation. This was finally decided in Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337, which it is not for us to criticize. It is, however, contended that the doctrine of estoppel can be made available to assist the plaintiff in this case. But the doctrine of estoppel cannot put the company in a worse position than if a certificate of Lupton's transferor, Powter, had been produced. If it had, still the transfer from Powter to Lupton would have been invalid, and Lupton, without any default on the part of the company, would not have been able to transfer the shares to Cuthbert. The fact, then, which the company is estopped from denying would not, if true, have entitled the plaintiff to the 135 shares. The loss of the shares, as distinguished from the loss of the money paid for them, is attributable, not to any misrepresentation by the company, but to something quite different—viz., the invalidity of the transfer from Powter to Lupton. If, indeed, the certification amounted to a warranty of Lupton's right to transfer, or if it were equivalent to a certificate by the company that Lupton was the registered owner of the shares which he purported to transfer to Cuthbert, the case would be very different, and would be indistinguishable from In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co. But a certification and a certificate are totally different things. The lodging of one or more documents may be certified, and yet the documents lodged may be invalid owing to circumstances not apparent on the face of them, and in this case the defect in Lupton's title was caused by the invalidity of one of the documents produced, and not by the non-production of the certificate which the company erroneously certified to be lodged. The real truth is that the plaintiffs lost their money by reason of a misrepresentation for which no action lies, and they lost the shares transferred to them by Lupton because he had no title to them, and the company is not estopped from denying this.

Under these circumstances we are of opinion that the plaintiffs' remedy is not against the company, but against Lupton, who could not deliver the shares for which he was paid by the plaintiffs. In the result, therefore, we agree with Vaughan Williams, J., that this action is not maintainable. We are not, however, able to concur in the whole of his reasoning. He has not, we think, attached sufficient importance to the fact that the transfer from Powter to Lupton was invalid; nor to the fact that the certification did not represent this transfer to be valid. Moreover, we think the learned judge was mistaken in considering this case governed by the observations of Bowen, L.J., and Fry, L.J., in the case of The British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Railway Co. There is nothing ultrà vires in this case as there was in that. Neither can we agree with him that Lord Tenterden's Act applies to this case. A statement that a document is lodged is not, we think, within that Act. The case relied on by Vaughan Williams, J., was decided on a demurrer to a declaration which set out statements of a very different nature. For the reasons we have given, the defendants are, in our opinion, entitled to judgment, and the appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

Administration action—Real and personal estate—Order on further consideration—Costs ordered to be paid primarily out of several funds in court, of which some represented personalty only—No further consideration reserved—Liberty to apply—Subsequent application on behalf of charity legatees for apportionment of burden of costs between funds representing realty and personalty.

A testatrix devised real estate upon trust for sale, and left a mixed fund, composed of the proceeds and of pure personalty, to a legatee for life, with remainder to a charity. An action having been brought to administer the estate, the order made on further consideration directed that certain non-charitable legacies and the costs of the action should be paid primarily out of four several funds in court, some of which represented pure personalty, and that, so far as such four funds were together insufficient, the balance should be made up from another fund, representing realty only. In carrying out the order the entirety of the funds made primarily liable was exhausted, and a portion of the said fund representing realty only, was also required. No question was reserved upon that further consideration, but the order directed the income of the residue to be paid to the tenant for life, with liberty to apply. The tenant for life having died, the testatrix's heir-at-law and his assignee petitioned, nearly ten years after the order on further consideration, that the residue of the last-mentioned fund should be paid out to them.

Held, by Kay, J., that the order on further consideration was binding and conclusive as to the funds by which the costs were to be ultimately borne, and that the residue, as consisting of the proceeds of realty only, must therefore be paid to the petitioners.

Held, by Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ., that the costs of administering the real estate ought to be borne ultimately by the funds representing real estate only, and (reversing the decision of Kay, J.) that the order on further consideration had not finally decided the question by what funds the costs must ultimately be borne, but that, the residue fund being still under the control of the court, it was not too late properly to adjust the incidence of the costs, which must accordingly be done.

Held, by Fry, L.J., that no subsequent further consideration and no question as to the ultimate incidence of the costs having been reserved by the order on further consideration, that order ought to be taken to have finally determined such incidence.

Appeal from Kay, J.

Hetty Roper, by her will of the 8th of August, 1877, appointed the defendants executors and trustees thereof, and after divers dispositions in trust devised to them (subject to payment of a certain sum) a house and lands upon trust for sale, and directed them out of the proceeds of sale to pay the expenses incident to the execution of the aforesaid trusts and her funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, and then in a specified order to pay three charitable legacies of £200, £100, and £100, and certain other pecuniary legacies, and after that to invest the residue in Government securities, together with all moneys or notes of hand, securities for money in her possession at the time of her decease, and rents falling due before the sale of the land, and pay the income to her two sisters, Caroline Taylor and Louisa Roper, during their joint lives, and to the survivor during her life, and after the death of the survivor to sell the investments and out of the proceeds pay, first, the expenses incident to the execution of the last-mentioned trust, and then two legacies of £300 each; and give the residue to the vicar, churchwardens, and overseers of the poor of the parish of Fordham, upon trust to invest the same in Government securities, and apply the dividends arising therefrom for the benefit of the sick and afflicted poor of that parish.

The testatrix died on the 16th of May, 1878, and she left no impure personalty. An order on further consideration, dated the 29th of July, 1880, and made by Bacon, V.C., after declaring that the charitable legacies of £200, £100, and £100 given out of the proceeds of sale of the house and lands were void, and resulted to the heir-at-law, and that the personal estate of the testatrix was primarily liable to pay the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, directed taxation of the costs of the action, including charges and expenses properly incurred by the defendants, the executors, as trustees, relating to the administration of the estate, and directed balances of £424 15s. 9d. and £287 3s. 2d. to be paid into court by the executors, and a sum of £340 10s. by one J. S. Fletcher. It then proceeded to direct that so much of a sum of £4,134 4s. 3d. Consols in court to the credit of the action as, with a small sum of cash in court to the same credit, and the aforesaid balances and sum directed to be paid in, would raise the costs when taxed and the aggregate amount which should be certified to be due in respect of certain pecuniary legacies given by the will, and one of nineteen guineas given by a codicil, and two sums amounting to £76 3s. 9d. payable respectively to Caroline Taylor and the representatives of Louisa Roper (who had died before the date of the order) in respect of interest on legacies, should be sold, the said costs, legacies and sums paid, and the income of the residue of the Consols paid to Caroline Taylor for her life. Liberty to apply was given, but no subsequent further consideration was reserved.

It appeared that the sum of £4,134 4s. 3d. Consols mentioned in the order represented proceeds of sale of the house and lands, and that the small sum of cash arose from dividends on the same. The £424 15s. 9d. was the balance found due from the executors on the account of the general personal estate, and the £287 3s. 2d. was the balance due on the account of rents and profits of the realty; while the sum of £340 10s. represented principal and interest due to the testatrix on a promissory note. When the costs had been taxed and paid and all the directions of the order had been complied with, all the smaller sums were exhausted, and the Consols having been resorted to, there remained a final balance of £2,898 8s. 9d. New Consols. In 1882 the heir-at-law assigned his reversionary interest in that sum (Caroline Taylor being entitled to the income for her life) to one M. T. Whitehall absolutely. Caroline Taylor having died at the beginning of the present year, Whitehall and the heir presented a petition for the sale of the Consols and that the residue, after payment of the costs of the petition and of the legacies payable on the death of Caroline Taylor, and legacy duty, should be handed over to Whitehall.

The Attorney-General, on behalf of the Fordham Charity legatees, opposed the petition, and claimed a part of the fund on the ground that it represented not only the proceeds of the real estate, but also a certain amount of pure personalty, and that the costs, at any rate those incurred in administration of the realty, ought to have been paid exclusively out of the proceeds of the realty, but had in fact been improperly paid out of this mixed fund.

Kay, J., held that he was bound by the order made on the further consideration, and accordingly made an order in the terms of the prayer of the petition.

The Attorney-General appealed.

Ingle Joyce, for the appellant.—The costs of the action, so far as it related to real estate, ought to be borne by the real and not by the personal estate: Patching v. Barnett, 51 L. J. Ch. 74, 30 W. R. Dig. 54. It was not intended by the order on further consideration to conclude the question as to the funds out of which the costs were to be ultimately taken, or if that was the intention it was arrived at under a misapprehension of the facts. At the time the order was made the income of all the funds was payable to the same person—i.e., the tenant for life—so that the question of the ultimate incidence of the costs was not argued, and may have been overlooked altogether. At any rate, the order is not conclusive on that point as to the rights of the parties: Sheppard v. Sheppard, 33 Beav. 129. If it were, the effect would be to deprive the charity of its legacy.

Warmington, Q.C., and Mulligan, for the petitioners.—The costs of an administration action are included in a direction in a will to pay "testamentary expenses": Harloe v. Harloe, 23 W. R. 789, L. R. 20 Eq. 471. The rights of the parties are concluded by the order on further consideration. The point ought to have been raised then if at all: Peareth v. Marriott, 31 W. R. 68, 22 Ch. D. 182. The order in question was made ten years ago, and ought not now to be in effect reversed. In Sheppard v. Sheppard there was no variation of any previous order as to funds which had been realized at the date of that order. The subsequent order only affected funds realized after the date of the previous order. In the present case all the funds were realized at the time, and the order on further consideration must be taken to be a final order, no subsequent further consideration having been reserved.

Ingle Joyce, in reply.—[COTTON, L.J.—We need only hear you as to whether we can now in effect reverse the order made on further consideration.] After the death of Caroline Taylor, the tenant for life, it remains to be decided whether the residue goes to the charity or to the heir-at-law. If necessary, I ought to have leave to appeal even now against the order. [BOWEN, L.J.—What rule of practice do you gather from Sheppard v. Sheppard?] The rule is that when you are dividing a fund and paying part to one party and part to another, that is a final division, and you cannot generally get it back, but where it is not final, and you can see as between capital and income how the costs ought to have been borne, the matter ought to be set right by adjusting the incidence of the costs. That is precisely the position here. The cash has been taken and applied in payment of the costs in the first instance as a mere matter of convenience, instead of applying the stock to that purpose, and directing the balance of the cash to be invested, which would have involved additional brokerage fees and other expense and trouble. There has really been no decision here as to the rights of the parties. All that was meant to be decided by the order on further consideration was that the special direction in the will to pay the expenses in the first instance out of the realty was not sufficient to exonerate the general personal estate. There is nothing but a technicality against us, and even that disappears when looked into.

June 23.—COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by the Attorney-General representing a charity. The question arose in this way. There was a fund in court when the petition was presented which had undoubtedly arisen from real estate, and which, though given to a charity, could not go to the charity, and an order was made on the petition giving the fund to the assignee of the heir-at-law, who took by intestacy in consequence of the charity being unable to take real estate. But the Attorney-General urges that what was given to the charity consisted partly of personal estate and partly of money arising from the sale of real estate, and that the portion of the costs attributable to the administration of the real estate ought to be paid out of the real estate; whereas they have, in fact, been paid so as to exhaust the whole of the personal estate; and he asks for an inquiry to ascertain how much of the costs which ought to have been paid out of the real estate has in fact been paid out of personal estate comprised in the gift. That seems to be right, for it has not been disputed that as a general rule the costs of administering real estate ought to be borne by the real estate; and if they are so borne in this case, there would be something left for the charity—about £700. Then why is it said that such an inquiry would be wrong? It was argued that there had been a declaration in the order on further consideration which threw the costs on the personal estate. I do not think that was the true meaning of that portion of the order; and it was certainly not so understood, because, as far as I can gather, the order for payment of costs was not in accordance with that view when the payments into court directed by the order on further consideration had been made. There were in court five funds—a sum of stock which had arisen entirely from real estate, and four sums of cash, two of which had arisen from real estate and two from personal estate. Then, without any reference to the order in which those funds were to be applied, there was an order which would exhaust for payment of costs and legacies all the four sums of cash which I have mentioned, and which required a certain sum to be added by sale of a portion of the £4,134 4s. 3d. stock in court, which had arisen from real estate. I think that the declaration cannot be held to apply to personal estate which was specifically disposed of by these words in the will, "together with all moneys, notes of hand, securities for money, which may be in my possession at the time of my decease, as well as rents falling due prior to the sale."

There is another question which deserves more consideration, and it is this. The order which directed payment of the costs in the way I have mentioned was an order on further consideration, and it is said that therefore it must be taken to have decided ultimately the rights of the parties, and so, as it exhausted the personal estate, all the rest must go to the heir-at-law, who took the real estate. That was undoubtedly a strong argument, but if we see on the true construction of this order that there was no intention whatever to decide the rights of the parties, I do not think that the mere fact that this payment of costs was directed by an order on further consideration ought to prevent the court from setting the matter right where there is a fund in hand enabling it to do so. I agree that an order on further consideration ought to settle the rights of the parties, and I also think that the Attorney-General ought, when the action came on for further consideration, to have asked the court to insert in its order what, if asked, it certainly would have inserted, a statement that the order for payment of costs was without prejudice to the question out of what fund the costs were to be ultimately paid. That, unfortunately, was not done, and we have to consider what effect ought to be given to this order as it stands.

Mr. Ingle Joyce referred to Sheppard v. Sheppard, where Lord Romilly laid down in very wide terms that a direction for payment of costs could not be taken in any way to decide the rights of the parties, and the case really stood over that we might discover, if we could, whether that was a general declaration, or only one referring to that particular case. We have looked at the petition which was presented there, and I should say that Lord Romilly was making too wide a statement in laying down that an order for payment of costs out of a particular fund is not to be taken as deciding the rights as between persons entitled to the fund when it comes ultimately to be divided. We must look at the order and see whether it was the intention, at the time of directing that certain costs should be paid out of a particular fund, to decide that they were to be ultimately borne by that fund. Here, although there is a declaration that certain legacies given to charities out of the testatrix's real estate were void, and that the amount of those legacies passed to the heir-at-law, we find no declaration at all as regards this fund which now remains. When the order on further consideration was made, the same person was entitled to the income, both of that part of the fund which consisted of real estate and of that part which consisted of personal estate, and the order contained no direction what was to be done after the death of the tenant for life, nor any declaration as to what would ultimately become of this fund, such direction or declaration not being necessary at that stage. I can, then, only look upon this order as taking those funds which were most readily available for payment of the costs and legacies, without considering whether they arose from real estate or from personal estate, leaving entirely untouched, and not making any declaration upon, the question what fund should, as between the parties who were ultimately to be entitled to the different funds, be held liable to the costs. I think it would be wrong, in the absence of any declaration of the rights of the parties, to hold that by that order the Attorney-General is precluded from claiming anything on behalf of this charity when there would have been something which he could have claimed if the costs relating to the real estate had been paid, as I think they ought to have been paid, out of the real estate.

In my opinion, therefore, the Attorney-General is entitled to the inquiry which he asks, there being still in court a fund which will be clearly sufficient to set the matter right. I think the charity ought not to lose its legacy because the Attorney-General made, as I think he did, a slip in not raising, or asking the court to reserve, the question, when the matter was before the court on further consideration, out of what fund these costs ought ultimately to be paid. I think there should be an inquiry what portion of the costs has been improperly, under the circumstances, paid out of the personal estate, and that the amount should be recouped out of the proceeds of real estate.

Then comes the question as to the costs. The learned judge below directed all the costs to be paid out of the fund, and that we do not disturb. As to the costs of the appeal, although our decision is in favour of the Attorney-General, I think we ought not to give him any costs, since there would probably have been no conflict at all if the question how the costs were ultimately to be borne had been reserved, as the Master of the Rolls said, in Sheppard v. Sheppard, that it ought to be.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

FRY, L.J.—I am, unfortunately, unable to agree with my learned brothers in their view of this case. We have here an order made on further consideration when the whole of the proceedings in the action were before the court, and it was known how much of those proceedings related to realty and how much to personalty. The court then made an order dealing with the whole costs of the suit, and directed them to be paid out of certain funds. It appears to me that the way in which the order deals with the costs and with the funds indicates something like an arrangement between the parties to the litigation not to work out their rights with extreme exactitude, because, there being five funds to be dealt with, the court deals with them in this way. In the first place there are four funds consisting of cash, two of which arise from personalty and two from realty; and in the next place there is a sum of stock arising from realty alone. The court then directs the application of the four funds, without regard to whether they arose from personalty or realty, in payment of three things —viz., (1) the whole of the costs without reference to the question whether they relate to realty or personalty; (2) the balance of the legacies; and (3) a sum of £76, one part of which went to Caroline Taylor and the other part to the representative of Louisa Roper. All those three payments were directed to be made out of the four funds without regard to their origin, and then any deficiency of those four funds to make the three payments, was to be raised out of the £4,134 stock which had arisen from the realty. No liberty to further discuss the incidence of any of these sums was reserved, and therefore we have an order on further consideration which reserves no second further consideration—an order which deals with the costs and in which no point is reserved. Such an order as that is, in my humble opinion, final with regard to the costs, and I do not think it is competent to any of the litigant parties to come subsequently under the liberty to apply and to ask for an order which shall vary the incidence of the costs. As I have already observed, the whole matter is before the court on such an occasion, and, according to my view of the practice of the Court of Chancery and the Chancery Division, it has always finally dealt with costs on further consideration, unless express liberty for further discussion has been reserved, and that course seems to me to be a very convenient one. It seems to me that if such a point as this can be raised, notwithstanding the absence of a reservation of the right to raise it, the order is converted into a trap.

In the present case the respondent has actually purchased the interest of the heir under this order, without notice that there was any intention of raising this point, and then he finds that part of the fund purchased is to be taken away from him. So far as my memory enables me to speak, I have never known a case in which such a thing has been done by the Court of Chancery. I have never known a case in which, where an order on further consideration has dealt with the costs and directed them to be paid out of a particular fund without reserving liberty to alter their incidence, they have afterwards been ordered to be paid out of another fund. Therefore, although, under the circumstances, I cannot help mistrusting my own judgment, yet, as I have a strong opinion of the inconvenience of the course now pursued, I am bound to express my concurrence with the learned judge below. I may add that in Sheppard v. Sheppard there does not appear to have been any order on further consideration.

HALIFAX JOINT-STOCK BANKING CO. v. GLEDHILL. (a.)

Fraudulent deed—Purchaser for value without notice—Interest under the deed—13 Eliz. c. 5, s. 6 (Statutes Revised, 2nd ed., vol. 1, p. 510, s. 5).

Section 6 (section 5, revised edition) of 13 Eliz. c. 5 includes a purchaser for value without notice of any interest under a fraudulent deed, whether that interest be legal or equitable, and prevents the deed from being void as against him.

Trial of action.

This was an action by the plaintiff company to have it declared that a settlement made by the defendant John Gledhill was fraudulent and void under the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5.

On the 25th of June, 1885, John Gledhill gave to the plaintiff bank a guarantee to secure the banking account of his son, Thomas Gledhill, and a judgment, dated the 15th of November, 1888, was subsequently obtained againt him by the bank on this guarantee. Thomas Gledhill, who was living with his father, but carried on business separately, became embarrassed, and on the 26th of October, 1887, called a meeting of his creditors for the 31st of October. On the 27th of October John Gledhill executed a settlement of certain real property belonging to him and a policy of life assurance on trusts for his wife for life, and then for himself for life, and then for all his present and future children. On the 8th of November Thomas Gledhill entered into a composition with his creditors, and the defendant Sellers, at Thomas Gledhill's request, became surety for the payment of the last instalment nnder the composition, amounting to £2,000. For this purpose Sellers gave a cheque for that sum, dated November 15, 1887, to Richard Moore, chairman of the creditors' meeting, and John Gledhill, on the same day, gave to Sellers a security by depositing with him, with—according to the evidence of John Gledhill—the consent of his wife and son Samuel, the deed of settlement of October 27, 1887, and the policy and the prior title deeds of the settled property; and a memorandum of that date was signed by Thomas and John Gledhill.

Sellers, in his defence, stated that he did not know that the settlement was fraudulent and void, and in his evidence said that he did not know of John Gledhill's guarantee to the bank.

Moore negotiated Seller's cheque, which he was compelled to pay to the holder, although the composition scheme failed, and Thomas Gledhill was adjudicated bankrupt. Sellers brought an action against Moore for improperly parting with the cheque, and recovered judgment; but, a new trial being ordered, the action was compromised, Moore paying £1,297 6s. 8d., and Sellers now claimed the balance due to him on his security.

Marten, Q.C., replied.

Nov. 8.—KAY, J. [after stating the facts as above set out, held, upon the evidence, that the settlement was void under 13 Eliz. c. 5 as against the general creditors of John Gledhill, and that the deposit of the deeds and the memorandum only gave the defendant Sellers a security upon the reversionary life interest of John Gledhill, and continued:—] The question of law which has been raised is important. Section 6 of 13 Eliz. c. 5 has generally been treated as applying to a purchase by the settlement itself, but there is some authority for treating it as applicable to the purchase for value of an interest under a voluntary deed, which has been subsequently assigned.

As far as I can discover, there is no direct decision upon this point. The subject is carefully considered in May's Treatise on the Statutes, 2nd ed., p. 323. It is there stated that, although there is authority for saying that a subsequent valuable consideration will support a deed under 27 Eliz. c. 4, there is no express decision that this would be the case under 13 Eliz. c. 5. The rights of creditors under that statute accrue immediately upon the execution of the settlement impeached. The learned author proceeds to argue that the deed, being good against the grantor and only void against creditors, is, practically, not void, but voidable at their suit, and that, consequently, a purchaser for value of an interest under the deed can successfully resist any attempt to avoid it.

It seems to me impossible to say that the right of creditors under the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5 is an equity, if that is the learned author's meaning. A court of equity does not avoid the deed in a suit by such creditors, but merely declares, if it is proved fraudulent, that it is void against them by the statute. The real question is whether a subsequent purchaser for value of an interest under the settlement without notice has his purchase protected by section 6. If he has, it does not matter whether it was a legal or merely an equitable interest. If he has not, then, as the creditors' rights are under a positive enactment that the deed is void as against them, their claim is not equitable, but legal.

It seems strange that there should be no direct decision. On the other hand, I have not been able to find a case in which creditors have prevailed against such a purchaser. In Prodgers v. Langham, a case treated as authoritative by Lord Eldon in George v. Milbanke, and called by Lord Kenyon, in Parr v. Eliason, 1 East, 92, "a very leading authority," it is stated that if there be a fraudulent feoffment and the feofee enfeof another for valuable consideration without notice of the fraud, his title shall prevail against a subsequent purchaser for value from the first feoffor, notwithstanding the 27 Eliz. c. 4. It is not expressly stated in the report that this is by reason of section 3 of that statute, which is similar to section 6 of the 13 Eliz. c. 5, nor does Lord Eldon or Lord Kenyon give that as the reason for the decision. Lord Eldon says this, 9 Ves. at p. 195:—"The reason as stated is this, that, though a voluntary feoffment is bad as between the creditor and the feoffee, yet it is good as between the feoffor and feoffee; and therefore the latter, if prior, shall hold against the subsequent feoffee of the feoffor. The consequence is that the feoffment of the voluntary feoffee is good against creditors."

This can hardly be a correct report of what Lord Eldon said. The voluntary feoffee could not hold against a subsequent feoffee for value from the original feoffor by reason of the statute 27 Eliz. c. 4. A feoffment, although made for value, by a voluntary feoffee, could not make good the voluntary feoffment to him, if void under 13 Eliz. c. 5, unless the position of his feoffee is saved by section 6 of that statute. In that case the feoffment of the voluntary feoffee is good against creditors of the original feoffor by positive enactment.

The actual decision in Prodgers v. Langham was that a lease for the benefit of a daughter, if she married with her father's consent, being voluntary, would be void against a subsequent purchaser for value by virtue of the 27 Eliz. c. 4, but that although so void it might be made effectual against such purchaser by a subsequent marriage of the daughter upon the faith of it. This seems to have proceeded upon the ground that the subsequent consideration of the marriage related back as though the settlement had been made upon the marriage.

The case of George v. Milbanke was a contest between the creditors of an appointor, who in his lifetime had exercised a general power of appointment over a fund in favour of a volunteer, and a purchaser after his death from the volunteer of £500, part of the appointed fund. By the equitable rule the exercise moneys in their hands as trustees, in the aforesaid business, or any other business in which they, in their uncontrolled discretion, might think fit, without being liable for loss. D. and M. J. were appointed executors and trustees. The widow entered into partnership with D. in the business for ten years from the 1st of January, 1873. The £1,000 was left in the business during and after the said term of ten years. In June, 1883, the widow having then left the business, D. filed a petition for liquidation of his affairs, and a composition of 10s. in the pound was agreed to, payable by three instalments—on the 2nd of January, 1884, the 2nd of April, 1884, and the 2nd of October, 1884. Only one instalment was received by the trustee M. J., and it was not invested, but placed on deposit at a bank. No pressure was made for payment of the unpaid instalments. G. R. J., having come of age, brought an action against the trustee M. J. and others seeking relief on the ground of breaches of trust.

Held, as regards M. J., (1) that the not calling in the £1,000 on the widow's retirement from the partnership was not a breach of trust, but that, on the true construction of the codicil, the power was not restricted to lending to any particular partners in the business; (2) that the not calling in or pressing for payment of the two instalments unpaid was not a breach of trust, the trustee, M. J., not having been guilty of negligence, but having acted honestly in the belief that pressure would not have resulted in benefit to the estate, and with a reasonable ground for acting as he did; (3) that having regard to the fact that the loss of income, if any, through non-investment of the first instalment was very small, coupled with the probability, then existing, of another instalment being shortly received, when both might be invested together, it would be going too far to make an order on that head against the trustee M. J., who acted on his solicitor's advice in placing the money on deposit at a bank instead of investing it.

In this case Earl, the testator, by his will directed £1,000 to be raised and invested on certain trusts therein declared in favour of his stepson, the plaintiff, one G. R. Johnson. The testator subsequently entered into partnership with the defendant Davies in the business of manufacturing confectioners. By a codicil to his will, after reciting the gift of this legacy, the testator proceeded as follows:—"And whereas since the date and execution of my said will I have entered into partnership with my brother-in-law, Robert Jones Davies, in the business of manufacturing confectioners, at the City of Chester, under articles of partnership dated the 23rd of November, 1871, and have invested the bulk of my estate in the way of capital in the said business, and am desirous that such capital shall remain in the said business, and that my wife, Elizabeth Earl, should, in the event of my death, enter into partnership with the said Robert Jones Davies on the same terms and with the full benefit of the same capital as I now have therein, and that my said trustees should have power to continue the said sum of £1,000 bequeathed to or in trust for the said G. R. Johnson and hereinbefore referred to in the said business; Now I do hereby declare that it shall be lawful for my said trustees or trustee, in addition to the powers of investment given to them by my said will, to invest or continue invested any moneys which may come to their hands as such trustees or trustee either in the aforesaid business or in any other business in which they in their uncontrolled discretion may think fit, without being liable for any loss to be thereby occasioned. And I further declare that so long as the said sum of £1,000 shall remain invested in the said business the trustees or trustee shall be entitled to receive and shall pay to the said G. R. Johnson or otherwise invest for him or his benefit in manner aforesaid interest thereon," as therein mentioned.

The testator died in December, 1872, and his will and codicil were shortly afterwards proved by the executors and trustees therein named, the defendants Davies and Jones. His widow entered into partnership with the defendant Davies in the confectionery business for a term of ten years from the 1st of January, 1873, the £1,000 being left in the business during the whole term, and even after the partnership had expired by effluxion of time.

In June, 1883, the defendant Davies filed a petition for liquidation of his affairs, which resulted in the acceptance by his creditors of a composition of ten shillings in the pound, payable by instalments on the 2nd of January, 1884, the 2nd of April, 1884, and the 2nd of October, 1884, and secured by promissory notes in favour of the trustee in the liquidation and by a further guarantee. Of these instalments only one had been received by the trustees of Earl's will, which was not invested by them, but placed on deposit at a bank.

The plaintiff, G. R. Johnson, having attained the age of twenty-one years, brought the present action against the trustees of Earl's will and Davies' trustee in liquidation, claiming relief as against Jones in respect of the following alleged breaches of trust—(1) not calling in the £1,000 on the widow's retirement from the business when the term had expired; (2) neither taking steps nor compelling the trustee in Davies' liquidation to take steps to recover the second and third instalments; (3) omitting to invest the first instalment. The plaintiff also sought to have Davies' estate declared liable.

Neville, Q.C., and Rutherford, for the plaintiff.—Jones refrained from pressing Davies out of friendship, and not because in his (Jones's) judgment the estate was likely to benefit by the delay. In support of this contention we rely on a letter of the 22nd of January, 1885, from Davies to Jones, to the following effect:—"I am sure that you would not harass me by pressing me to do what will be a great inconvenience at the present time, and if you would grant me an interview I could explain things to your entire satisfaction. If the whole thing was realized at the present moment I would be able to pay all the unpaid accounts to G. R. J. . . . out of book debts alone, leaving stock and plant to cover less than £500 trade creditors (new). Had a good year, and am starting another under much brighter circumstances than the last, and if God gives me health and strength I shall be able, with His blessing, to pay these deferred accounts in a short time. Hoping you will grant my request, which is not much for you, but a great deal for me, I remain, &c., ———."

Haldane, Q.C., and Maidlow, for the defendant Jones.

The defendant Davies and the trustee in his liquidation were not represented.

ROMER, J.—As against the defendant Davies the case is undefended. There must, therefore, be a direction that his estate is liable for the amount lost and for costs. As against the defendant Jones the case is different. It is attempted to render him liable for losses caused by alleged breaches of trust under three heads. First, it has been contended that he committed a breach of trust in allowing a sum of £1,000 to remain in the business after the testator's widow had retired from it, on the expiration of the term of her partnership. This question turns on the construction of the testator's codicil. His trustees were thereby empowered to allow this sum to remain in the business, and their power was not restricted to lending it to any particular partners in the business. I come to this conclusion, not on the power standing alone, but reading it together with the recital contained in the codicil. Reading them together, it is clear to my mind that the testator did not intend to restrict the lending to the partnership between his widow and the defendant Davies, and that the trustees were therefore justified in allowing the £1,000 to remain in the business, notwithstanding the change of partners.

Secondly, the plaintiff seeks to make Mr. Jones liable for not having received the two instalments of the composition in Mr. Davies' liquidation payable on April 2, 1884, and October 2, 1884. On this question I have felt considerable doubt; the case coming very near the line. On the whole, however, I think that Mr. Jones ought not to be held liable. On the evidence I think that he had reasonable ground for believing that if he put on pressure, with a view to obtaining payment, such a course would not result in benefit to the trust. This is not a case in which the trustee has taken no trouble, or one of simple negligence, or of not looking into the matter, or of being content with the supposition that the instalments might be paid at any time. On the contrary, Mr. Jones was desirous of obtaining, if he could, payment of these instalments. Reliance has been placed, and justly placed, by counsel on behalf of the plaintiff, on the letter of the 22nd of January, 1885, as showing that the business was at that time in such a state that pressure by Mr. Jones would have resulted in payment. But I am convinced, not only that that letter did not represent the true state of the business at that time, but also that Mr. Jones was not misled by it. I think that the writer of that letter was too sanguine, and that the result of putting on pressure would have been stoppage of the business and non-payment of the instalments remaining due. The trustee honestly believed that it was better not to press for payment; and, whether that opinion was correct or not, he had reasonable grounds for acting as he did. The second claim, therefore, in my opinion, fails.

Thirdly, the plaintiff seeks to have Mr. Jones declared liable for not investing the first instalment of the composition. The trustee having received this small sum, acted on the advice of his solicitor, and placed it on deposit at a bank. Having regard to the smallness of the loss of income, if any, and the probability of another instalment being received, when the two instalments might be invested together, I think it would be going too far to make any order against Mr. Jones on this head. As against Mr. Jones, therefore, all the claims fail, and the action must be dismissed, with costs.

MACKAY v. MCGUIRE. (a.)

Election law—Parliament—Registration of voters—Occupation franchise—Bankruptcy of occupying tenant—Subsequent acceptance of rent—Undisturbed occupation—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 20, 168—Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), s. 3, sub-section 2.

In support of an objection to the name of a voter being retained on an occupation list, it was proved that he had been adjudicated bankrupt during the qualifying period. The trustee in bankruptcy, however, had not interfered, the voter had remained in occupation, and the voter's landlord had accepted rent from him, subsequently to the adjudication. The revising barrister retained the name of the voter on the list.

Held, that the revising barrister was right.

Appeal from a decision of the revising barrister for the city of York.

William Britton, the nature of whose qualification to be on an occupation list of voters was stated to be a dwelling-house in Walmgate, was duly objected to on the ground that he had not occupied the dwelling-house in question during the qualifying period—i.e., during the whole of the twelve months preceding the last day of July, 1890. He was a yearly tenant, and was adjudicated bankrupt on the 17th of October, 1889. He paid, and the landlord accepted, rent from him on the usual quarter days during the residue of the qualifying period after the adjudication. His occupation during the period was continuous and was not disturbed or interfered with in any way, either by the landlord or by the trustee. The revising barrister held that the objection failed, on the ground that the occupation was clothed with the legal character of a tenancy—(1) by contract; (2) by implication of common law of a tenancy at will; (3) by acceptance of rent.

The objector appealed.

Scott Fox, for the appellant.—By section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, "where a receiving order is made against a debtor . . . the property of the bankrupt shall become divisible among his creditors, and shall vest in the trustee." The debtor, therefore, is no longer tenant, having been divested of his right by the trustee, who could have assigned it to a third person. The occupation of the house by the voter was, for some time at least after the adjudication, permissive only, and not a tenancy within the meaning of section 3, sub-section 2, of the Representation of the People Act, 1867.

T. Willes Chitty, for the respondent.—Section 3, sub-section 2, of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, allows any person to have a vote if he occupies as owner or tenant. Bankruptcy is not per se a disqualification, and ought not, therefore, to become so indirectly by means of a side question. Up to the date of the receiving order the claimant occupied as tenant, and so long afterwards as he remains in possession he is in the same position as an executor on the death of a testator—i.e., a tenant at will. Doe d. Hull v. Wood, 14 M. & W. 682; Doe d. Palmer v. Andrews, 4 Bing. 348.

Scott Fox, in reply, cited Richardson v. Langridge, 4 Taunt. 128; McLean v. Pritchard, 36 W. R. 508, 20 Q. B. D. 285.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of opinion, though not without some misgivings, that the revising barrister was right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed Having regard to the principle, not of extending the franchise, but of including rather than excluding claimants on somewhat technical grounds, I have come to the conclusion that the claimant in this case was an occupying tenant, and therefore entitled to be on the list of voters. All the property of the bankrupt vested, no doubt, in the trustee, but the fact that the landlord took rent from the tenant after bankruptcy refers back the tenancy to the time that the trustee took the premises. The tenancy, therefore, was continuous, or if any hiatus exists it may be disposed of by the maxim De minimis non curat l

(a.) Reported by G. K. PALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I assent to the judgment of my brother Grantham with considerable doubt. The statute requires not mere occupancy, but occupancy as tenant or owner. The occupancy must also be continuous. We must satisfy ourselves, therefore, that there was a tenancy during the whole time of the qualifying period, and looking at the circumstances of the present case—the holding over of the bankrupt, the subsequent sufferance, consent, and receipt of rent by the landlord, I think we must conclude that the bankrupt was a tenant to the landlord from the date of the adjudication. There was, therefore, no hiatus, and the revising barrister was right in retaining the voter's name upon the lists.

Solicitor — Costs — Action in county court — Amount claimed over £10—Amount recovered less than £10—Higher and lower scales—County Court Rules, 1889, Appendix—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 118.

Where the amount claimed in an action in a county court is over £10, but the amount recovered is less than £10, the taxation of costs, both as between solicitor and client and as between party and party, must be on the lower scale. Therefore, where a plaintiff in a county court action stated to his solicitor and swore in an affidavit that £15 was due to him from the defendant, and it afterwards appeared that, to the plaintiff's knowledge, £5 only was due, and judgment was recovered for that sum,

Held, that the plaintiff's solicitors were entitled to have their bill taxed on the lower scale only.

This was an appeal from a decision of Huddleston, B., in chambers, reviewing the taxation by Master Wilberforce of a solicitor's bill of costs.

A person named Wood instructed the solicitors to appear for him in an action in a county court in which he was plaintiff. The action was upon a bill of exchange for £15, and Wood informed the solicitors that he had paid for the bill the full amount for which it was drawn. In the course of the proceedings an affidavit was filed in which Wood swore that the whole £15 was due to him. At the trial Wood admitted in cross-examination that he had paid £5 only for the bill, and judgment was given for him for that amount, with costs.

Wood, being dissatisfied with the amount tendered to him by the solicitors as the result of the action, obtained an order for taxation of their bill. The master taxed the costs of the action upon the lower scale, which is headed (see Appendix to County Court Rules, 1889): "Costs to be paid to solicitors in actions and matters, as well between party and party as between solicitor and client, where the amount recovered exceeds £2 and does not exceed £10," and his allocatur was, accordingly, for £2 13s. 6d.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The solicitors having taken out a summons to review this taxation, Huddleston, B., held that the taxation ought to have been according to the higher scale, "where the subject-matter or the sum recovered exceeds £10." According to this decision the taxed bill amounted to £9 14s. 6d.

Wood appealed.

Crump, Q.C. (W. H. C. Payne with him), for the appellant.—Costs as between solicitor and client are to be taxed according to the scales: County Courts Act, 1888, s. 118. The "amount recovered" here did not exceed £10, and therefore the lower scale is applicable. The word "subject-matter" in the heading to the higher scale refers to actions in which it is not a sum of money, but land or other property which is in dispute.

R. Bray, for the solicitors, referred to the note at the foot of the lower scale:—"N.B.—No other costs are to be allowed than the above where the amount claimed does not exceed £10, unless the judge certifies under section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1889." This shows that the amount claimed is to be considered in taxation, and here £15 was claimed. £15 was the "subject-matter" within the meaning of the heading to the higher scale.

MATHEW, J.—In this case it seems to me that the order of the master is perfectly right, and that the learned judge ought to have confirmed it instead of setting it aside. The question arises, in the first instance, upon section 118 of the County Courts Act, 1888. Nothing can be clearer and more explicit, it seems to me, than that section upon this subject. It is clear, I think, that there was an intention on the part of the Legislature that there should not be that distinction with reference to the minor claims to be recovered in county courts between costs between party and party and costs between solicitor and client, which so unfortunately prevails in the High Court. That section deals with the costs of solicitors both as between party and party and as between solicitor and client. It provides for taxation, and enacts that "no costs or charges shall be allowed on such taxation which are not sanctioned by the scale then in force unless the registrar shall be satisfied that the client has agreed in writing to pay them, in which case they may be allowed, and no solicitor shall have a right to recover from his client any such costs or charges unless they shall have been allowed on taxation. It was, therefore, intended that (except in the case mentioned) there should be no distinction between the two sets of costs. Then section 119 provides for costs upon the higher scale on the certificate of the judge, the certificate containing statements which are mentioned in the section. When we come to look at the scale we find that it is headed in this way:—"Costs to be paid to solicitors in actions and matters as well between party and party as between solicitor and client where the subject-matter or the sum recovered exceeds £10," that is, where the subject-matter recovered or the sum recovered exceeds £10; that is the obvious interpretation of it. But it was said that attention must be called to the note to the lower scale, and in that, the word "claimed" is substituted for the word "recovered"; although the heading part is the same—the words used are "the amount recovered"—it is said that you are to pass that, and control that statement and the statement with reference to the costs upon the higher scale, and the statement in the section of the Act of Parliament, because there appears this nota bene at the end:—"No other costs are to be allowed than the above where the amount claimed does not exceed £10, unless the judge certifies under section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888." It is perfectly clear the meaning of that note is to call attention to section 119, which controls section 118 according to its terms, but not to enlarge the word "recovered" to the word "claimed." There is a further observation to be made; the matter appears to have been present to the attention of those who framed these scales, and the distinction between the amount recovered and the amount claimed clearly appears. "Where the costs of a defendant are being taxed, the word recovered, wherever it occurs in the scale, means claimed." The meaning of that is quite obvious. The defendant is entitled to resist the whole claim, and has his costs, therefore, taxed upon that scale. But when the plaintiff brings a claim which he ought not to have brought, and for an amount in excess of that which he ought to have claimed in that case (although, as appears in this particular case, great hardship may be done to his solicitor), the Legislature has not protected the solicitor against that. It has imposed upon him the obligation of protecting himself by an agreement in writing that he is to have more than would otherwise be allowed. This taxation ought to have been on the lower scale, and the appeal must be allowed.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case there may be individual hardship to the solicitor in consequence of the false statement made by his client, but, unfortunately for him, we have to deal with the Act of Parliament and the rules, and it is clear from both of them that the word "recovered" cannot mean "claimed."

Appeal allowed.

GORDON v. SILBER. (a.)

Innkeeper—Lien—Husband and wife guests at inn—Credit given to husband—Lien on wife's goods belonging to her as her separate property.

Where a husband and wife have come to an inn to stay as guests, bringing goods with them, the innkeeper's lien for his charges attaches to the whole of such goods, including any that are the wife's separate property, although the innkeeper may be unable successfully to sue the wife in respect of her separate estate, by reason of his having given credit to the husband alone.

Action tried by Lopes, L.J., sitting without a jury.

The circumstances of the case sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Paget, for the defendants.

LOPES, L.J., delivered the following written judgment:—This is an interesting and important case, and raises a question which could not have arisen before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. The claim is made by the plaintiffs, the proprietors of the Hotel Metropole, against Mr. Martin Silber and his wife, Lady Lucy, to recover £340 4s. 1d., the balance of an hotel bill. Lady Lucy has separate property, and the claim is made against her on that ground. The separate property is admitted. Mr. Martin Silber has become insolvent, whence this action.

The facts may be shortly stated thus:—Before May, 1889, Mr. Martin Silber had been staying at the Hotel Metropole by himself, and had incurred expenses which he had paid. In May he was joined by his wife; she subsequently left for a fortnight, and then again joined her husband at the Hotel Metropole. He met her at the station, and they came to the hotel with a large quantity of luggage, and were received there, occupying the same rooms which they had previously occupied. They continued to live there together until August 27, when Mr. Martin Silber left, Lady Lucy remaining there until September 4, when she left. Mr. Martin Silber had made payments on account. The plaintiffs claimed the balance of the bill from Lady Lucy, and sought to make her separate property liable. I was of opinion that their claim could not be sustained against Lady Lucy, on the ground that Mr. Martin Silber was the contracting party, to whom credit (as Mr. Hollands, the proprietor, candidly admitted) had been given. But the separate property of Lady Lucy in the shape of trunks, boxes, and their contents had been detained by the plaintiffs as and for their lien in respect of the unpaid balance, and the return of this separate property was claimed by Lady Lucy in her counter-claim. This raises the important question in this case.

The question is, Were the plaintiffs entitled to retain these last-mentioned goods of Lady Lucy? They were unquestionably her separate property, but were brought into the hotel and there received by the plaintiffs at the time when Mr. Martin Silber with his wife became the guests of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, as innkeepers, were bound to receive the defendants and their goods, and were bound, so long as the defendants remained guests at the hotel, to keep safely and securely their goods; and the plaintiffs would have been liable in damages if these goods had been lost. How did the plaintiffs receive them? They knew of no distinction between the goods of the husband and wife, and could not inquire into their respective titles to the goods. They received them as the goods of Mr. Martin Silber and his wife, who became their guests. Suppose Mr. Martin Silber had stolen the goods, still if the plaintiffs received them with their guests, the lien would have attached.

By the common law of England every person who keeps a common inn is under an obligation to receive and afford proper entertainment to everyone who offers himself as a guest, if there be sufficient room for him in the inn, and no good reason for refusing him. The innkeeper is under an obligation to keep the goods of a guest received into the inn safely and securely, and can be sued and made liable in damages if he fails in this respect. As a compensation for the burden thus imposed upon him, the law has given him a lien upon the goods of the guest until he discharges the expenses of his lodging and food. If the guest has brought goods to the inn to which he has no title, this will not deprive the innkeeper of his lien, because he is obliged to receive the guest without inquiries as to his title.

It seems, therefore, that the lien is commensurate with the obligation to receive the guest and to keep safely and securely his goods. The right of lien of an innkeeper depends upon the fact that the goods came into his possession in his character of innkeeper, as belonging to a guest: Smith v. Dearlove, 6 C. B. 132. The guests received in this case were Mr. Martin Silber and his wife, and all the goods received by the innkeeper were received as the goods of Mr. Martin Silber and his wife. They brought the goods to the hotel. If Mr. Martin Silber had stolen the goods, the lien, as I have said, would have attached. Can it be said that it is not to attach because some of the goods happen to be the separate property of his wife, who was received as his wife with him as a guest? Husband and wife arrive at an hotel with luggage; the innkeeper has no power of discriminating what may be the property of the husband and what may be the property of the wife; he receives, and is bound to receive, husband and wife with their luggage; the innkeeper's charges are not paid, and I cannot see how it can be successfully contended that the lien does not attach. It would, in many cases, be defeating the innkeeper's lien, and the object for which it was given. The plaintiffs, therefore, fail as to their claim against the female defendant, but succeed as to her counter-claim, and there will be judgment for the defendant on the claim, and for the plaintiffs on the counter-claim.

Shipping—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Exceptions in charter-party which are not repeated in bill of lading.

By the charter-party, in addition to the clause above referred to was the following—namely, "Negligence clause as per Baltic bill of lading 1885," *which provided that "stranding and collisions, and all losses and damages caused thereby, were to be excepted, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, or mariners." This was an action tried before Huddleston, B., and a special jury. It was brought by the indorsees of a bill of lading against the owners of the vessel John Banfield to recover £447 1s., the value of goods lost by the negligence of the defendants. The facts and arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

French, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the defendants.

HUDDLESTON, B., read the following judgment:—This was an action brought by the plaintiffs as indorsees of a bill of lading and owners of goods entrusted to the defendants, as owners of the vessel John Banfield, for delivery at Trapani, in the Island of Sicily, shipped by Messrs. Fisher, Renwick, & Co., and lost by reason of the negligence and want of skill of the officers and crew in charge of the ship near Mazzara, on the coast of Sicily. The vessel stranded at Mazzara, and the plaintiff's goods were lost. Witnesses being called, the jury found that the loss was due to the negligence of the master. On this finding it was agreed that the jury should be discharged, and that the rest of the case should be decided by me alone. The charter-party, which was in the ordinary form, was described to be by Fisher, Renwick, & Co. "as agents for the charterers." It contained in print the usual exceptions, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of what nature and kind soever during the said voyage," and in writing at the end, "Negligence clause as per Baltic bill of lading 1885." It was contended on the part of the defendants that the plaintiffs were parties to the charter-party, Fisher, Renwick, & Co. being their agents, and, therefore, that the plaintiffs as principals were bound by all the terms of the charter-party, but if they were not actual parties to the charter-party, as principals they were so to the bill of lading, which, it was alleged, incorporated all the provisions of the charter-party, including the Baltic bill of lading clause 1885. Besides, the fact of Fisher, Renwick, & Co. describing themselves as agents for the charterers, there was no evidence to show that they were so in fact. The contract between them and the plaintiffs was contained in letters and telegrams discussing the price, and concluded with a letter of the 12th of December in which Fisher, Renwick, & Co. write: "Referring to telegrams exchanged between us, we confirm sale to your good selves of a cargo of large Newcastle steam coals at 19s. 6d. per ton c.i.f. Trapani," and the invoice was made out by Fisher, Renwick, & Co. as vendors to the plaintiffs as vendees. I was clearly of opinion that the contract was one of sale, and not of agency, and that Fisher, Renwick, & Co. were principals in the charter-party, and that the plaintiffs were not parties directly bound by it.

It was, however, contended that the bill of lading incorporated all the provisions of the charter-party, and amongst them the Baltic clause. The bill of lading provided that the goods shipped by The John Banfield by Fisher, Renwick, & Co. were to be delivered at the port of Trapani, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted, unto order or to assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions as per charter with average accustomed," and it was argued that the words "all other conditions as per charter" imported into the bill of lading the Baltic clause. The Baltic clause provided that "stranding and collisions, and all losses and damages caused thereby," were to be excepted, "even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners." I am of opinion that the words "all other conditions" must be connected with the words "paying freight for the coals," and include only such conditions as are ejusdem generis with the payment of freight, importing into the bill of lading so much of the charter-party as is referable to the subject-matter of the discharge and receipt of cargo at the port of discharge, and do not include a clause which would add to the exceptions already recited, and very materially alter the contract on the face of the bill of lading. Russell v. Niemann, 17 C. B. N. S. 163, 12 W. R. C. L. Dig. 121, is directly in point. Russell v. Niemann was recognized and approved of in the case of Taylor v. Perrin in the House of Lords, the shorthand writer's judgment in which has been furnished to me, though the case does not seem to have found its way into the regular reports. Lord O'Hagan describes Russell v. Niemann to be a perfectly well-decided case. Lord Blackburn says: "I am clearly of opinion that, on the true construction of the bill of lading, the reference to the charter-party does not extend the exceptions by adding those that are in the charter-party. The case which has been referred to (Russell v. Niemann)—in which Wills, J., gave judgment, as it appears to me, perfectly correctly—decided that the reference to the charter-party is meant to bring in those conditions which would apply to the person who has taken the bill of lading and is taking the delivery of the cargo, such as the payment of demurrage, the payment of freight, the manner of paying, and so on, but is by no means to be taken to incorporate all the conditions of the charter-party.

It was said that Lord Fitzgerald appeared to dissent from that view in the House of Lords, but I do not so read his judgment. He merely says that it was not necessary to discuss it for the decision of the particular case before them. Mr. French argued that Gray v. Carr, 19 W. R. 1173, L. R. 6 Q. B. 522, and Porteus v. Watney, 27 W. R. 30, 3 Q. B. D. 534, must be considered to overrule Russell v. Niemann, but in both those cases the conditions imported into the bill of lading were ejusdem generis with those contained in the bill of lading. The other authorities cited—Gullischen v. Stewart, 31 W. R. 745, 11 Q. B. D. 186, and on appeal 32 W. R. 763, 13 Q. B. D. 317; Gardner v. Trechman, 33 W. R. 190, 15 Q. B. D. 154; and Hamilton v. Mackie, 5 Times Law Rep. 677—amount to this, that where there are such words of reference in the bill of lading all the provisions of the charter-party are to be considered as introduced in the bill of lading, and that if then any of those are contradictory to the terms of the bill of lading or insensible they may be rejected. In this case, as the parties have agreed that there should be only certain exceptions mentioned in the bill of lading, the introduction of the Baltic clause would altogether override those exceptions, and, therefore, be inconsistent with the provisions which in the bill of lading were agreed to by the parties. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that, the negligence having been proved, the defendants are not exempted from the consequences of that negligence either by the terms of the bill of lading or the charter-party, and that, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict for the amount claimed—£447 1s.

BILLS v. TATHAM. (a.)

Settlement—Voluntary settlement—Assignment to trustees—Debts secured by bills of sale—Debts got in during lifetime of settlor—Liability of settlor's estate.

P. executed a voluntary settlement in favour of his wife and other relatives, by which he assigned to two trustees certain property, including four debts secured by registered bills of sale, for which he gave them power to sue, upon trust to convert the trust property into money, and execute all necessary assurances for this purpose. P. died intestate, having in his lifetime got in the four debts in question.

Held (affirming the decision of the court below), that the debts were completely assigned by the voluntary settlement, and the estate of the settlor was liable to make good to the trustees the amount of the debts got in by the settlor.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

J. Patrick, a solicitor, executed a voluntary settlement on the 11th of August, 1873, in favour of his wife, his sister, and two sisters of his wife. By this deed he assigned to two persons therein named as trustees a leasehold house and certain other property, including four debts secured in his favour by registered bills of sale on the goods and chattels of the debtors, to be held by the trustees upon the trusts therein declared. The deed contained a recital that the settlor was "entitled to the several principal sums of money specified in the schedule hereto, and due and owing to him respectively on the securities in such schedule also specified, together with interest thereon respectively." The deed also contained an assignment to the trustees of "all that and those the several principal sums of money specified in the schedule hereto as owing to the settlor, and all interest due and to grow due thereon respectively, and all the estate and interest of the settlor therein," together with power for the trustees to sue and give receipts for the principal sums thereinbefore assigned, or any of them, and all interest thereon respectively, in the name or names of the settlor, his executors, administrators, or assigns. The first trust declared was to "sell, call in, or convert into money the said trust premises," "and for the purposes aforesaid, or any of them, to execute and do all such assurances and things as shall be expedient." The deed did not contain any express assignment to the trustees of the securities for the four debts, nor any covenant for further assurance. The schedule to the deed stated the amount of each of the four debts, the name of the debtor from whom it was due, and the date of the bill of sale by which it was secured.

The settlor died, intestate, on the 29th of September, 1888, and he had before his death received from the debtors the four debts in question.

This action was brought for the administration of the estate of the intestate and the execution of the trusts of the settlement.

The plaintiffs were the two sisters of the deceased's wife; the widow (who was of unsound mind, and sued by a next friend); and a creditor, who sued on behalf of himself and all other the creditors of the deceased. The defendants were the trustees of the settlement and the sister of the deceased, who was the administratrix of his estate.

Kekewich, J., held that the four debts were validly assigned by the voluntary deed, and became subject to the trusts thereof.

The administratrix appealed.

In re TREHEARNE.

Ex parte EALING LOCAL BOARD. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Garnishee order—Postponement of payment under garnishee order—Liability of debtor to bankrupt's estate—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 45, sub-section 1.

A garnishee, by an arrangement with the judgment creditor obtained an extension of time for the payment of the attached debt. Subsequently to the garnishee order being made absolute, but before the extended time for payment had expired, the judgment debtor was adjudicated bankrupt. The garnishee, subsequent to this adjudication, paid the attached debt under the above arrangement to the judgment creditor.

Held, that the garnishee order became ineffectual under the provisions of section 45, sub-section 1, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, by reason of the intervention of the bankruptcy of the judgment debtor before the attached debt had been actually paid by the garnishee to the judgment creditor, and consequently that the garnishee remained liable to the estate of the bankrupt for the amount of the debt.

Appeal from an order of Cave, J., declaring a debt, attached under a garnishee order before the receiving order had been made, to be part of the brankrupt's estate.

The appellants, the Ealing Local Board, had contracted in April, 1889, with the present bankrupt, Trehearne, for some work to be done for which they owed him payment. Messrs. Fardell & Co. subsequently obtained judgment against Trehearne for £78.

On August 1, 1889, Messrs. Fardell obtained a rule nisi for a garnishee order on the local Board for the money due from them to Trehearne. Notice of the order was served upon the Board on August 2, and the order was made absolute on August 8, in favour of Messrs. Fardell. The money thereupon became due from the local Board, and execution could have issued, but owing to the vacation of the financial committee of the Board, by an arrangement between Messrs. Fardell and the clerk to the Board incorporated in letters, Messrs. Fardell undertook not to issue execution until after the next meeting of the financial committee on October 3, the board in the meantime undertaking "to hold the sum on behalf of and in favour of Messrs. Fardell and at their disposal." In the interval a receiving order was made against Trehearne, whom the Board had no previous reason to suspect of being in difficulties, and he was adjudicated bankrupt on the 6th of September.

On October 3 the Board met and sent a cheque to Messrs. Fardell for the £78, according to their undertaking. The official receiver, as trustee for Trehearne, called upon the Board to pay the money over again to the bankrupt's estate. This they declined to do. The trustee thereupon applied to and obtained from Cave, J., an order declaring the debt to be part of the estate. Against this order the Board now appealed.

H. R. Clayton, for the appellants.—Cave, J., held that section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, applied, but that only refers to a creditor of a bankrupt. Here, the Board was a debtor to the bankrupt. Assuming that the section applied, there was a real receipt of the debt by Messrs. Fardell on August 8, and from that time they had a charge on the moneys of the Board to that amount. The Board became trustees for Fardell. Butler v. Waring, 17 Q. B. D. 182, 34 W. R. Dig. 17, does not apply.

Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee.—The real test is, what was the situation at the time that Trehearne was adjudicated bankrupt? The debt due to the bankrupt was not discharged. A receiving order coming between a garnishee order, and payment under that order, renders it void, and the creditor loses his right to attach it under section 168 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The effect of section 45 is that the creditor of the bankrupt is not entitled to retain the benefit of his garnishee order. [He was stopped by the court.]

Clayton, in reply.—Messrs. Fardell were in the position of "secured creditors."

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I do not think that the judgment of Cave, J., implies that the Local Board came within the terms of section 45 of the Act, but that the consequences of that section applied against Messrs. Fardell and made their garnishee order ineffectual. The Board, therefore, remained debtors to Trehearne. Had the debt been paid to Messrs. Fardell under the garnishee order the Board would have been relieved from any liability to Trehearne. But his bankruptcy intervenes, with the result that Messrs. Fardell could no longer insist on their garnishee order being satisfied. The trustee had a right to take Messrs. Fardell's place, as it were, and claim payment from the Board. The Board, indeed, have paid Messrs. Fardell, not under the garnishee order, but under the terms of the alleged contract. Trehearne was no party to such contract. His trustee is not, therefore, bound in any way by it. Whether such an undertaking was binding upon the Board or not is quite inmaterial to the trustee in bankruptcy.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is hard that the Board should have to pay twice over, but it is their own fault. They owe £78 to Trehearne; a garnishee order is made in favour of Messrs. Fardell, who become to that extent secured creditors. Had payment been made to them at the time there was an end to the liability of the Board. But they do not pay. They only give a promise to pay. The letters do not amount to an equitable assignment of the debt to Messrs. Fardell. Such an assignment must be made by the creditor, not the debtor. They simply amount to an arrangement for forbearance from execution, and an extension of the time for payment. The fact that the Board may have by this arrangement bound themselves to pay Messrs. Fardell does not affect Trehearne or his representative. Before the obligation is discharged the bankruptcy of Trehearne intervenes, and by section 45 the holders of the garnishee order thereby lose their security. The Board must therefore discharge their liability to Trehearne or his trustee. A promise to pay Messrs. Fardell is no answer, nor can such promise make Messrs. Fardell secured creditors.

LOPES, L.J.—It is enough for me to say that there was no payment of the debt before the receiving order was made. Messrs. Fardell, therefore, under section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, lose the benefit of their garnishee order; and that they had agreed by arrangement to forbear from enforcing payment at the time when they had a right to do so, does not secure to them the maintenance of that right when the bankruptcy of the original creditor has intervened.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN SMITH & SERVICE AND NELSON & SONS. (a.)

Arbitration — Submission — Power of court to compel appointment of arbitrator—9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, s. 1 —3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 39—52 & 53 Vict. c. 49.

An agreement to refer disputes to arbitration contained a provision that the matters in dispute should be referred to three arbitrators, one to be appointed by each of the parties, and the third by the two so appointed. A dispute having arisen, one of the parties refused to appoint an arbitrator.

Held, that the court had no power to compel him to do so.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Wills, J.).

Messrs. Nelson & Sons, by a charter-party dated the 28th of November, 1889, chartered a steamship belonging to Messrs. Smith & Service for a voyage to America, the ship to be at the charterers' disposal on the 3rd of December. She did not arrive until the 6th of December, and the charterers having then refused to take her, her owners claimed damages for breach of the charter-party, which contained the following clause:—"Should any dispute arise between the owners and charterers the matters in dispute shall be referred to three persons, one to be appointed by each of the parties hereto, and the third by the two so chosen, whose decision, or that of any two of them, shall be final, and for the purpose of enforcing any award this agreement may be made a rule of court."

The shipowners on the 7th of December gave the charterers notice that they had appointed an arbitrator under this clause, and called upon them to appoint one. The charterers took no notice of this.

The Arbitration Act, 1889, having come into force on the 1st of January, 1890, the shipowners on the 28th of April, 1890, served the charterers with a fresh notice of their appointment of an arbitrator, and upon this being again disregarded they obtained an order at chambers directing the charterers within seven days to appoint an arbitrator in accordance with the terms of the submission to arbitration contained in the charter-party. The Divisional Court upheld this order, and the charterers appealed.

French, Q.C., and C. A. Russell, for the appellants.—The court has no power under the Arbitration Act, 1889, to make this order. Section 1, under which the order is made, gives no new remedy, and prior to the Act there was no power to force a party to appoint an arbitrator.

Barnes, Q.C., and Leck, for the respondents.—The Act makes the submission an order of court, and the court has an inherent jurisdiction to enforce its order.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case, in an ordinary mercantile charter-party, a not unnatural clause for arbitration is inserted, that in case of any dispute arising it shall be referred to three arbitrators, one to be appointed by each of the parties, and the third by the two arbitrators. They are all three to take part in the inquiry and award, so that they are three arbitrators, and not two arbitrators and an umpire. That submission to arbitration was on the 1st of January, 1890, made a rule of court by the operation of the Arbitration Act, 1889. Thereupon the court is asked to make an order upon the charterer that he should appoint an arbitrator within seven days. It is said that there is no jurisdiction to make such an order. If there is no jurisdiction, it is plain that the court could not fix any time at all. The question, therefore, is whether the court have any jurisdiction to order one of the parties to appoint an arbitrator. It is said that the question depends on the construction of the Arbitration Act, 1889. It is plain that since this was a case of three arbitrators sections 4, 5, and 6 have no application, but the Divisional Court have thought that section 1 gave them the power to make this order. It has been argued that the court had power before the Act of 1889 to make such an order, and that that Act only declares a power which already existed. If there was such a power before, I should be inclined to agree with this, but if there was no such power it will become a question whether any such power is given by the Act of 1889. No court, either of law or of equity, has ever exercised this power before, but it is said that the power existed wherever a submission was made a rule of court, although it was overlooked. I confess that that argument does not commend itself to me. No doubt persons tried at equity to obtain specific performance of agreements to refer, but they failed. That they went to courts of equity shows that they knew they had no power to enforce the arbitration at common law, and in equity they failed. Submissions to arbitration were allowed to be made rules of court because when the arbitration tribunal was fixed the aid of the court was needed in carrying on the arbitration. The effect was to give the court various powers over the arbitration, and to enable them to enforce the award. Under the early Acts the submission to arbitration was revocable, even although it had been made a rule of court. That is wholly inconsistent with the idea that the submission became an order of the court, and enabled the court to force either party to nominate an arbitrator and proceed with the arbitration. By subsequent Acts the submission was made irrevocable—that is to say, that after the arbitrator has been appointed, the person appointing him cannot revoke his authority. That is called revoking the submission, because if there is no arbitrator the arbitration cannot proceed. That was the state of things up to the Act of 1889, which, by section 1, makes all submissions irrevocable except by leave. Submission there means the appointment of the arbitrator, not the agreement to refer. That was always irrevocable. The section goes on to enact that the submission shall have the same effect as if it had been made a rule of court. The section gives no more power to the court than it possessed before. It is said that the court had power to attach a person disobeying its orders after the submission had been made a rule of court. That may be so, but the attachment would issue for revoking an appointment, not for neglecting or refusing to appoint. There was no power either before or after the Act to call upon a party to appoint an arbitrator. The only remedy is for a breach of the agreement to appoint. The Divisional Court, therefore, have, in my opinion, unduly stretched the meaning of the Act, and the appeal must be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question is whether the Divisional Court had any jurisdiction to make this order. It seems quite plain that until 1889 there is no precedent for any such order, and it is difficult to assume that the jurisdiction nevertheless existed. The contention is that by making the submission a rule of court, which was first allowed by the Act of Will. 3, it becomes an order of the court which can be enforced. If that argument is sound the court would from that time have had power to do much which they have consistently declined to do. The real truth is that the statute of Will. 3 was never so construed. Submissions to arbitration when made rules of court have had certain consequences, but they have never had such consequences attributed to them as is sought to be done in the present case. There has never been an order to appoint an arbitrator nor an attachment for refusing to appoint. I do not think the Act of 1889 alters the law as to this. Submissions are by virtue of the Act made rules of court, but they are to have the same effect as if they had been so made by the act of the parties. I agree, therefore, that there was no jurisdiction to make this order.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The words "submission" and "revocation" are often used with some inexactitude. There may be a general agreement to refer matters to arbitration. That is a submission, and is always irrevocable. There may be an agreement to clothe a certain person with the authority of an arbitrator. That was at one time revocable, and when it was revoked the agreement became useless, and in that sense it was a revocation of the submission. The distinction is well pointed out in Randall v. Thomson, 24 W. R. 837, 1 Q. B. D. 748, and it must be borne in mind in examining the section now under consideration. The agreement to refer was always irrevocable, the submission to a particular person was sometimes revocable and sometimes not. This section, however, makes it irrevocable, and by section 27 a submission includes an agreement to refer where the arbitrator is not named. The distinction is perceived by the Act of Will. 4, which directs that when the submission is made a rule of court the powers and authority of the arbitrator shall become irrevocable. The person appointing the arbitrator cannot after that determine the mandate which he had given. The thing, therefore, that was revoked was not the agreement to refer, but the authority given to the arbitrator. But no making of the submission a rule of court compelled the party to go on with the arbitration if the arbitrators were not named. The Act of Will. 4 does not apply to such a case, and if we were to allow the contention of the respondents to succeed we should be giving a much larger construction to the Act than was ever intended. The law as to attachments is well laid down in Rouse v. Meier, 19 W. R. 438, L. R. 6 C. P. 212, by Willes, J. A person revoking the authority of the arbitrator after the submission had been made a rule of court might be attached, but there is no case of an attachment for the nonperformance of an agreement to refer. No doubt it was not often that a submission was made a rule of court before the arbitrator was appointed, but the object of making it a rule of court was to give the court power over the arbitration and award, and not to compel either party to proceed to appoint an arbitrator. I think, therefore, that section 1 does not extend the law as to this, and that as the respondents cannot bring the case within the other sections there was no jurisdiction to make this order, and the appeal must be allowed.

In re HARDING'S SETTLED ESTATE. (a.)

Settled land—Absolute trust for sale vested in trustees—Application by tenant for life for leave to exercise power of sale—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 3, 63—Settled Land Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 18), ss. 6 (1), 7.

A testator directed that, if his residuary personal estate should be insufficient for payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and legacies, they should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of his residuary real estate, and he devised his residuary real estate to trustees upon trust for sale and investment, and to hold the trust funds in trust for two ladies during their joint lives, and for the survivor during her life, with remainder for their children, and if neither should have a child who attained a vested interest the testator gave the property to the trustees absolutely. Neither of the two ladies had married. The residuary personalty proved insufficient for the payment of legacies as well as debts. In 1887 the trustees commenced an action for the administration of the testator's estate in the Lancaster Palatine Court, and, under an order made in that action, money was raised by mortgage of the residuary real estate for payment of the legacies, and it was certified to be for the benefit of all parties interested that the sale should be postponed. All charges prior to the interest of the two ladies were paid off.

Held, on the application of the two ladies, that they should have leave, under section 7 of the Settled Land Act, 1884, to sell the real estate remaining unsold.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application under section 7 of the Settled Land Act, 1884, by the persons constituting the tenant for life of settled land, subject to a trust for sale vested in trustees, for leave to exercise the power of sale conferred, upon the persons constituting the tenant for life by virtue of sections 3 and 63 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

John Harding, by his will, dated the 14th of February, 1881, directed that, if his residuary personal estate should be insufficient for payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and legacies, they should be paid out of the proceeds of sale thereinafter directed of his residuary real estate. And he devised his residuary real estate to his executors and trustees, John Smith and John Wigram, upon trust for sale and for investment as therein mentioned, and to hold the investments in trust for Jane Smith and Elizabeth Smith during their joint lives, and for the survivor of them during her life, and after the death of the survivor in trust for their children as therein mentioned, and in case there should be no child who should live to attain a vested interest in the trust property, the testator gave the same to John Smith and John Wigram for their own benefit. The will gave the trustees no power to postpone the sale of the residuary real estate.

The testator died in 1884. At the time of his death the two ladies who became the tenant for life of the trust property were spinsters of the respective ages of fifty-three and forty-nine, and neither had since married.

The residuary personal estate of the testator was sufficient for payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, but not for payment of the legacies given by his will.

An action for the administration of the testator's estate had been commenced by the trustees in the year 1887 in the Lancaster Chancery Court, Jane Smith and Elizabeth Smith being made defendants; and, in pursuance of an order dated the 6th of January, 1888, made in that action, a sum of £7,000 had been raised by mortgage of the residuary real estate, and the legacies were paid out of that sum. An inquiry whether it would be fit and proper and for the benefit of all persons interested that the residuary real estate should be sold had also been directed in the action, and the registrar had certified that it would be for the benefit of all persons interested that the sale should be postponed. But, notwithstanding this answer to the inquiry, the trustees subsequently entered into a contract for the sale of a part of the estate.

The present summons was taken out by Jane Smith and Elizabeth Smith against the trustees for an order that, notwithstanding what had taken place, they might be authorized by the court under section 7 of the Settled Land Act, 1884, to exercise the statutory power of sale by the combined operation of sections 3 and 63 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, given to the persons constituting the tenant for life of settled land.

The Settled Land Act, 1882, after providing by section 3 that "a tenant for life may sell the settled land or any part thereof," provides by section 63 that in case of land or any estate or interest in land which under or by virtue of any deed or will "is subject to a trust or direction for sale of that land, estate, or interest, . . . and for the application or disposal of the money to arise from the sale, or the income of that money, or the income of the land until sale, or any part of that money or income, for the benefit of any person for his life, or any other limited period, or for the benefit of two or more persons concurrently for any limited period, and whether absolutely or subject to a trust for accumulation of income for payment of debts or other purpose, or to any other restriction, shall be deemed to be settled land, and the instrument or instruments under which the trust arises shall be deemed to be a settlement; and the person for the time being beneficially entitled to the income of the land, estate, or interest aforesaid until sale, whether absolutely or subject as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be tenant for life thereof; or if two or more persons are so entitled concurrently, then those persons shall be deemed to constitute together the tenant for life thereof; and the persons, if any, who are for the time being under the settlement trustees for sale of the settled land, or having power of consent to, or approval of, or control over the sale, or if under the settlement there are no such trustees, then the persons, if any, for the time being who are by the settlement declared to be trustees thereof for purposes of this Act are for purposes of this Act trustees of the settlement. In every such case the provisions of the Act referring to a tenant for life, and to a settlement, and to settled land, shall extend to the person or persons aforesaid, and to the instrument or instruments under which his or their estate or interest arises, and to the land therein comprised," subject to certain exceptions not material to the present case.

The Settled Land Act, 1884, enacts by section 6 (1) that "in the case of a settlement within the meaning of section 63 of the Act of 1882 any consent not required by the terms of the settlement is not by force of anything contained in that Act to be deemed necessary to enable the trustees of the settlement or any other person to execute any of the trusts or powers created by the settlement." And by section 7 that "with respect to the powers conferred by section 63 of the Act of 1882 the following provisions are to have effect:—(1) Those powers are not to be exercised without the leave of the court; (ii.) the court may by order in any case in which it thinks fit give leave to exercise all or any of those powers, and the order is to name the person or persons to whom leave is given; (iii.) the court may from time to time rescind or vary any order made under this section or may make any new or further order; (iv.) so long as an order under this section is in force neither the trustees of the settlement nor any person other than a person having the leave shall execute any trust or power created by the settlement for any purpose for which leave is by the order given, to exercise a power conferred by the Act of 1882; (vii.) an application to the court under this section may be made by the tenant for life or by the persons who together constitute the tenant for life within the meaning of section 63 of the Act of 1882; (ix.) the person or persons to whom leave is given by an order under this section shall be deemed the proper person or persons to exercise the powers conferred by section 63 of the Act of 1882, and shall have and may exercise those powers accordingly."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the applicants.—The effect of sections 3 and 63 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, is to confer upon the applicants the power of sale of a tenant for life; but in consequence of section 7 of the Settled Land Act, 1884, the leave of the court is now necessary to enable them to exercise that power. The order of the Palatine Court, made more than three years ago, which was to some extent a consent order, does not take away their power of sale which by the Act of 1882 is made inalienable, or prevent them from coming to this court for leave to exercise that power. Since the order of the Palatine Court, circumstances have arisen which make a sale advisable, and as all interests prior to that of the applicants are now cleared away, and repairs, &c., are paid out of the income, which belongs to the applicants, they are the proper persons to exercise the power of sale. Also the trustees are entitled to a commission on the income, which reduces the benefit derived by the applicants, and gives the trustees an interest adverse to the applicants to a limited extent.

They referred to Cardigan v. Curzon-Howe, 37 W. R. 247, 40 Ch. D. 338; Taylor v. Poncia, 32 W. R. 335, 25 Ch. D. 646.

Alfred Hopkinson, for the trustees.—The trustees have a power of sale given them by the testator, and the Act of 1884 does not take it away, but by section 6 makes the consent of the tenant for life unnecessary. The trustees are the proper persons to exercise the power of sale, when it is to be exercised.

He referred to Taylor v. Poncia.

NORTH, J.—I think the case is reasonably clear. The trustees here have a trust to sell but have no power to postpone the sale. Then there was a suit for the administration of the testator's estate in the Lancaster Chancery Court, and in answer to an inquiry directed in that suit it was found by the registrar in his report that it would be for the benefit of all persons interested that the sale should be postponed. Although it is suggested in this case that the trustees have an interest adverse to the tenant for life, what the Palatine Court has decided satisfies me that everything was bonâ fide and proper down to the date of the report. The report was made on the 16th of February, 1888, in the presence of the parties, and that is conclusive that at the time it was made it was advisable that the sale should be postponed, and that the legacies should be raised by mortgage. That was three years ago. The tenants for life now come and say that they ought to be allowed to exercise the power of sale given by the Settled Land Act, 1882. That Act provides, speaking in general terms, that the tenant for life is the person to decide whether land should be put into the market. That would not have effect in cases where land was subject to a trust or direction for sale and for the application of the proceeds if it were not for section 63 of that Act, for that section deals with land so subject, and implies that without its provisions such land would not come within the Act. Subsequently difficulties arose with respect to land subject to a trust for sale which came within that section. Lands are vested in trustees upon trust for sale for many purposes, such as to pay debts and other things, and to hold the surplus in trust to invest and pay the income to beneficiaries.

Difficulties arose as to the application of the Act in these cases. Pearson, J., in Taylor v. Poncia, took the view that an absolute trust for sale vested in trustees was not overridden by the provisions of the Act of 1882. That decision solved the difficulty to some extent. Then the Legislature passed the Settled Land Act, 1884, which provides, by section 6, that in case of a settlement within section 63 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, any consent not required by the settlement is unnecessary to enable the trustees to execute any trusts or powers created by the settlement. That provision is not confined to the point decided in Taylor v. Poncia. As regards land coming within that provision the powers of the trustees are confirmed, and the tenant for life is not the person to dictate whether the trust for sale is to be carried out. Then the Settled Land Act, 1884, goes on to provide, by section 7, that "with respect to the powers conferred by section 63 of the Act of 1882, certain provisions are to have effect"—viz., that those powers are not to be exercised without the leave of the court, but that the court may give leave to the tenant for life to exercise those powers. The result of the two sections is that the consent of the tenant for life is not required to enable the trustees to exercise the trusts created by the settlement, but, with respect to the powers conferred by section 63 of the Act of 1882, the court may give the tenant for life leave to exercise all or any of these powers. If the court thinks that the tenant for life ought to have a power of sale the court should allow the tenant for life to sell. There are some cases in which the tenant for life ought to have the power to sell. I think this is a case in which I ought, under section 7, to give the tenants for life leave to sell, the reason being that I find that everything paramount to the interest of the tenants for life is cleared away. It is the simplest possible case. If I am ever to say that the tenant for life should have leave under section 7, I cannot suggest a more suitable case. It has been suggested that section 7 of the Act of 1884 is intended to protect the tenant for life against breaches of trust. I think not. There are other ways of preventing breaches of trust. I think that the meaning of it is that the tenant for life should have leave under that section where it is right that he should have power to sell.

There remains the question as to the order of the Palatine Court. I think there is no difficulty as to that. If the order had been made by me, or any judge of the High Court, I should not think that it prevented me from giving the leave asked for. I should say that, notwithstanding that order, the tenants for life should now be empowered to sell. I must take the same course now, especially as the judge of the Palatine Court had no jurisdiction to make the order asked for by the applicants.

In re WINSLOW.
FRERE v. WINSLOW. (a.)

Will—Administration—Overpayment to beneficiary—Liability of trustees—Costs.

A testator gave his residuary estate upon trust for his wife for life, and after her death he gave one-fourth to each of his two sons, and the other two-fourths upon trust for his two daughters and their children respectively, and appointed his wife and two sons trustees and executors. His widow and sons proved the will, but the administration of the estate was left to the widow, who distributed large sums among the beneficiaries in respect of their shares, but not equally; and one son, who was an executor and trustee, especially received considerably more than the others. Ultimately, after the death of the widow, the estate was found to be insufficient to give the other beneficiaries as much as the son had received. There was no evidence to show that the deficiency had not arisen from depreciation subsequent to the payments to the son, which primâ facie appeared probable.

Held, in an action to administer the testator's estate, that the surviving executors were not liable for the overpayment made by the widow to the son, and that the son was not bound to refund the amount he had been overpaid, but was not entitled to receive his separate costs, as the overpayment exceeded the amount of such costs.

Further consideration.

The action was brought in 1881 for the administration of the estate of Forbes B. Winslow, who died in 1874, having made a will and codicils by which he gave his residuary real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust for his wife, Susannah Winslow, for life, and after her death upon trust to pay one-fourth to each of his two sons, Forbes Edward Winslow and Lyttleton S. Forbes Winslow, and to stand possessed of one other fourth in trust for his daughter, Susannah F. a'Beckett and her children, and to stand possessed of the remaining fourth in trust for his daughter Constance Stanier, then Constance Frere, and her children; and he appointed his wife and two sons, F. E. Winslow and L. S. F. Winslow, and also Thomas Ewing Winslow, trustees and executors of his will, and directed that any sum which he expended in purchasing an advowson for his son F. E. Winslow should be considered as part of the share of that son of the residuary estate.

The testator left his wife and four children him surviving, and the widow and two sons proved his will, but Thomas Ewing Winslow renounced probate thereof. Subsequently to the date of his will the testator laid out £5,000 in the purchase of an advowson for his son F. E. Winslow.

The administration of the testator's estate was left to his widow. The two sons joined her in getting in the debts due to the estate, and in selling certain stock; but the moneys thus obtained were paid into the banking account of the widow, who, without the concurrence of the two sons, made large payments in respect of the testator's property, and also distributed, on account of their shares of the residuary estate, large sums among her children, some of whom received considerably more than the others.

The plaintiffs in the action were the infant children of Mrs. Stanier by her former husband, John T. Frere. The defendants were the testator's widow, his two sons, and the rest of the beneficiaries under his will other than the plaintiffs. By the chief clerk's certificate, dated the 10th of August, 1887, a balance of over £2,000 was found due from the estate of the testator's widow, who died after the commencement of the action; and it was submitted for the decision of the court whether a surcharge brought in by the defendant, Mrs. a'Beckett, against the two sons, as surviving executors of the testator, for moneys received by the executors and paid into the banking account of the testator's widow ought to be allowed.

The action came on on further consideration on the 4th of July, 1888, when the surcharge submitted for the decision of the court was disallowed, the surviving executors were allowed their general costs, the executors' accounts were ordered to be continued, and an account was directed of sums received by the legatees on account of their shares of the residuary estate, with interest from the death of the testator's widow.

By the chief clerk's certificate as to the accounts and inquiries directed on the further consideration of the action, it was found that Forbes Edward Winslow had received £13,294 7s. 5d., of which £10,331 7s. 8d. was principal and £2,962 19s. 9d. interest; Lyttleton S. Forbes Winslow had received £9,548 10s. 10d., of which £7,619 1s. 3d. was principal and £1,929 9s. 7d. interest; Mrs. a'Beckett and her children £9,591 10s. 11d., of which £7,720 19s. 7d. was principal and £1,870 11s. 4d. interest; and Mrs. Stanier and her children £9,404 14s. 9d., of which £7,509 10s. 1d. was principal and £1,895 4s. 8d. interest, in respect of their shares in the residuary estate. The remaining assets were proved to be insufficient to make up the shares of the beneficiaries other than Forbes Edward Winslow equal to the amount he had received.

Lyttleton S. Forbes Winslow was adjudicated a bankrupt.

The action now came on for further consideration for the second time.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Dundas Gardiner, for Mrs. Stanier and her children.—It was the duty of the two sons as trustees to see that the residuary estate was distributed among the beneficiaries in equal shares, and, consequently, they are responsible for the overpayments. Forbes Edward Winslow, who is a trustee, ought to refund the amount by which he has been overpaid. At any rate, any costs he is allowed should not be paid to him, as he has already received too much.

Levett, for Mrs. a'Beckett and her children.

a'Beckett Turner, for Mr. a'Beckett.

Gazdar, for the trustee in bankruptcy of Lyttleton S. Forbes Winslow.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and A. a'B. Terrell, for the two sons, the surviving executors.—The rule is that if an estate is insufficient to pay all beneficiaries to the same extent as some have already been paid, but the deficiency arises from depreciation of the estate since the latter have received their shares, there is no breach of trust, and the beneficiaries who have been paid are not bound to repay any portion of what they have received: Fenwick v. Clarke, 10 W. R. 636, 4 De G. F. & J. 240; Peterson v. Peterson, 15 W. R. 164, L. R. 3 Eq. 111; Hilliard v. Fulford, 25 W. R. 161, 4 Ch. D. 389. The testator's widow alone paid the moneys to Mr. Forbes Edward Winslow, and the two sons did not receive and disburse those moneys. The payments to him were allowed on further consideration, and the executors were allowed their costs, which is sufficient answer to any charge of breach of trust.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—In this case the residuary estate is divisible among four sets of persons. There were three executors—the testator's widow and his two sons; and although the three executors proved and acted to some extent, yet, to a considerable extent, the widow acted alone. She received and paid large amounts in transactions in which the sons took no part. Amongst other things, she distributed large sums among the beneficiaries. She did not do so equally, and it turns out now that one of the sons has received between two and three thousand pounds more than the others, taking capital and income together. After these payments were made the action commenced; and I know, from what I have seen of the proceedings in chambers and in court, that the costs were very considerable, and, having regard to the nature of the estate, they must necessarily have been large. The action was heard upon further consideration at that time, and certain surcharges brought against the executors were dealt with by the court. When the order on further consideration was made the executors, as distinguished from the executrix, were cleared, and the best proof of that is that they got their costs of the action. The executrix was in a different position. A balance was found due from her which her estate was unable to pay, and it was argued before me that certain sums which she had received were sums for which her co-executors and co-trustees were responsible, and I came to the conclusion that they were not. Generally, when accounts are taken in chambers, sums paid by an executor or trustee to a beneficiary are not allowed in the first instance. They are disallowed with a note that the payments have been made to the beneficiaries on account, and the matter is set right subsequently, when it appears that there is sufficient in court to bring the other beneficiaries up to an equality. I do not know why the usual course was not followed. I come to the conclusion that the payments were allowed because everybody was satisfied that there was no reason why the payments should not be allowed. The largest payments were made to one of the trustees, and an attempt was made to distinguish this case on that ground. But the money was not paid to him in his character of trustee, and when he had received it it was not a sum he held as a trustee, for he would then have been charged with it in taking the accounts. The person who was charged with the amount paid to him was the widow. It was paid to him as a legatee, and, although he was a trustee of the will, he was not a trustee of that sum.

It is said that on further consideration it was apprehended that the estate might be insufficient to pay the other beneficiaries in full, because certain inquiries were directed. I am not satisfied that this is so, because such inquiries would have been necessary in any event in order to equalize the payments. It now turns out that, after payment of costs, the remaining assets will be insufficient to bring up the other three shares to an equality with what has been received by Forbes Edward Winslow. First, it is said that the estate of Lyttleton S. Forbes Winslow ought to be charged with that excess, because, being a trustee, he had paid it. It is inconsistent with the facts to say that he paid it; he never had it. With respect to Forbes Edward Winslow, it was paid to him before the action was brought, as a beneficiary. In my opinion there is no ground for saying that he is liable. The case of Fenwick v. Clarke is conclusive on this point. Then it is said that there is nothing to show the estate was sufficient at the time; and that if it was not, the beneficiary who was overpaid must account for what he has received in excess of his share. I think there is a strong primâ facie case for saying that the estate was then sufficient, though there is no direct evidence on the subject. There may be many reasons why the estate has since then considerably diminished. The assets comprised two lunatic asylums, which became much less valuable than they had been, and considerable sums had to be expended in respect of the leases, which may well have been at that time valuable property. Further, the expenses of this action must have been considerable; and, further, a sum of upwards of £2,000 has been found due from the estate of the widow. These circumstances afford strong ground for saying that in all probability the inability of the estate to satisfy the shares arose from depreciation subsequent to the institution of the action. There is nothing from which I can come to the conclusion that it did not.

I am asked to deprive the three executors of their costs on the ground that there has been some breach of trust. There has been nothing of the sort. As a matter of course they will be allowed their costs, in the same way as they were allowed them on the occasion of the first further consideration. If there are any separate costs coming to Edward Forbes Winslow in his character of beneficiary, they must be stopped, not because he is not entitled to them, but because he has been paid more than the amount thereof beyond what the others have received, and cannot have them over again.

The funds divisible are to be applied, in the first place, in bringing up the share of Mrs. Stanier and her children to an equality with that of Lyttleton S. Forbes Winslow; in the next place, in bringing up those two shares to an equality with Mrs. a'Beckett and her children; and then any surplus will be applied towards bringing those three shares to an equality with what has been paid in respect of the other shares.

By the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, s. 4, "A dispute under this Act between an employer and a workman may be heard and determined by a court of summary jurisdiction, and such court, for the purpose of this Act, shall be deemed to be a court of civil jurisdiction."

Held, that the word "dispute" is not limited to strictly legal causes of action, following Clemson v. Hubbard, 24 W. R. 312, 1 Ex. D. 179.

Held, further, that the time for bringing a complaint under the above Act before the court, was not limited to six months from the time when such complaint arose within the terms of section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, nor did that Act apply to a court of summary jurisdiction sitting under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, as a court of civil jurisdiction.

Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate of the Petty Sessional Division of Caerphilly, in the county of Glamorgan, under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

The case was stated as follows:—

At a petty sessions held at the Petty Sessional Court House at Merthyr Tydfil in and for the said Division on the 2nd day of April, 1890, a summons taken out by the mortgagees of the Plymouth Works, thereinafter called the respondents, on the 19th day of March, under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), against William Charles, thereinafter called the appellant, came on for hearing. The particulars attached to the said summons were as follows:—

1. "The defendant (the appellant) is now, and has been for some time past, a workman in the service of the plaintiffs (the respondents) as his employers, as a labourer at a fixed and standing rate of wage per day, paid by weekly advances and monthly settlements, and determinable by one month's notice on either side."

2. "The defendant now contends that he is not a workman engaged at a fixed and standing rate of wage, but insists that he is a workman whose wages are to be regulated by the selling prices of coal, and that, notwithstanding that he has always received a fixed and standing rate of wage, he claims to be entitled to percentages on his wages as from October 2, 1888."

3. "The defendant's contract, as stated in paragraph 1, is existing at the date hereof. The plaintiffs asked to have such contract rescinded upon such terms as to apportionment of fixed and standing wages as are accruing due as the court thinks just."

4. "The plaintiffs ask that the dispute be adjusted, determined, and set at rest by an order of this court."

5. "The subject-matter of the dispute is under the sum of £10."

"Dated this 19th day of March, 1890."

The following objections were taken before the magistrate at the hearing:—

1. That the matter was res judicata on the ground that two similar cases had been treated by agreement as test cases. The magistrate held that this was not the fact as to the other cases being treated as test cases.

2. That the contract had been determined by a notice before the hearing of the summons, and was therefore at an end, and could not be rescinded. The magistrate held that he could not rescind a contract already determined, but that he could adjust any existing disputes under that contract.

3. That the magistrate had no jurisdiction unless the dispute was founded upon an actionable claim. He held that under section 3, sub-section 1, of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, he had power to hear and adjust any disputes, and also that as a fact he found that a claim had been made, and that a dispute existed.

4. That the claim must be brought within six months under the general provision of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, and that, this contract having been made on the 2nd of October, 1888, the cause of action arose then. The magistrate held that the dispute alleged commenced in May, 1889, and was a continuing one till the determination of the contract on the 31st of March, 1890, and that, therefore, the court had jurisdiction over it.

5. That the jurisdiction was limited to the amount of £10, but that here the cause of action or the dispute if adjusted must cover the amount due from the 2nd of October, 1888, which would exceed £10. The magistrate held that the amount in dispute must be limited to that which accrued during the six months preceding the issue of the summons, and that as a fact this amount did not exceed £10.

6. That, the contract being determined by the respondents' notice, the relation of employer and workman had ceased to exist at the time of the summons, and no contract was in existence. The magistrate held that there was a dispute in existence, for which the appellant could bring an action notwithstanding the determination of the contract, and that, therefore, there was a dispute upon which the court could adjudicate.

The magistrate stated that he found as a fact: that the appellant was engaged at a standing day rate of wages; that he was not employed in or about the collieries; that he did not come under the operation of the said agreement; and ordered that, a dispute having arisen between the plaintiffs and the defendant under the contract of service, the defendant is entitled to be paid a fixed daily wage of 2s. 8d., and declared that he was not a workman coming under the designation of workman subject to the sliding scale agreement.

The questions of law for the opinion of the court were:

1. Was the magistrate right in holding that the court had power to hear any disputes whether arising during or through an action commenced or brought before the court simply as a dispute to be settled?

2. Was he right in holding that the dispute was of such a nature as would come within the meaning of section 3, sub-section 1, of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875?

3. Was he right in holding that, the dispute being a continuing one, the determination of the contract was the time from which the six months' time limitation began to run?

4. Was he right in holding that the amount of this case in dispute was the amount in difference for the six months preceding the issue of the summons?

5. Was he right in holding that, notwithstanding the determination of the contract before the hearing, the court had jurisdiction to hear and determine any disputes which may have arisen and were in existence under that contract?

6. If the court were of opinion that he was wrong in any of these points, the order made was to be quashed, and judgment entered for the appellant, with costs.

If the court were of opinion that he was right, then the said order was to stand.

Leslie, for the appellant. — The contract being terminated by notice, there was no existing cause of action known to the law. The court of summary jurisdiction is, for the purpose of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, ss. 3 and 4, analogous to a county court, and has only jurisdiction over disputes showing a legal claim sustainable in the latter court. The dispute must be one sounding in damages or in relief known to the law. All the cases show only disputes amounting to a legal cause of action: Clemson v. Hubbard, 24 W. R. 312, 1 Ex. D. 179; Hindley v. Haslam, 27 W. R. 61, 3 Q. B. D. 481; and Grainger v. Aynsley, 29 W. R. 242, 6 Q. B. D. 182. The cause of action arose more than six months previous to the hearing of the summons, and the provision of Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43) extends to all the jurisdiction of the magistrates' courts, whether given under that or other statutes.

Lewis (Poland, Q.C., with him).—It is not necessary that there should be a dispute in the ordinary legal sense of a claim to give the court jurisdiction under this Act of 1875: Clemson v. Hubbard. The only limitation to the jurisdiction is as to the amount—viz., £10. The statutory limitation as to time under Jervis's Act is not made applicable here, as it is under the Masters and Servants Act (26 & 27 Vict. c. 103), s. 4. The court here is given by the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, s. 4, jurisdiction analogous to that of the county court, which is not affected by any such limitation of time for bringing the action except in so far as the ordinary Statute of Limitations applies. [He was stopped.]

STEPHEN, J.—We are both of opinion that the order of the magistrate should stand. As to the only questions on which the court need express an opinion, I will merely say that we think that there was in point of law an existing dispute before the court.

The facts were within the case of Clemson v. Hubbard, and that case strongly supports the view that a larger meaning must be given to the word "dispute" than that argued for by the appellant. We think, further, that in point of fact there was a dispute in the statutory sense of that word—namely, whether the appellant ought to be paid certain wages at one rate or another. As to the point that there is a six months' limitation of time for bringing an action or dispute before the court imported from Jervis's Act—that is to say, that the party complaining must show to the court that the cause of complaint arose within six months from the time of the issue of the summons—we are of opinion that the argument that this limitation extends to all summary jurisdiction does not hold good. There is nothing in this Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, to restrict actions under it to any such limitation. The ordinary statutory limitation of six years is the only limitation which applies to proceedings under this Act, and Jervis's Act is not meant, nor can it be construed, so as to apply. This being our opinion, the case answers itself. We answer Yes to questions 1 and 2, though the latter question was immaterial. We answer No to question 3, because it was not necessary to consider the six months' limitation at all, and we answer Yes to questions 4 and 5.

BURNLEY EQUITABLE CO-OPERATIVE AND INDUSTRIAL SOCIETY (LIMITED) v. CASSON. (a.)

Apprentice — Corporation — Contract of apprenticeship to—Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 45), s. 11, sub-section 12 (a)—5 Eliz. c. 4—54 Geo. 3, c. 96, s. 2.

A trading corporation registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876, can enter into a legal and binding contract of apprenticeship.

The respondent Casson was articled to the Burnley Co-operative and Industrial Society for seven years to be instructed in the business of a "clogger." The society was registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876.

By section 11, sub-section 12 (a), of that Act it is provided that "any contract, which, if made between private persons, would be by law required to be in writing, and if made according to the English law to be under seal, may be made on behalf of the society in writing under the common seal of the society, and may, in the same manner, be varied or discharged." The appellants preferred a complaint against the respondent before the justices for a breach of the contract of apprenticeship. The justices refused to convict, on the ground that they had no jurisdiction, but stated a case from which it appeared (1) that the respondent executed the deed of apprenticeship by signing and sealing the same; (2) that from the date of the said deed—viz., the 28th of November, 1887—the respondent, who is an infant, remained in the employment of the appellants until the 25th of February, 1890, when he left the employ of the appellants, and has since refused to return; (3) that his masters were the directors of the appellant society, and might be, and as a fact were, changed from time to time, and that the directors had not necessarily any special knowledge of the business to which the respondent was apprenticed.

It was contended before the justices, on behalf of the respondent, that 54 Geo. 3, c. 96, which repeals 5 Eliz. c. 4, permits any person capable of doing so at common law to take an apprentice, but that the appellants, being a limited company having no common law rights and no statutory power enabling them to take an apprentice, could not enter into a binding contract to do so, and that an apprentice cannot be legally bound to a society or company, on the ground that the apprentice is entitled to the care and instruction of some defined and named person, the master's obligations being of a personal nature, and the following cases were cited in support of this contention: Couchman v. Sillar and Another, 18 W. R. 757; Brook (Appellant), Dawson (Respondent), 20 L. T. N. S. 611, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 3; Whincup v. Hughes, 19 W. R. 439, L. R. 6 C. P. 78.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the society could make a binding contract with a minor as its apprentice, in the same manner in which any private person might make such a contract, by virtue of sub-section 12 (a) of section 11 of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876, and that, therefore, the said deed of apprenticeship was a valid deed, and binding on the respondent. The questions for the opinion of the court were:—(1) Whether the appellants could legally enter into the contract with the respondent set forth in the indenture of apprenticeship. (2) Whether the respondent could and did legally bind himself an apprentice to the said appellants by the said indenture of apprenticeship.

R. S. Wright and Loehnis, for the appellants.—The justices were wrong in holding that they had not jurisdiction. There is no direct decision on the question as to whether a minor can be apprenticed to an incorporated company, but there is no legal principle against such apprenticeship. The case of Eaton v. Western 31 W. R. 313, 9 Q. B. D. 636, on the contrary, shows that the contract of apprenticeship does not require a continuity of personal relations between the apprentice and his master. The practice of entering into such contracts prevails extensively amongst societies of this description, and no question as to their validity has hitherto arisen.

Smyley, for the respondent.—The contract is not valid. It is for the appellants to show that in entering on a contract of this kind, extending over a period of seven years, they are acting within the authority conferred upon them by the Act of 1876, under which they were registered. The contract of apprenticeship is a personal trust which cannot be assigned over to another: Austin on Apprenticeship, p. 50.

Loehnis, in reply.—The society does not, as regards a contract of personal trust in the employer, differ from a firm or partnership. The apprentice can be taught his trade as well by the continuing managers of a company as by the continuing members of a firm.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 6.—HAWKINS, J.—The questions we have to decide are—(1) Whether co-operative or industrial societies registered under the Act of 1876 are qualified to take apprentices; and (2) whether a deed of apprenticeship entered into with them is legally valid.

By the deed of apprenticeship the society, for themselves and their successors, covenanted with the youth that they would, by the best methods they could use, instruct him or cause him to be instructed in the business of a "clogger," his father in the meantime maintaining and taking care of him. It was stated that many similar contracts of apprenticeship had been entered into with such societies, but that their legality and validity had not yet been determined. This, in itself, is a fact worthy of consideration. What, then, is the legal objection to such societies entering into such contracts of apprenticeship by which the apprentices are to learn the business carried on by the society. It cannot be because these societies have not the power to carry out such a contract, having regard to the purposes of their constitution; on the contrary, it is incidental to the business they actually carry on, for surely an apprentice cannot learn his business unless he is apprenticed to some person or body of persons bound to teach him. It cannot be said that they are incapable of giving instruction in their business. It appears to me, therefore, that there is no objection on principle to the deed of apprenticeship, and that a trading corporation may take apprentices to learn the business they are carrying on.

It was objected that the contract of apprenticeship is a personal contract; but that view cannot be carried out to its full extent, as may be illustrated by apprenticeships to businesses carried on by firms or partnerships. It has never been doubted that contracts of apprenticeship with large breweries or large manufacturing firms are good and valid, although some of the members take no part in and may know nothing of the business. In such cases instruction would be given to apprentices, not, perhaps, by any members of the firm, but by managers of the business under them—persons, of course, perfectly competent to teach the business, and the best possible persons to teach the business they themselves carry on. It appears to me, therefore, that it is difficult to say that in such cases it is necessary that there should be personal participation by the principals in the giving of instructions to the apprentices, and in this very case the society covenant that they will instruct the apprentice or cause him to be instructed in the business, and that they will instruct him by the best methods they can use. There is nothing in these covenants which they are not capable of carrying out, as they are only to cause him to be instructed in the business, and the father is to have charge of him and maintain him. It is a contract entered into for the benefit of the apprentice, and therefore, as there is no legal objection to it, I think it ought to stand as good and valid. If we decided otherwise there would be this anomaly—that societies or companies which carry on business on a large scale, and have many persons in their service competent to give the best possible instruction in their business, would be precluded from taking apprentices, while persons carrying on business on a small scale would be at liberty to do so.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the deed of apprenticeship is perfectly valid, and that the case must be remitted to the justices to be dealt with accordingly.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of the same opinion and for the same reasons. It would be a very serious thing for the court to interfere to prevent the carrying out of a contract in itself very beneficial, and which was already in operation in a great number of cases. I see no grounds, moreover, for such interference, and the case must go back to the justices.

Case remitted accordingly.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave, J.) April 18, 21, 25, 1890.

Ex parte EXECUTORS OF VAUGHAN.
In re DODDS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Contingent liability—Creditor's estimate—Assent of trustee—Annuity—Death of annuitant before dividend—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 37, schedule 2, r. 2—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 219, 228.

A proof tendered by a creditor alleged that the debtor was indebted to her in the sum of £7,000, being the value of an annuity of £1,440 payable to her by the debtor during the residue of her natural life, and the proof further stated the creditor's age, and that the annuity was valued accordingly. The proof was not admitted or rejected by the trustee within twenty-eight days, nor did he require further evidence in support of it; but four months after the proof had been tendered, and before any dividend had been declared or anything further done, the creditor died. The executors of the creditor were thereupon requested by the trustee to withdraw the original proof and to make an amended proof limited to the payments of the annuity due to the date of the creditor's death, and, on their refusal to do so, the proof was rejected by the trustee, on the ground that the annuity had been determined by the death of the creditor. On application by the executors to reverse the decision of the trustee and to direct him to admit the proof for the full amount,

Held, that, although the trustee must be taken to have admitted the existence and amount of the annuity, the omission to deal with the proof was not equivalent to an acceptance of the creditor's estimate, which, by section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was to be made by the trustee, and not by the creditor, and that it was open to the trustee to place an estimate on the value of the annuity after the death of the creditor, the true value of the annuity being the amount of the payments due and unpaid at the time of the creditor's death.

Appeal by executors from the rejection by the trustee of a proof of debt tendered against the estates of M. B. and J. Dodds.

On the 7th of March, 1889, a receiving order was made against M. B. Dobbs; and on the 22nd of March, 1889, a receiving order was made against J. Dodds.

On the 9th of April, 1889, a proof of debt was sent to the official receiver by a Mrs. Ann Vaughan against the estate of J. Dodds for £7,240, it being alleged that at the date of the receiving order the debtor was indebted to her in the sum of £240, being two monthly instalments due to her on the 1st of February and the 1st of March, 1889, under an indenture of covenant dated the 2nd of January, 1885; and also in the sum of £7,000, being the value of an annuity of £1,440 payable to her by the same monthly instalments during the residue of her natural life; and it was further stated that Mrs. Vaughan completed the seventy-fourth year of her age on the 28th of May, 1888, and that the annuity had been valued accordingly. On the 30th of April, 1889, the official receiver handed this proof to the trustees of the estate of J. Dodds.

On the 22nd of May, 1889, Mrs. Vaughan sent to the official receiver a proof of debt against the estate of M. B. Dodds identical with that sent in the case of J. Dodds.

On the 24th of May, 1889, the first meeting of the creditors of M. B. Dodds was held, at which a proposal for a scheme of arrangement of the debtor's affairs was adopted, and trustees appointed to carry out the scheme, which was subsequently confirmed. The proof tendered by Mrs. Vaughan against the estate of M. B. Dodds was duly handed by the official receiver to the trustees, who were the same persons as the trustees of J. Dodds.

On the 20th of September, 1889, Mrs. Vaughan died, having by her will appointed executors; and on the 12th of December, 1889, a letter was written by the trustees to the solicitors acting for the executors of Mrs. Vaughan with respect to both estates that as the basis on which the proofs were made had been altered by the fact of Mrs. Vaughan's death, the original proofs must be withdrawn, and amended proofs made, limited to the amount of the annuity due and unpaid to the date of her death. The executors declined to withdraw the proofs, however, on the ground that they had been admitted and acted on, and on the 7th of January, 1890, the trustees sent to the executors a written notice rejecting the proofs to the extent of £5,920, on the ground that the annuity had been determined by the death of Mrs. Vaughan.

The executors now applied to the court to reverse the decision of the trustees and to direct them to admit each proof for the full amount—viz., £7,240.

E. C. Willis, Q.C., and Rubie, for the executors.—The trustee has not complied with rule 228 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886. Subject to the power of the court to extend the time the trustee must either admit or reject, or require further evidence of a proof within twenty-eight days. Where this rule is not complied with, and on an appeal from the rejection of a proof the objection is taken, the court will allow the objection, but will treat the application as a motion to expunge the proof on behalf of the trustee, and will deal with the case accordingly: In re Voght, Ex parte Spamer, 3 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 164. It is for the other side to make out their case.

Winslow, Q.C., and Yate-Lee, for the trustees.—The court has power, under rule 228, to extend the time for dealing with the proof in order to give the trustee an opportunity of making a correct estimate of the liability. In consequence of Mrs. Vaughan's death he is now able to do this. The executors are only entitled to prove for the payments which actually accrued due. In the case of a contingent liability section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides the course to be pursued, and until the estimate there provided for is made by the trustee there is not a complete proof. Contingent liabilities must be valued in the best way possible, and it cannot be said here that the value has been ascertained in the best way by the creditor inserting in the proof what she believed to be the value of the annuity. By section 37 the trustee, and not the creditor, is to make the estimate.

They referred to Banner v. Johnston, L. R. 5 E. & I. App. 157, 20 W. R. H. L. Dig. 11; In re the Manchester Economic Building Society, 32 W. R. 325, 24 Ch. D. 488; In re Bridges, 17 Ch. D. 342, 29 W. R. Dig. 7; Ex parte Bates, In re Pannell, 27 W. R. 927, 11 Ch. D. 914.

E. C. Willis, Q.C., in reply.—The proof tendered contained an estimate of the value of the debt which the trustee could admit or reject, or require further evidence of within twenty-eight days. As he did not do this he adopted the estimate of the creditor and admitted the proof.

CAVE, J.—This case arises out of the bankruptcy of M. B. and J. Dodds. On March 7, 1889, a receiving order was made against M. B. Dodds, and on March 22 a receiving order was made against J. Dodds. On April 9 Mrs. Vaughan's proof was sent in against the estate of J. Dodds, by which she claimed £240 for arrears of an annuity of £120 a month, two months of which were admitted to be in arrear; and proof was also sent in for £7,000, being the residue of Mrs. Vaughan's claim under the deed for her annuity of £120 a month during her life. On April 30 the proof was handed to the trustees. On May 22 a similar proof was put in against the estate of M. B. Dodds, which was admitted for the purpose of voting, but nothing further was done. On September 20 the lady died, and on December 12 the trustees wrote to her executors stating that the proofs could not be admitted for the amount claimed, and proposing to reduce them to a lower sum based on the actual life of Mrs. Vaughan.

The executors declined to withdraw the proofs, and on January 6, 1890, they were rejected by the trustees. The appellants say the trustees could not reject the proofs, but ought to have moved to expunge them. I do not think that the phraseology adopted, or the course pursued by the trustees, is altogether in accordance with the letter of the law, but I do not think this is very important here, because I propose to decide the case on the merits, without regard to what has taken place. By section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provision is made as to the proof of debts, and sub-section (4) of that section provides that "an estimate shall be made by the trustee of the value of any debt or liability provable as aforesaid which, by reason of its being subject to any contingency or contingencies, or for any other reason, does not bear a certain value." These are the words of the Act, and there is a further provision made by schedule 2, rule 2, which says, "A debt may be proved by delivering or sending through the post in a prepaid letter to the official receiver, or, if a trustee has been appointed, to the trustee, an affidavit verifying the debt." These are the provisions of the Act of Parliament itself, which are to be further carried out by rules. In accordance with this rules have been made, one of which—rule 219—provides:—"A creditor's proof shall be in the Form No. 72 in the Appendix, with such variations as circumstances may require." Now that form is one which is adapted to proofs for goods sold and delivered and money lent, and, apparently, is intended for debts which are certain, and either have become payable at the bankruptcy or will become payable at a fixed date after it. I do not find any form, nor are the rules directed to debts or liabilities of a different character. Then rule 228 was referred to, which provides that "subject to the power of the court to extend the time, the trustee, other than the official receiver, within twenty-eight days after receiving a proof which has not previously been dealt with by the official receiver, shall, in writing, either admit or reject it wholly or in part, or require further evidence in support thereof. Provided that where the trustee has given notice of his intention to declare a dividend, he shall, within seven days after the date mentioned in such notice as the latest date up to which proofs must be lodged, examine, and in writing admit or reject every proof which has not been already admitted or rejected, and give notice of his decision rejecting a proof wholly or in part to the creditor affected thereby." It was said that where, as in this case, a creditor sends in his proof for a contingent liability, and also estimates the sum at which such liability ought to be valued for the purposes of proof, that the trustee who receives the claim was bound, if he dissent from the proof, to reject it in twenty-eight days under rule 228. I cannot find that this is at all the effect of the Act and the rules. The Act contemplates that a value shall be placed by the trustee, and not by the creditor, who is obviously unable in the majority of cases to place any value on it at all; and although in this case Mrs. Vaughan says that she valued her claim at a certain amount, yet it is clear that she is simply saying what others have told her, and can have no personal knowledge whatever.

It appears to me, then, that neither the Act nor the rules require the trustee to either admit or reject wholly or in part, or require further evidence in support of that part of the claim which professes to estimate the amount of the contingent liability. The reason of this is obvious. When a man sends in a claim it would be extremely unfair that the trustee should remain silent for an indefinite time and then call upon him to produce proof in support of his claim. Take the ordinary cases of goods sold and delivered, the person who can prove the claim may die or leave the service of the creditor, and therefore it would be unfair if the trustee were to postpone the matter until proof of the claim has become expensive, difficult, or impossible, and then call on the creditor to make out his claim. It is with regard to considerations of that kind that rule 228 applies. No doubt it may be contended—and, I think, fairly contended—though I do not propose to decide it now, that, as to so much of Mrs. Vaughan's claim as consists of matters of fact, the trustee was bound to admit or reject, or require further evidence in support of those matters of fact within one month after receiving the proof, and was not at liberty to hold these over or call for proof of them after an indefinite period. But I cannot see that this applies to an estimate of a contingent liability, the value of which she has no peculiar means of ascertaining, and the putting off the ascertainment of which does not impose a hardship or do harm. Once admit the existence and binding force of the deed and the age of the lady, and you have the materials, or, at all events, a considerable portion of them, out of which a valuation can be made; and it is obvious that the longer the calculation is put off the more likely it is to be correct. Where, as here, she dies in the interval, we are no longer driven to the doctrine of averages, but can ascertain the actual value of the life interest at the date of the bankruptcy. Where the claimant does not die in the interval, still the longer the valuation is put off the more likely it is that a just conclusion will be arrived at. Take, for instance, an extreme case, and suppose the calculation is deferred for ten years, it is obvious that at the expiration of that time a man would have a much better chance of forming an estimate of the value of the life at the commencement of the ten years than if the estimate was made immediately. This shows there is no danger of injury to interests by putting off the time, and in some cases it may be the means of ascertaining the actual value of the interests. It was said, however, that in this particular case, whatever was the general rule, there has been an assent by the trustees to the valuation placed on the contingent liability by Mrs. Vaughan. I have no doubt there may be an assent by the trustee to the valuation placed on a liability by a creditor. The trustee may adopt the creditor's valuation as fair and reasonable, and if he does that it is as good as if he had been the first to place an estimate on the liability. Has this been done here? There is no proof that the trustees actually adopted the valuation. They, however, did nothing until the letter of December 12.

It is said that I ought to infer an assent from their silence. Now if anything had been done by the creditor in consequence of the trustee taking no step, or if it were his duty to take the step within a fixed time, the fact of his not having done anything might have been material. But as the Legislature does not require him to make an estimate within a definite time, and the position of the creditor has not been altered by the omission, and where it is not shown that any notice has been given of a declaration of a dividend, I cannot say that silence on the part of the trustee amounts to an assent. There may be cases where, under other circumstances, the trustee, although he has not actually assented to an estimate, may be estopped from saying that he has not assented; as, for example, when a creditor has been led to act on the belief that he has assented; but nothing of this kind has happened here. It seems to me, therefore, that the matter is left at large. No estimate has been formed by the trustee; and no assent has been given by him to the estimate formed by the creditor. That estimate formed by the creditor is not part of the proof which, by rule 228, the trustee is bound to admit or reject within twenty-eight days. Consequently, there is no objection in substance to what the trustee has done, though objection might perhaps be taken to the language of his letter. Is there any hardship on the executors in consequence of this decision? I think there is none. They will receive the same proportion as the other creditors—namely, a dividend on those instalments which would have been payable to her if no bankruptcy had ensued. On the other hand, if I adopted the view that her estimate was correct, and that there was an assent binding upon the trustee, her executors would receive more than their share. No doubt, if the trustee forms an estimate, or accepts the creditor's estimate, then that is something done by him, and the liability becomes fixed, but nothing here stands in the way of the trustee's forming an estimate which the facts show is the true estimate. For these reasons I dismiss the appeal, and adopt the trustee's calculation as the amount for which the executors are entitled to prove.

Appeal dismissed.

"THE STEEL BARGES." (a.)

Salvage—Conversion of towage into salvage—Owners pro hac vice—Personal liability for salvage.

Barge-owners built at Chepstow a number of barges for her Majesty's service under a contract, whereby the full price of the barges was not to be paid until after delivery at Portland, and despatched them on their voyage to that port in charge of two men on board each barge and in tow of a steam tug During the voyage four of the barges broke adrift from the steam tug, and her master and crew rendered salvage services to all the barges beyond what could reasonably be supposed to have been included in the towage contract. After some difficulty two of the barges were towed by the steam tug to Portland, and there delivered up to the proper Admiralty officials; the remaining barges being placed in safety by the exertions of other salvors. Subsequently the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug brought an action of salvage against the three barges so salved by other salvors, and by the writ in such action claimed to recover against the barge builders for salvage services rendered to the barges delivered up at Portland. The writ in the action was never served, but the solicitors for the barge builders undertook to appear thereto, and, in pursuance of such undertaking, the barge builders appeared absolutely as defendants in the suit.

Held, that the defendants were liable to pay salvage remuneration, both in respect of the salvage rendered to the two barges delivered up at Portland, and also in respect of the services rendered by the plaintiffs to the remaining three barges.

Observations as to the right of instituting actions of salvage in personam.*

This was an action of salvage in rem instituted on behalf of the owner, master, and crew of the steam tug White Rose against three steel barges known respectively as No. 70, No. 71, and No. 72, which, together with two other steel barges, known respectively as No. 68 and No. 69, had been built by Messrs. Finch & Co., at Chepstow, for her Majesty's service, under a contract, whereby the price of the barges was to be paid by instalments, and the final instalment was only to be paid after delivery of the barges at Portland within twelve months of the date of the contract.

The writ in the action was in the form ordered by the Rules of the Supreme Court to be used in admiralty actions in rem, and was directed to the owners of the steel barges Nos. 70, 71, and 72, and to Messrs. Finch & Co., and claimed salvage reward for salvage services rendered by the plaintiffs to all the above-mentioned five steel barges. No service of such writ was ever made, but Messrs. Finch & Co.'s solicitors undertook to appear thereto, and in pursuance of such undertaking entered an appearance on their behalf as defendants in the suit.

May 20, 21.—The action was now heard by the President, assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

It appeared in evidence that on or about the 13th of January, 1890, with the view of delivering up the barges at Portland, the plaintiffs entered into an agreement with one David Guy, as agent for the defendants, whereby, in consideration for the sum of £85, the plaintiffs undertook to tow the above five barges from Chepstow to Portland by their steam tug White Rose, with use of tug's hawser, subject to the following condition:—Should any or all of the said barges break adrift in towing and be lost, the plaintiffs were to be entitled to the said £85 nevertheless. That in pursuance of the said agreement The White Rose on the 16th of January, 1890, took the said five barges in tow at Chepstow, each barge having on board two men employed by the defendants, and proceeded with them down the Bristol Channel. That during the voyage The White Rose and her tons encountered bad whether, and four of the barges broke adrift, whilst the master and crew of The White Rose, after rendering salvage service beyond the scope of her towage contract to all the barges and certain of the men on board; ultimately, after a passage of fourteen days, succeeded in bringing two of the barges, No. 68 and No. 69, in safety to Portland, and delivering them up to the Admiralty officials there, and that the remaining three barges, after breaking adrift from The White Rose, were taken in tow by another steam tug, The Dunrobin, and towed by her into safety at Cardiff. The remainder of the evidence, so far as material, appears from the judgment.

Barnes, Q.C., and Pyke, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs rendered salvage services to all the five barges beyond the towage service for which the defendants had agreed to pay £85, and can, therefore, properly claim to be remunerated as salvors: The Kuyalock, 1 Spinks, 265; and as the barges were, at the time of the salvage services, in the possession of the defendants, and at their risk, the defendants are, for the purpose of these proceedings, to be considered as owners of the salved property, and liable as such owners to pay such salvage as the court may award. They have, moreover, appeared absolutely, but even without this it is immaterial that, owing to two of the barges having got into the possession of the Crown, they cannot be arrested. The lien for salvage still exists, though it cannot be enforced by a proceeding in rem.

Bucknill, Q.C., and Raikes, for the defendants, contrà, on the point that no salvage services had been rendered, cited The Neptune, 1 W. Rob. 297, and relied on The Chieftain, 4 Notes of Cases, 459, and The Rapid, 3 Hagg. 419, as authorities in favour of the proposition that no monition for salvage could have issued against the defendants in respect of the services rendered by the plaintiffs to the barges No. 68 and No. 69.

They also referred to Ex parte Lambton, In re Lindsay, 23 W. R. 602, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 405.

HANNEN, P.—The first question in this case is whether or not, as a matter of fact, the services which were rendered by the tug were of such a character, and were rendered under such circumstances, as to take them out of the towage contract. From the examination I have given to the decisions in point, it appears to me that it is not necessary, in order to become entitled to salvage reward, that the supervening danger should be of such a character as to actually put an end to the towage contract. It is sufficient if the services rendered are beyond what can be reasonably supposed to have been contemplated by the parties entering into such a contract. It depends on the circumstances of each case whether or not the services are advanced in this way to a higher degree so as to establish a right to salvage. I have very carefully considered this matter with the Trinity Brethren, and we have come to the conclusion that salvage services have been rendered in this case. The character of the contract is, of course, to be looked at, and the circumstances to which it related, before we arrive at the point from which we have to start in estimating the value of a higher class of services. This was a towage of a very peculiar character, and those who undertook it must have known that it would be a difficult operation at that time of the year, towing, as they would, through a very exposed and dangerous tract of the sea. They must be assumed to have taken that into consideration when they made the bargain to tow these barges from Chepstow to Portland for £85. They must also have taken into consideration that they were liable to delays, although they could not have contemplated so long a delay as was necessarily incurred in consequence of the extreme violence of the weather. No doubt the time taken was somewhat longer than could have been expected; but I do not attach great importance to the delay. But undoubtedly there did supervene some additional operations to be performed which, I think, cannot be considered as within the towage contract. Then arises the question whether the tug was justified in going to Lundy Island? It has been said that that was wrong. I am advised that it was not an improper thing to do. There may possibly be a difference of opinion as to whether it would have been better to go to some other place; but at the utmost that can only be put as an error of judgment, if, indeed, it was that. I am, however, very strongly advised that it was highly injudicious to put to sea from the shelter of Lundy. After the stormy weather which had prevailed for so long a time, any nautical man ought to have known that, in such circumstances, to tow a string of barges was to expose them to extreme danger, as the result proved, for they began to break adrift as soon as they got outside the shelter of Lundy Island. Therefore, in estimating the value of the plaintiffs' services, I do not take into account the return to Lundy Island. But one of the barges, No. 71, was fouled by a steamer, which rendered it necessary that the tug should go to its assistance and extricate it from the position of danger it was in; and at the same time barge No. 72 was taken to a position of greater safety. That, in my opinion, was a salvage service, arising as it did, from necessity, outside the towage contract. We are also of opinion that there was life salvage, in taking the men out of the sea after the boat had been upset by the tightening of the hawser. It seems to me to be perfectly clear that that was an accident for which no blame is imputable to the tug. The rising and falling of the sea would naturally cause a loosening and tautening of the rope, and unfortunately the boat got across the rope at a time when it was slack. The tug saved the lives of two men, and for that I think there should be an award, if there is property saved to which life salvage can attach. Then certain men were taken off one of the barges which went adrift.

I think there can be no doubt that, at the time those men were taken off, everyone believed they were in danger, and though it was possible, and afterwards was the fact, that these men would have been saved by the barge being picked up by the steamer which ultimately salved her, yet I think there was some salvage service rendered to those men. Having regard to the circumstances which existed at the time it was not certain that the barge would be picked up, and, therefore, I think that life salvage is due in that respect. I therefore come to the conclusion that a sum is to be awarded as salvage for the extraordinary exertions which became necessary over and above those which were reasonably contemplated as within the towage contract.

But it is argued that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, because, as against barges No. 68 and No. 69 they are not asserting their right as having a maritime lien, but have merely asserted a claim in personam. The reason for doing this is, because these barges are now in the possession of the Government, for whom they were made by the defendants. Those remarks do not apply to the other three barges, as to which a lien was asserted before they were given up to the Government. As to the two that have been given up to the Government, I think it is perfectly clear on the authorities that in certain cases an action of salvage in personam lies against the owners of a vessel which has been saved, even though the property has been transferred to others and the lien lost. In this case, however, the property in these two barges delivered up at Portland does not appear to have been in the defendants, because it would, I think, under the contract, to which reference has been made, be in the Government. But on this point I am of opinion that the right to sue in personam is not confined to the case of the defendant being the actual legal owner of the property saved. I think it exists in cases where the defendant has an interest in the property saved, as the defendants had in this case, which interest has been saved by the fact that the property is brought into a position of security. The jurisdiction which the court exercises in salvage cases is of a peculiarly equitable character. The right to salvage remuneration is a legal liability arising out of the fact that property has been salved that the owner of the property who has had the benefit of it shall make a remuneration to those who have conferred the benefit upon him, notwithstanding that he has not entered into any contract on the subject. I think that proposition equally applies to the man who has had a benefit arising out of the saving of the property. In this case the defendants were under contract with the Government to supply them with barges at a certain price. Payment was to be made by certain instalments, of which only one remained unpaid at the time of the services. I think, if Mr. Barnes' argument is well founded—viz., that those instalments were all paid on condition that the barges should be delivered all within twelve months of the date of the contract—then, in case of non-delivery within the twelve months, the defendants would have been liable in damages for not performing their contract, or liable to make restitution of the instalments which had been paid them on the faith of conditions not fulfilled by them. It appears to me, therefore, that they had substantially an interest to the full amount of the value of the barges at the time of the services, and that the same moral obligation to which the law has given force in the case of an owner applies to those who have such an interest in the property as the defendants had in this case. Moreover, I do not forget that the defendants insured themselves to the full value of these barges. In conclusion, therefore, I award £200 as salvage remuneration to the plaintiffs, independently of the amount due to them under their towage contract.

STEVENS v. MARSTON. (a.)

Bill of sale—Registration—Covenant in lease—"Licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt"—Power of distress for recovery of debt in respect of goods supplied by a landlord to a tenant—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4—Practice—Motion for judgment—Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vics. c. 44), s. 2.

Motions for judgments upon the verdict of a jury must, by section 2 of the Judicature Act, 1890, be made to the judge who tried the case, and such motions will not, in the future, even by consent of parties, be heard by the Court of Appeal.

In an agreement for a lease by a brewer, as landlord, to the tenant of "a tied house," a covenant was inserted to the effect that the landlord "should have the same rights, powers, and remedies as landlords ordinarily possess in case of rent in arrear, for any amount due by the tenant for any liquors or other goods sold, or for any money advanced, by him to the tenant, not exceeding in the whole the sum of £200 over and above any rent then due, and should be at liberty to seize and distrain any furniture, stock, or effects in respect of any such debt, and sell the same as by law landlords are empowered to do for rent."

Held, that the covenant, in spite of there being no existing debt at the date upon which it was made, amounted to a bill of sale within the meaning of section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, as "a licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt," and was void for want of registration.

Pulbrook v. Ashby & Co., 35 W. R. 779, approved.

Motion by the defendant for a new trial on the ground of misdirection by Denman, J., and on the ground of excessive damages.

Motion by the plaintiff for judgment.

The court intimated that the latter motion could only, since the Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), be heard by consent of the defendant, and that for the future such motions must be heard by the judge who tried the case.

The action was one for wrongful entry and distress under the terms of a document purporting to be an agreement, dated the 12th of May, 1883, between the plaintiff as tenant and the defendant as landlord for the tenancy by the former of a hotel.

The hotel was a "tied" house, and bound to take its liquor from the defendant. The defendant agreed to let the hotel to the plaintiff at £60 per annum at a tenancy from year to year determinable at three months' notice. The plaintiff further agreed that the defendant should have "the same rights, powers, and remedies as landlords ordinarily possess in case of rent in arrear upon the furniture, stock, or effects in and upon the premises for the recovery of any amount due for any liquors or other goods sold by him to the tenant not exceeding in the whole the sum of £200 over and above any rent then due, and should be at liberty to seize and distrain any furniture, stock, or effects in respect of any such debt and sell the same as by law landlords are empowered to do for rent." This agreement was not registered as a bill of sale.

The plaintiff being in debt to the defendant for liquor supplied, the defendant on the 16th of April, 1889, distrained upon the premises. Possession was retained for two days, but then ceased under the terms of an interim injunction. The plaintiff brought this action for wrongful entry and distress, and for damages. The action was tried before Denman, J., and a jury. The judge directed the jury that the power to enter and seize the goods was void, the agreement not being registered as a bill of sale. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff with damages, £250. The judge left the parties to move for judgment, which motion had been set down in the Divisional Court, but transferred to the Court of Appeal under the terms of the Judicature Act, 1890.

Jelf, Q.C., and Tindal Atkinson, for the defendant, as appellant.—This agreement was not a bill of sale. It was not a security over personal chattels for an existing debt. There was no existing debt nor any money advanced at that time. It is a mere means of recovering a future debt, not for securing a present debt. If that portion which related to any money advanced came within the meaning of a bill of sale, that did not affect the document so far as it applied to distress for rent. It might be partially good and partially bad. The right of entry under the agreement is distinct from any right to seize the chattels: Bills of Sale Amendment Act, 1882, s. 8; Pulbrook v. Ashby & Co., 35 W. R. 779; Hughes v. Little, 35 W. R. 36, 18 Q. B. D. 32; In re Willis, Ex parte Kennedy, 36 W. R. 793, 21 Q. B. D. 384. The damages are excessive for only two days' possession; no damage to business was shown in evidence. A jury's verdict can be criticized just as much as a judge's verdict when an action is tried before a judge alone. A judge is bound to give reasons for his findings, and a jury ought to be equally bound. If their finding is an unreasonable one it ought to be quashed.

Crump, Q.C., and J. E. Bankes, for the plaintiff, as respondent, were only called upon to answer the point as to excessive damages, and they assented to accept a verdict with reduced damages.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—We find that the learned judge in the court below did consider the damages as given by the jury to be somewhat oppressive. We should not reduce those damages except by the consent of the plaintiff, as respondent. That consent being given, we are prepared to give judgment for the plaintiff, on his acceptance of a verdict for £125.

Now this was an action by an occupier for damages for trespass and seizure of goods. The defendant justified both steps under the terms of a document. The plaintiff says that, apart from any right of entry upon the premises in the defendant as landlord, the present entry was solely for the purpose of seizing the goods mentioned under the agreement, and that, so far as the agreement relates to the seizure of the goods (for which purpose a right of entry was necessarily implied under the terms of the document, and without which its object would otherwise have been nugatory), this document is a bill of sale, and, not being registered, is void. It is admitted not to have been registered.

The simple question therefore remains, Was it a bill of sale so far as it related to the seizure of personal chattels? The document does not refer solely to goods and chattels; it is partly a lease by the defendant as landlord to the plaintiff as tenant; but there is a covenant with regard to goods and chattels quite separate and distinct from that part of the document which relates to tenancy. This covenant is to the effect that if money be due for and in respect of the goods and chattels, either afterwards or at the time of the agreement, the defendant should have the right to enter and seize the same. Now does that covenant, apart from the rest of the document, amount to a bill of sale or not?

By the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 4, a "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for any debt" is within the definition of a bill of sale. The only criterion is that the debt must be in respect of the chattels. There could be no power in a vendor to take possession of the goods because the goods are not paid for. This document does give to the defendant a larger right than he would have without the document. If so, then it is a security for his taking possession of the goods, and amounts to a licence to take possession of personal goods and chattels as his security.

It has been argued that this is the real effect of the whole document. If so, the whole document is a bill of sale, and, not being registered, is wholly void. But this is not a true objection. In In re Burdett, Ex parte Byrne, 36 W. R. 345, 20 Q. B. D. 310, and in In re Yates, 36 W. R. 563, 38 Ch. D. 112, we have expressly held that where a document contains independent stipulations in regard to two different things, one of which is not within the Bills of Sale Act at all, and the other is an independent covenant in the same document in regard to personal chattels within that Act, that covenant, or part of the document, is a bill of sale, and must be registered. But as regards things not within the purview of the Act at all, the document, so far, is not a bill of sale.

For these reasons we hold that this covenant is a bill of sale within the meaning of section 4 as "a licence to take possession of personal chattels as a security for a debt" so far as it relates to the goods, and is so far void for want of registration, although it is good as to the other independent covenants relating to the agreement for a tenancy. But as to the right of entry for the sole purpose of taking the goods, that is the necessary antecedent of the licence to take possession of the goods, and that entry, coming under the bill of sale portion of the document, was therefore wrongful.

We uphold, therefore, the judgment of Denman, J., both in the case of Pulbrook v. Ashby & Co., which he felt bound in the present case to maintain, and also his judgment in this case, so far as the motion for misdirection on the point of law is concerned; and we hold that the defendant was subject to this right of action on the part of the plaintiff, and we enter judgment on that point for the plaintiff.

As regards the damages, the jury allowed £250. It is said that these must be held as excessive and unreasonable. This court is, and will be in the future, most unwilling to grant any new trial at all, but if it were necessary to do so, and no arrangement by agreement of the parties were made to reduce the damages, it may be that there must be a new trial on that ground. We have not decided that question absolutely here. We leave the question open whether under the new legislation the court may not by its own power direct a reduction of damages where needful. We have not decided that question here, but have only acted upon the agreement of the parties that the amount of damages should be left for us to assess. We think that the damages should, under that consent, be reduced to £125, and that this appeal should be dismissed. The plaintiff is therefore justified mainly in his action, he has recovered a considerable sum and he is entitled to the costs of his action, though something has been taken off from the amount originally recovered. The appeal here was mainly upon the question whether this document was or was not a bill of sale wholly or in part. Upon that the appellant has substantially failed, and he must submit to the usual consequences.

LOPES, L.J.—After the exhaustive judgment of the Master of the Rolls it is sufficient for me to say that I hold that the portion of the document in question which related to the seizure of the goods as a security must be inoperative, as coming clearly within the definition of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 4, and the appeal on that point justifiably fails. The covenant relating to the goods not only comes within the words of the Act, but within the authorities cited, and within the very mischief which the Act was intended to counteract. The document is bad as to that part and good as to the rest. As to the damages, the judge who tried the case thought them excessive, but I am bound to say they would not have otherwise seemed to me to be so. However, as the plaintiff agrees to their reduction we can by that means avoid sending the case down for a new trial on that point, even if we had thought it necessary to do so.

KAY, L.J.—The first question, and the only one of importance, is whether this document, or any portion of it, is within the meaning of a bill of sale? The matter arises out of a lease for the tenancy of a public-house. There are the ordinary covenants as to the consideration, &c., but there is also a separate provision in respect of any debt arising from the trading contemplated between the defendant as a brewer and the plaintiff as his tenant. The brewer is to have an express right of entry upon the premises for the purpose of seizing the goods just as in the case of an entry for distress for rent. The covenant is to the effect that the tenant further covenanted with the landlord that he should have "the same rights and remedies, as landlords ordinarily possess in cases of rent in arrear, upon the furniture, stock, and effects of the tenant for the recovery of any amount due for any liquor or other goods sold by him to the tenant," &c., and "should be at liberty to seize and distrain any furniture, &c., in respect of any such debt." Was this power collateral to the tenancy? Suppose it stood alone to secure any debt or loan advanced, would it be a bill of sale? A bill of sale is said, among other things, to be a licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt. Clearly, then, such a covenant standing by itself in a document would be one.

It is said that there was no debt at the time of the document being drawn up, but only a possible future debt. But the Act does not say anything about the debt being only a present existing debt. What is a security deposited at a bankers for the purpose of recovering an over-draft of the balance but a security for a possible future debt? Or a deposit of a security on an agreement to buy an estate? There is no debt till the conveyance of the estate has been executed. Suppose in either of these cases a security over personal chattels is given, is it to be said that, because the debt is only in contemplation, such security is not within the Bills of Sale Act? If so, there would be an easy method of evading the Act.

It is said, again, that this seizure is a distress for rent. But another section in the Act of 1878—namely, section 6—would probably then come into play and would comprise the document within its terms. This agreement was doubtless, however, artfully drawn to avoid coming within section 6 as "an instrument whereby a power of distress is given by way of security for any present or future debt." But it is clearly within section 4, and this seizure was not for rent nor for anything in the nature of rent. This covenant is a separate one, and has nothing to do with the actual lease of the premises. Finally, it was argued that it was only the licence to take possession which came within the purview of a bill of sale, and that this did not include the right of entry, upon which the plaintiff really based his action. The argument is too ingenious to be sound. The entry was only made for the purpose of taking possession of the security. If the licence to take possession comes within the meaning of a bill of sale, as we hold it undoubtedly does, then the entry for that purpose is void, and was as wrongful as the seizure.

As to the argument on the other side, that if there is a blot in the document the whole agreement is void, I do not think it tenable. Possession of the premises, rent, or conditions of tenure are all terms of the written contract; the contract as to the tenancy could not be ascertained without the document. Is it to be said that, because a covenant in a clause having nothing to do with the tenancy or the rent is not maintainable, the whole document is void? That would be a most extravagant contention. It has been refuted in the well-known cases cited. In a mortgage to secure a debt when one part of the security is real estate, and the other, personal chattels, the latter part has been held void and the former good. We are only following those decisions in holding here that this document is bad as to the independent covenant providing for the seizure of the goods, which has nothing to do with the lease of the premises, while the part of the agreement relating to that is good.

Appeal dismissed.

BUDGETT & CO. v. BINNINGTON & CO. (a.)

Shipping—Bill of lading—Charter-party—Demurrage—Fixed number of lay days—Strike causing delay—Liability of charterer.

A cargo of grain in bulk was shipped under a bill of lading which incorporated the conditions of a charter-party. By the charter-party a fixed number of days were allowed for unloading the cargo, demurrage to be payable over and above the lay days. Neither the bill of lading nor the charter-party contained any reference to strikes. According to the custom of the port where the ship was ordered to discharge, in the case of grain cargoes in bulk, the unloading was effected by the shipowner and consignee jointly. The shipowner and the consignee each contracted with a separate firm of master stevedores to do their respective parts of the work. During the lay days the dock labourers employed by the master stevedores struck work and remained out on strike until after the expiration of the lay days, during which time the unloading ceased, and no work could be done. In a claim by the shipowner for demurrage, Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, ante, p. 13, 25 Q. B. D. 320), that, as the delay in unloading was not caused by the default of the shipowner, or of those for whom he was responsible, demurrage was payable in respect of the time occupied in unloading beyond the fixed number of lay days.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Denman, Charles, and Vaughan Williams, J.J.) ordering judgment to be entered for the defendants (reported ante, p. 13, 25 Q. B. D. 320).

The action was brought by indorsees of a bill of lading for a cargo of barley in bulk, shipped on board the defendants' steamship, to recover a sum of money paid by them under protest in respect of a claim by the defendants for demurrage.

The facts are fully set out in the report in the court below, and are also shortly stated in the above head-note.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 31.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action brought by shipowners for demurrage, and is based upon a stipulation in the bill of lading. The bill of lading contains many stipulations, and several of them are independent stipulations. By this contract the freighter agreed to pay demurrage under certain circumstances. The contract to pay demurrage is in the ordinary form, which has received judicial construction on several occasions. It has been held over and over again that where the lay days are fixed, the demurrage contract is a contract by the freighter to pay demurrage at a certain rate if the ship is detained beyond the specified lay days. That is to say, that the freighter will pay for the ship not being handed back to the shipowner for use at the expiration of the lay days. That contract has been stated to be an absolute and independent contract. By the word "absolute" the judges meant to distinguish it from a conditional contract. The contract was, therefore, an unconditional one, there being only one circumstance which must exist before the freighter's obligation to pay demurrage arises—namely, the commencement and running out of the lay days; and if, at the end of that time, the ship is not handed back to the shipowner, the freighter must pay demurrage. The courts have applied the same principles of construction to this contract as they would to any other contract. If a person agrees to pay a sum of money upon the happening of an event, he must pay upon that event happening. The shipowner proves his case upon showing that the lay days have expired and the ship has been detained beyond them. It lies upon the freighter to show some reason why he is excused from paying. There is a case where, there having been a breach, the freighter is excused. It amounts to the old plea of confession and avoidance. The burden of proof lies upon the freighter. The excuse for the breach in the case of this or any other contract, whether maritime or not, is that the plaintiff, by some fault of his, has prevented the defendant from performing his part of the contract. The stipulation in the present contract is that the ship shall be unloaded at the expiration of a certain number of days. If the shipowner prevents the cargo being taken out of the ship, the freighter is excused. This is a rule of the common law as well as of equity, and is founded on natural justice, that a man cannot be sued for not performing a contract which the party suing has prevented him from performing.

It is said that that excuse arises in the present case, inasmuch as the unloading of the cargo was the joint act of the shipowner and the freighter, and the shipowner has not performed his part, and that, therefore, the shipowner has prevented the ship from being unloaded in the specified time. Now it is true to say that ordinarily the delivery of the cargo, unless the contract otherwise provides, is the joint act of the shipowner and the freighter. In the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, the law assigns certain parts of the delivery to each party. The shipowner takes the cargo to the rail of the ship, and the consignee takes it at the rail. In the present contract the share devolving upon each party has been altered by the custom of the port, and has therefore become part of the contract. The freighter had undertaken to do something which is usually done by the shipowner. The cargo was a cargo of barley in bulk, and in order to have the barley delivered properly, by the custom of the port the freighter had to supply sacks in which his men put the barley, and then the shipowner took the sacks of barley to the rail of the ship and delivered them to the freighter. It was contended that the shipowner failed to perform his part of the unloading owing to a default on his part or on the part of someone for whom he was responsible. The words "those for whom he is responsible" refer at any rate to persons representing the shipowner in his absence, and include the master of the ship, for whose wrongful act the shipowner would be responsible. How much further those words go I am not prepared to say. It is not necessary to say whether they would include the case of the crew refusing to work. This, however, seems to me to be clear, that if the delivery is prevented by persons who are not the shipowners' servants, or by circumstances over which he has no control, that is the same as if some physical event or accident over which he has no control prevents the delivery. Now it is clear that if some physical event or accident beyond his control prevents the delivery, the shipowner is not reponsible. If, for instance, the lower cargo-owner is prevented by some event beyond the control of the shipowner from taking out his cargo in time, the delay is not caused by the default of the shipowner, and the lower cargo-owner is not excused. If, therefore, the delay is caused by persons over whom the shipowner has no control, the shipowner is not in default, and the freighter is not excused for the breach of contract which has occurred. The above views have been expressed in every case arising upon the demurrage clause. Those views have been expressed in cases where no fixed time has been specified for unloading, and where, therefore, a reasonable time is to be allowed. Where a reasonable time is to be allowed, many circumstances have to be taken into consideration which could not be when the days are fixed. Circumstances such as the superincumbent cargo, the weather, the conduct of the parties, would have to be considered, and no definite rule can be laid down in such a case. But when dealing with cases of that description judges have always distinguished them from cases where the time is fixed. I have merely stated the proposition laid down by Lord Ellenborough, Lord Tenderden, and other judges.

That reduces the question to this, was the unloading prevented by any default on the part of the shipowner or of those for whom he was responsible? A good working test has been stated by Lopes, L.J., in the course of the argument. Was the act one which could not have been foreseen, and which was done by persons over whose acts the shipowner had no control whatever? Here the master stevedores employed the men to unload the ship. The shipowner employed the master stevedore. The shipowner had entered into a contract with the master stevedore; he could not control him or interfere with him; the master stevedore was not his servant. The men employed by the master stevedore are not the servants of the shipowner. It was the act of those men, their breach of contract of service with the master stevedore, which prevented the discharge within the stipulated time. For that wrongful act the shipowner was in no way responsible. There was, therefore, no default on the part of the shipowner, and the freighter was not relieved from his contract to pay demurrage. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question in this case may be put thus:—Does the risk of a strike fall on the shipowner or the merchant? There is nothing specified in the contract about a strike. The contract bound the merchant to discharge the cargo within a specified number of days. By the stipulation in the contract the merchant undertook the risk of unloading within a certain number of days. The terms of that stipulation were unconditional. It was an absolute contract. Then comes the question whether there is any implied condition in the contract. It was said that the shipowner must be ready and willing to perform his part of the discharge, and if he was not, then the merchant was excused from paying demurrage. The authorities seem to me to show clearly that that contention is not well founded. The proposition is far too wide. If it were a true proposition the decision in Thiess v. Byers, 24 W. R. 611, 1 Q. B. D. 244, would be wrong. I conceive that there is an implied condition in the contract under which the merchant would be exonerated from paying demurrage—namely, that the shipowner or those for whom he is responsible do not prevent the merchant from unloading. If the plaintiffs could show that such a state of things existed in the present case, they would be right. The plaintiffs must go the length of contending that the shipowner is responsible for the strike of the dock labourers. That is not so. The dock labourers are not the shipowner's servants. I cannot say that the shipowner is precluded from claiming demurrage by reason of the strike of dock labourers, who are not his servants. The general principles which are applicable to the construction of all contracts are equally applicable to the construction of maritime contracts. I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—This action is by merchants against shipowners to recover back demurrage paid by the plaintiffs under protest. The facts have been stated. I will not restate them, but I wish shortly to express my opinion upon the case, which is an important one. Three questions arise. First, what is the contract? Secondly, has there been a breach of it? Thirdly, is that breach excused?

The contract is an independent and absolute contract, and not a conditional contract. It is a contract creating an absolute obligation in the merchant to have the goods unloaded within a specified time, whatever the circumstances may be, unless the shipowner or those for whom he is responsible are in fault. There is an essential difference between cases where a specific time is allowed for loading and unloading and cases where the lay days are not specified. In the former cases the time is limited without reference to subsequent events; in the latter the question whether the merchant has been duly diligent must be determined by reference to the conditions under which he has actually worked.

There is, then, as I have said, an absolute contract on the part of the merchant to have the cargo unloaded within a specified time. In such a case the merchant takes the risk. The contract is, to use the words of Brett, L.J., in Porteus v. Watney, 27 W. R. 32, 3 Q. B. D. 543, that if the ship is not able to discharge the whole of her cargo within the given number of days after she is at the usual place of discharge, he will pay for the delay, however the delay may be caused, unless it be by default of the shipowner.

If such is the contract, it is clear that the plaintiffs have broken it. But it is said the breach is excused, because it is attributable to the default of the ship. If that could be made out it would establish the plaintiffs' case.

The master at the port of Bristol employed a master stevedore; that master stevedore employed dock labourers. It is not suggested that the master was wanting in care and caution in selecting those whom he employed. The dock labourers, however, struck as others, also dock labourers, employed by the plaintiffs. It is said the ship was responsible for the conduct of these dock labourers. I cannot come to this conclusion. I can find no default in the ship The strike was an unforeseen occurrence, over which the ship had no control. It was an event which the master had no reason to anticipate, an event which no reasonable care and caution on his part could have prevented. It was, to use the expression which I used during the argument, and which is approved by Lord Esher, M.R., in his judgment, an unforeseen occurrence, and nobody's fault, and was in my opinion one of those risks which the merchant contracted to bear; just as much as in Randall v. Lynch, 2 Camp. 352, it was held he should bear the risk of delay arising from the crowded state of the place at which the ship was to load or discharge; or the risk of the frost, as in Barrett v. Dutton, 4 Camp. 333; or the risk of bad weather preventing access to the ship, as in Thiess v. Byers; or the consequence of the acts of the Government of the place prohibiting export or preventing communication with the ship, as in Barker v. Hodgson, 3 M. & S. 267.

I can find no fault in the shipowner or in those for whom he is responsible which can excuse the breach of contract by the plaintiffs.

The appeal, therefore, fails.

"THE ACCOMAC." (a.)

Shipping—Charter-party—Exception of negligence in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage.

By an exception in a charter-party shipowners were exempted from liability for damage to the cargo resulting from "any act, negligence, or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew in the navigation of the ship and in the ordinary course of the voyage." After the arrival of the vessel at the port of discharge, the cargo, while still undischarged, was injured in consequence of the negligence of the chief engineer of the ship.

Held, that this was not within the exception, as it had not occurred "in the navigation of the ship," and that the defendants were liable.

Appeal from the decision of Butt, J.

The plaintiffs chartered the defendants' vessel, The Accomac, to carry a cargo of rice from Rangoon to London. The charter-party contained an exception from liability for "any act, negligence, or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew in the navigation of the ship and in the ordinary course of the voyage."

The Accomac on her arrival went into the Victoria Dock to discharge her cargo, and while there one of her bilge pumps, which had proved defective on the voyage, was removed by some workmen employed by her owners for this purpose. In order to take out the pump it was necessary to remove a cock which closed one of the pipes connected with the ballast tanks. The cock had not been replaced when the chief engineer of The Accomac opened the sea cock in order to fill the ballast tanks and forgot to close it. The result was that when the ballast tanks were filled the water rose to the level of the pipe from which the cock had been removed, and passing through it, injured the cargo.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for the injury.

Butt, J., gave judgment for them, holding that the injury was caused by the joint negligence of the workman and the chief engineer.

The defendants appealed.

Barnes, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the appellants.—The exception in the charter-party discharges the defendants from liability. The cargo was not discharged, and therefore the voyage was not completed.

They cited Bruce v. Nicolopulo, 3 W. R. 483. 11 Ex. 129; Barker v. McAndrew. 13 W. R. 779, 34 L. J. C. P. 191; Laurie v. Douglas, 15 M. & W. 746.

Finlay, Q.C., and Hollams, for the respondents.—The exception has no application. The damage did not occur in the navigation of the ship, or in the ordinary course of the voyage.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I have no doubt that in this case the charter-party voyage was not over when this occurrence took place. But the question which we have to decide is, what is the meaning of the exception in the charter-party, and whether what has happened brings this case within it? The exception is not an exception of any act, neglect, or default of the master or crew during the voyage. Even if that were so, still the act, neglect, or default must be the act or default in a certain particular during the voyage—namely, "in the navigation of the ship." Therefore, the question is, Was the neglect which has occurred neglect in the navigation of the ship? I think the chief engineer was negligent, though I think that others also were negligent. But, in my opinion, the neglect of the chief engineer was not neglect "in the navigation of the ship," for neglect is not "in the navigation of the ship" unless it is neglect in absolutely navigating the ship. Now, in this case, was the vessel being navigated when the neglect occurred? She was not, it is true, at the end of the charter-party voyage, but she was not sailing. She was finally and intentionally moored in dock, and not intending to sail till after the cargo was discharged. It is quite true that if she had broken away from her moorings she might have needed navigating again; but at the time of this occurrence she was hard and fast at her berth in the docks, and was to remain there until after her cargo had been taken out of her. Therefore, I do not think that the neglect here was neglect in the navigation of the vessel within the meaning of the exception. In my opinion Laurie v. Douglas does not apply to this case, but it is impossible to say whether I can agree with that decision at all without knowing the reasons on which it was based.

I think the test suggested by Butt, J., is absolutely conclusive of the case. Here two negligences produced the damage—namely, the negligence of the engineer and that of the workmen who had disconnected the pump. But it is impossible to say that these workmen, who were the servants of independent contractors, were assisting to navigate the ship, and therefore it is plain that the neglect of the chief engineer was not neglect in the navigation of the ship. For these reasons I am of opinion that this case does not fall within the terms of the exception in the charter-party now before us, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that anyone could, without torturing words out of their ordinary meaning, come to the conclusion that the negligence relied upon was negligence "in the navigation" of the ship. We have been invited to come to a contrary conclusion upon the authority of Laurie v. Douglas. I certainly do not mean to say that that case was wrongly decided; it may be that the fact that the vessel had broken away from her moorings may distinguish it from this case, but if that decision leads to any different conclusion from that at which we have arrived in this case, I can only say that I do not agree with it.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Assuming that the damage was caused by the negligence of the chief engineer alone, and not by his act jointly with that of the workmen of the independent contractors, was that act of the chief engineer done during the voyage? It may have been done during the charter-party voyage. That, however, is not enough. The question still remains, Was it done "in the navigation" of the ship? It seems to me plain that it was not. When the act was done the navigation was over, according to the ordinary and accepted meaning of the term.

I therefore agree with what has been already said, and think that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

FRAMES v. BULTFONTEIN MINING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Directors' remuneration—Net profits for the year—Voluntary winding up—Reconstruction—Profit on sale of undertaking to new company.

A provision in a company's articles remunerating the directors for their services by a percentage on the net profits of each year applies only to profits made by the company as a going concern, and not to a profit realized on the sale of its undertaking to a new company in a voluntary winding up, with a view to reconstruction.

Rishton v. Grissell, L. R. 5 Eq. 326, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 86, approved.

(a.) Reported by G. ROWLAND ALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action by the plaintiff as one of five directors of the defendant company against the company for a sum equal to one-fifth of three per cent. on the net profits of the company for the year ending the 31st of May, 1888, as remuneration for his services as director, under the 57th article of association below stated. The only point argued was as to the meaning of the expression "net profits of the company for such year."

The defendant company, which will sometimes be referred to as the old company, was formed for the acquisition and working of diamond mines in South Africa, and the selling, leasing, or otherwise disposing of any mines, diamonds, or any other real and personal estate of the company, and by the articles the directors had power to sell and otherwise dispose of all or any parts of the property of the company.

The 57th article, so far as material, was as follows:—

"As remuneration for their services the directors shall be paid in each year out of the funds of the company either a sum of £300 or a sum equal to three per cent. on the net profits of the company of such year, whichever shall be the larger sum."

The accounts of the company were made up to the 31st of May in each year.

The question arose under the following circumstances:—

On the 13th of April, 1888, the company passed a resolution to wind up voluntarily with a view to reconstruction. The liquidators were empowered to enter into an agreement, according to a draft submitted to and approved by the general meeting, for a transfer of the business and undertaking of the old company to a company called the New Bultfontein Mining Co. (Limited).

On the 2nd of May the old company and the liquidators agreed to sell their undertaking, property, and assets to the new company at the price of £624,800, to be paid in shares of the new company, to the intent that such shares might be distributed amongst the members of the old company in proportion to their ordinary shares therein. The ordinary share capital of the old company was of the nominal amount of £142,000, and the plaintiff claimed, inter alia, one-fifth of three per cent. on the difference between this amount and the agreed purchase-money of £624,800, contending that this difference was a net profit of the year.

Byrne, Q.C., and Levett, for the plaintiff.—This difference is clearly a profit of the year. Suppose the mines had been worked out. Any amount realized beyond the nominal amount of capital would have been divisible as profits: Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Co., 37 W. R. 321, 41 Ch. D. 1. The winding up cannot stop the plaintiff's right to previous profits.

Maclean, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the company.—"Profits" must refer to the ordinary revenue profit and loss account—i.e., profits out of which dividends are properly payable. The point was really decided in Rishton v. Grissell, L. R. 5 Eq. 326, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 86.

Byrne, Q.C., in reply.—In the present case selling the mines at a profit was one of the direct objects of the business, and such profit is within article 57.

CHITTY, J., stated the facts, and continued:—The plaintiff alleges, and for the purpose of my decision I will assume, that there was a large profit on this sale. This profit, if any, is represented by shares, but their value can, if necessary, be ascertained on inquiry. On this profit the plaintiff claims one-fifth of three per cent., contending that it was a net profit of the company within the meaning of article 57. Now, in the first place, article 57 is addressed to the case of a going company, and does not apply to a winding up. Unquestionably there were powers of sale in the articles under which the directors might have sold—for instance, a particular mine—and if they had done so while the company was still a going concern, the transaction would, no doubt, have been brought into the profit and loss account for the year. But the article has no application to a sale made, not under these powers, but under the paramount statutory power of the company in the winding up.

A somewhat similar point was brought before Wood, V.C., in Rishton v. Grissell. The Vice-Chancellor refused to allow the claim in that case, and I think he was right in so doing. I observe also that the remuneration of the directors is for their services. Now this sale by the company is in no way attributable to the services of the directors, so, for that reason also, the profit made on this sale is altogether outside the article. For these reasons I disallow this claim.

Claim disallowed.

In re EYTON.
BARTLETT v. CHARLES. (a.)

Administration—Separate account—Stop order—Contribution res judicata*—Breach of trust—Priority.*

A fund was carried over to the separate account of the defendant in an administration action and her issue, with a direction to pay the dividends to the defendant for life, and the defendant mortgaged her interest under the order to persons who had obtained stop orders. It was afterwards discovered that when the order was made the defendant was jointly liable with the testator for a breach of trust which had been made good out of the testator's estate. The plaintiff, a beneficiary, sought to obtain contribution from the defendant to the extent of a moiety of the liability, and to have this claim satisfied out of the funds carried over to the separate account, notwithstanding the stop orders.

Held, that, as between the plaintiff and the incumbrancers, the matter was res judicata, and that the incumbrancers were entitled to rely on the order releasing the fund in question from the general questions in the action, and that, under the order, the defendant had a clear title, and the incumbrancers were entitled to priority.

Motion.

This was a motion in an action to administer the estate of P. E. Eyton.

Mrs. Charles, the defendant, was entitled to an annuity under the will of Eyton. A sum of £802, the amount apportioned in respect of her annuity, had been directed to be carried over to a separate account, entitled, "The account of the perpetual annuity of the defendant, A. P. Charles, and her issue," with a direction to invest in Consols, and pay the dividends thereon to her "during her life." The words, "or until further order," were omitted.

Mrs. Charles shortly afterwards charged her interest in favour of two incumbrancers, who obtained stop orders, dated respectively the 16th of December, 1886, and the 14th of February, 1887.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was afterwards found out that at the time when the order was made for carrying over the fund to the separate account above-mentioned the defendant Charles was jointly and severally liable with the testator for breaches of trust which had wholly been made good out of the testator's estate.

The plaintiff, the present applicant, a beneficiary under the will, was present at the making of the order, but was not then aware of the defendant's or the testator's liability for the breach of trust.

This was a motion to obtain contribution from the defendant to the extent of a moiety of the liability, and to have the claim satisfied out of the funds carried to a separate account notwithstanding the stop orders.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the motion, cited Birks v. Micklethwait, 12 W. R. 505, 33 Beav. 409; Noble v. Stom, 7 W. R. 709, 29 Beav. 409.

Russell Roberts and Maidlow, for the persons who had obtained stop orders, said it was too late now for the plaintiff to set up a paramount claim: Rice v. Rice, 2 W. R. 139, 2 Drew. 73.

Whitehorne, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J.—The real point in this case is this. On the faith of this order of the 12th of August (i.e., the order carrying over the fund to a separate account), made in the presence of the present applicant, other persons have honestly advanced their money, and they say that in those circumstances they were entitled to give credit to the order of the court, which not only set the funds apart, but ordered payment of the dividends arising from these funds to the defendant Charles, and consequently they were entitled to act, and have acted, as if these funds were wholly free from this or any other paramount claim. Whether they are right in that contention is the question I have to decide. I think they are right. Where a fund is carried over to a particular separate account "it is" (as was said by Lord Langdale in In re Jervoise, 12 Beav. 209) "released from the general questions in the cause, and becomes marked as being subject only to the questions arising upon the particular matter referred to in the heading of the account"; Then he mentions the consequences of that proposition.

Now the respondents rely on the order of the court, which is equivalent to a judgment. There is no declaration, but it is an order which shows the clear title of the defendant, Mrs. Charles, the annuitant. I think I should be introducing an evil practice if I were not to accede to their argument. There is no authority that Mr. Whitehorne, or his junior, with all their research, have been able to produce to the contrary, and the case of In re Jervoise shows the general principle as to a separate account. It is well known that bankers and others, when they see an order of the court carrying over a fund to a separate account, will deal with persons named in that account, thinking they can do so safely. Of course the mere fact that bankers think they can deal safely with a particular customer is not sufficient to justify me in saying that these parties are right, but I think it is right in principle. When the court has appropriated the money, and has said in an order that that is the money of the annuitant, Mrs. Charles, and said that, too, in the presence of the present claimant, who being there was bound, if there was some paramount claim, to bring it forward, I think the persons who were dealing on the faith of the orders of the court are entitled to be protected. Mr. Whitehorne said it was not easy to bring forward the claim before. I cannot attend to that. There might have been some inquiry, or some stoppage of the funds, before the orders were made.

In my opinion it would be erroneous to introduce any such principle as that which the applicants contended for, and I think that those who do give faith to the orders of the court, and who say, in substance, it is res judicata, and res judicata in the presence of those who are entitled to oppose and say the order ought not to be made, ought to be protected.

The result, therefore, is that although this claim would be a good claim as against the defendant Mrs. Charles, and although the money might have been recalled or stopped from the separate account if the contention had only been between the defendant Mrs. Charles and the present applicants, I think the present applicants come too late as against these incumbrancers. I think Mr. Maidlow was right as to the principle on which the court ought to act, and I think the present case is stronger than the one of Rice v. Rice, which he referred to, because the respondents to the motion have the order of the court, in substance, in their favour. Therefore that part of the application I must refuse.

A declaration was eventually made that the plaintiff was entitled to contribution to the extent of a moiety, and that "without prejudice to the stop orders," the dividends accruing on the fund standing to the separate account were to be applied in satisfaction of this claim.

The company had power by resolution to increase its capital, but no such resolution was ever passed. Originating summons.

for life to shares settled by the will of a deceased shareholder, or as capital to the persons entitled in remainder to those shares.

By his will George Alsbury gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion as soon as they should deem it expedient, and to invest as therein mentioned, and to pay one moiety of the income to his daughter and the other moiety to his wife, so long as she should continue unmarried, and after her decease or second marriage upon trust to divide the corpus between his children, including the daughter above mentioned.

The testator died on the 25th of October, 1884, having had one child only, the daughter mentioned in his will. His estate included fully paid-up shares of £50 each in the Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (Limited), which were transferred into the names of his trustees, and remained unsold.

The articles of association of the Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (Limited), which was formed in 1877, empowered the company, by resolution passed at a general meeting, to increase its capital by the issue of new shares, and the material provisions were as follows:—

"The directors may, with the sanction of the company in general meeting, declare a dividend, to be paid to the members in proportion to their shares, provided that in case of the creation of any shares with any preference, priority, or other privileges, regard shall be had thereto in the declaration and payment of dividends.

"The directors may, before recommending any dividend, set aside out of the profits of the company such sum as they may think proper as a reserve fund, for acquiring property for the company, or providing for the payment of rents and the due performance of covenants, or for meeting contingencies, or for equalizing dividends, or for repairing or maintaining the property of the company, or forming an insurance fund, or for all or any of the purposes aforesaid, or for any other purposes of the company they may think fit; and the directors may invest the sum so set apart as a reserve fund upon such securities and in such manner as they may determine.

"The directors may, if they think fit, in the interval between general meetings, declare and pay an interim dividend of such amount as they may think justified by the business of the company.

"No dividend shall be declared except out of the profits of the company."

At the close of the year ending the 31st of October, 1884, a "reserve fund" was created; and a sum of £3,000, made up of profits which remained after payment of dividends, and which had been carried to a "suspense account," was placed to the account of the "reserve fund."

In the year 1887 this fund was increased to £6,000, at which amount it remained until the beginning of the year ending the 31st of October, 1889.

In the years 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887, and 1888, interim dividends and bonus sums were paid to the shareholders. Extraordinary expenditure was incurred in those years; and this was charged either in the revenue accounts of the years in which it was incurred, or in the revenue account of a succeeding year.

At the beginning of the year ending the 31st of October, 1889, a sum of £3,000 was added to the "reserve fund," which then became £9,000. In April of that year a special bonus or interim dividend, amounting to the sum of £15,000, was paid to the shareholders. During that year extraordinary expenditure amounting to £4,928 was incurred. In November of that year the "reserve fund" amounted to £2,000 only.

No resolution had been passed by the company for the purpose of increasing its capital.

The summons was taken out by the trustees of the will for the purpose of determining whether the sum paid as special bonus or interim dividend in respect of the shares bequeathed by the testator ought to be treated as capital or income. The defendants to the summons were the widow and daughter of the testator.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Beddoes, for the widow.—The sum must be treated as income. The "reserve fund" was made up of profits, and could be dealt with as income: Bouch v. Sproule, 36 W. R. 193, 12 App. Cas. 385. No resolution had been passed to increase the capital of the company; and the directors could not pay away capital. Assuming, however, that the £9,000 reserve fund was capital as between the tenant for life and those entitled in remainder, the extraordinary expenses, amounting to about £5,000, ought, as between those persons, to be regarded as paid out of the £9,000.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and MacSwinney, for the daughter.—The treatment of the reserve fund determines the question whether it is to be considered capital or income, and whether payments out of that fund must be regarded as payments in the nature of capital or of income: Bouch v. Sproule. In this case the reserve fund was treated as floating capital. The special bonus or interim dividend must be looked upon as a payment in the nature of capital to the extent to which it came out of the reserve fund.

They referred to Ward v. Combe, 7 Sim. 634.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—At the beginning of the year ending October, 1889, a sum of £6,000 was standing to the credit of the reserve fund. A further sum of £3,000 was then added to the reserve fund, so that it was increased to £9,000. At the end of the year it amounted to £2,000 only, so that £7,000 was gone. The sum of £15,000 was paid as dividend in April, 1889; and supposing that £7,000 out of the reserve fund was used in payment of that dividend, £8,000 of the dividend came out of annual income. But I do not know that £7,000 of that reserve fund did go to pay the dividend. I have no means of ascertaining out of what fund the dividend was paid. The report for the year mentions that extraordinary expenditure to the amount of about £5,000 was incurred, which clearly would be payable out of the reserve fund. Probably no distinction was made between the one set of payments and the other with respect to what fund they were drawn from, but it is impossible to say that as much as £7,000 of the dividend did come out of the reserve fund. I do not think it necessary, however, to examine into this question further, for it seems to me that in any event the whole of the dividend is income, and not capital. I come to this conclusion from the case of Bouch v. Sproule, which contains a clear exposition of the law, and which points to the conclusion that this is income, although it was there held that the sum then in question, was capital, and not income. The question arose there in respect of a sum divided by a company, which seems to have been formed under articles resembling the articles of association of the company in the present case. The directors there had power, before recommending any dividend, to set aside out of profits such sum as they might think fit as a reserve fund for meeting contingencies, equalizing dividends, or repairing or maintaining works, with a provision that the directors might invest the sum so set apart. The facts are stated by Lord Herschell. They are shortly as follows:—In the accounts of the company for the year beginning the 30th of June, 1874 (two years before the testator's death), there was standing to the credit of a reserve fund £100,000, made up of undivided profits of previous years. In August, 1880, the £100,000 was standing to the credit of the reserve fund, having been there ever since 1874; the whole of it, therefore, arose in the testator's lifetime. The directors, then, having this money in their hands, proceeded to carry out a scheme by which the capital of the company would be increased. The way in which they proposed to do it was by declaring a bonus dividend of £2 10s. a share, being equal to £7 10s. for every three shares, and then creating 18,400 new shares of £10 each, upon which £7 10s. per share was to be paid up concurrently with the payment of the bonus dividend. As Lord Herschell says, at p. 389: "This would allow of one new share being allotted in respect of every three existing shares, and the bonus dividend would pay the £7 10s. on each such new share." Then he says, at p. 391: "The case came, in the first instance, before Kay, J. He considered that it might be open to doubt whether the bonus, at the time it was declared, belonged to the tenant for life, or was to be regarded as an accretion to capital, though, on the authority of Paris v. Paris, 10 Ves. at p. 188, he inclined to the latter opinion. But he came to the conclusion that the bonus had been capitalized with the consent of the tenant for life, and that she had agreed that the shares should be treated as capital of the testator's estate, so as to avoid raising this question. The Court of Appeal reversed this judgment. They held that there was no evidence to show that the tenant for life had agreed to relinquish any of her rights, and that the bonus belonged to her, and having been invested by the trustees in shares of the Consett Co., those shares became her property. I quite concur with the Court of Appeal in thinking that there is no evidence that the tenant for life relinquished her right to the bonus if she was ever entitled to it. And, in my judgment, the sole question for determination is whether this bonus is to be regarded as income passing to the tenant for life under the trusts or the will, or an accretion to capital, to the income of which alone she was entitled, and which enured after her death for the benefit of the remainderman." Then he considers the cases, and, in doing so, makes some important observations. Speaking of the case of Brander v. Brander, 4 Ves. 800, he says, at p. 393, "I think the decision in Brander v. Brander proceeded on the ground that Fry, L.J., accurately states as the foundation of the judgment in Irving v. Houstoun, 4 Paton's Scotch Appeals, 524, viz., that the accumulated profits had become part of the floating capital of the concern. But they had become so, not by reason of any declaration of the company that they should be so, but only in the sense that, having accumulated, they were, de facto, used as part of its capital. In this sense, however, all accumulated profits which are in use for the purposes of the business of any company may equally be said to form part of its floating capital. And I think that the learned counsel for the appellants were well founded in saying that the greater part, if not the whole of the accumulated profits of the Consett Iron Co., the division of which has given rise to this controversy, were in this sense a portion of the capital of the company." Using the words in the same sense, I think that in this case the reserve fund was in that sense a portion of the capital of the company.

Then he says, at p. 397: "I quite agree with the court below that, apart from the authorities to which I have alluded, the general principle, for the determination of such a question as that before us, and in my opinion the only sound principle, is that which is well expressed in the judgment of Fry, L.J.: 'When a testator or settlor directs or permits the subject of his disposition to remain as shares or stocks in a company which has the power either of distributing its profits as dividend or of converting them into capital, and the company validly exercises this power, such exercise of its power is binding on all persons interested under the testator or settlor in the shares, and consequently what is paid by the company as dividend goes to the tenant for life, and what is paid by the company to the shareholder as capital, or appropriated as an increase of the capital stock in the concern, enures to the benefit of all who are interested in the capital.'" Then Lord Herschell proceeds: "And it appears to me that where a company has power to increase its capital and to appropriate its profits to such increase, it cannot be considered as having intended to convert, or having converted, any part of its profits into capital when it has made no such increase, even if a company having no power to increase its capital may be regarded as having thus converted profits into capital by the accumulation and use of them as such."

These observations apply here. The company has power to increase its capital; but it has passed no resolution to do so, and has not increased its capital. The case is quite different from one where, the company not having power to increase its capital, the fact of its retaining profits and using them as capital is treated as an appropriation of them to such purpose. Lord Herschell then considers the particular transaction before them, the details of which are immaterial in this case, and he sums up at p. 399: "I cannot, therefore, avoid the conclusion that the substance of the whole transaction was, and was intended to be, to convert the undivided profits into paid-up capital upon newly created shares. And the form in which the operations were effected points in the same direction." Then Lord Watson says, at p. 401: "In a case like the present, where the company has power to determine whether profits reserved, and temporarily devoted to capital purposes, shall be distributed as dividend, or permanently added to its capital, the interest of the life tenant depends, in my opinion, upon the decision of the company. I entirely concur in the observations made upon this point by Lord Hatherley (then Vice-Chancellor) in In re Barton's Trust," 16 W. R. 392, L. R. 5 Eq. 238. Then he adds: "In my opinion that rule must obtain whether the profits with which the company is dealing belong to the current year, or have been previously reserved for the purpose of its business." Then Lord Bramwell says, at p. 405: "The truth is, as said by the Court of Appeal, that a trader, whether sole or corporate, trades with all the money he has got, let him have got it how he may. A sole trader with a capital of £10,000, who makes in a year a profit of £2,000 and spends £1,000 only, leaving the other £1,000 in his business, may well in the next year be said to have a capital of £11,000; not so where there is a partnership, whether an ordinary partnership or an incorporated partnership. There the undivided profits of any period, a year or shorter or longer time, continue to be undivided profits unless something in the articles of partnership or some agreement by all the partners makes them capital. They do not become capital by effluxion of time or by their being used in the trading." Then he puts another instance: "For example, a company makes a profit of £10,500 in a year. Suppose its capital to be £200,000, it divides the £10,000, giving five per cent. to its shareholders; trading with the £500 as with its other funds. It does this for four years with the same result of profit and dividend. At the end of the fourth year its undivided profits, including those brought forward, are £12,000, and it can and does pay six per cent. to its shareholders; can there be a doubt of its right to do so? Is it not the fair and just thing as between a tenant for life and remainderman? I say yes, and if true for four years it is true for forty. I think the right rule would be that contended for by Mr. Rigby. Make the date of the division the date for considering the right"; and Lord Fitzgerald, taking the same view, says, at p. 408: "The reasoning and the decision of Lord Hatherley" (then Vice-Chancellor) "in In re Barton's Trust, then, directly apply."

Now that case bears directly on the present case. There a sum arising from the undivided profits of previous years, amounting to £100,000, had got to the credit of a reserve fund in the lifetime of the testator. If the effect of that sum being carried to the account of a reserve fund was that it had become capital, the decision of the Court of Appeal that it was profit would have been wrong. It is true that that decision was reversed, but it was reversed on a different ground. The House of Lords took a different view of the subsequent action of the company in distributing a bonus dividend and allotting new shares. It was considered by the House of Lords that that transaction amounted to an appropriation of accumulated profits to capital, and that the company had power to, and did, decide that the accumulated profit should be capital. The House of Lords did not differ from the Court of Appeal on the ground that the money had been appropriated to capital by being carried to a reserve fund, they took the same view as the Court of Appeal as to that. The only question discussed before the House of Lords was whether the profits had been capitalized by the company by the distribution of the bonus and the issue of new shares. Therefore that case was decided in the House of Lords upon a transaction to which I can find no parallel in the present case. Here I find that the money paid to the trustees, from whatever source it came, whether from the reserve fund or the profits of the year, was dealt with as an interim dividend declared by the directors. Except as an interim dividend the directors had no power to pay it at all; although a general meeting might have confirmed what the directors had done.

The only other point is that, in the minutes of the resolution passed by the directors when they appropriated this £15,000, it was not expressed to be an interim dividend, but a special bonus. In my opinion that makes no difference if the money came from what at the time was profit. The whole came from either profits made in the year or profits put by under the name of a reserve fund. In the reports it had been the practice to call a part of the money divided by the name of "bonus." It was the practice to pay a smaller fixed dividend, and a bonus in addition, rather than to pay a variable dividend. In my opinion the use of the phrase "special bonus" makes no difference. It meant that it must not be taken that the bonus which had at first been 2½ per cent., then 5 per cent., and then for some years 10 per cent., would continue at so large a sum as was then being divided, and that the shareholders must not calculate on having so large a sum again. Whatever the intended meaning of the words used was, we know what the facts were. On the principle of the decision in Bouch v. Sproule in this case there was an appropriation by the directors of part of the accumulated profits to the payment of an interim dividend, and no appropriation by the company to capital; and even if the sum divided, or any part of it, came from the reserve fund, it was, as between the persons interested in the testator's estate, income and not capital.

Executor—Retainer—Receiver—Administration action by creditor.

The executor's right of retainer is not to be interfered with by the appointment of a receiver on the motion of creditors in an administration action, because the executor may and will probably exercise such right to the prejudice of the general body of creditors. To establish a case for the appointment of a receiver, it must be shown that the assets are being wasted.

Motion.

William Wells, of Holme, the testator, died on the 1st of May, 1889, having by his will appointed Lord Brooke and Admiral Wells his executors and trustees of his real estate. Lord Brooke alone proved the will. The testator died entitled to a large estate in the county of Huntingdon, which was mortgaged for large sums. This estate, Holme Wood, was subject in particular to a mortgage debt for £120,000, which was owing to Lord Brooke and Admiral Wells as the trustees of the will of the great uncle of the testator, William Wells, of Redleaf, under whose will one Hubert Wells was entitled to the Redleaf Estate, subject to a life interest of his father, G. G. Wells.

The testator, William Wells, of Holme, died possessed of considerable personal estate, which included the life interest above mentioned of G. G. Wells. This life interest had been purchased by the testator some years previously.

A creditors' action for the administration of the testator's estate had been brought by one of the mortgagees, who moved ex parte on the 25th of April, 1890, for the appointment of a receiver of the personal estate of the testator in order to prevent Lord Brooke and Admiral Wells from exercising any right of retainer of the mortgage debt of £120,000.

It was then stated on behalf of Lord Brooke that he had been required by his cestui que trust, H. Wells, to exercise such right of retainer, and that H. Wells had taken out an originating summons to have any question as to the right of retainer determined. Lord Brooke did not oppose the appointment of a receiver.

An order for a receiver was made on condition that the plaintiff in the action should accept service of notice of motion from H. Wells, who, having been since added as a defendant, now moved to discharge the former order.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Rigby, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the motion.—The court will not interfere with the executor's legal right of retainer. It has not been shown that the appointment of a receiver is necessary. The assets are not being wasted, and the motion is directed only against the exercise of the right of retainer. Lord Brooke is compelled to exercise such right.

H. B. Buckley, Q.C., and F. P. Onslow, for Lord Brooke.

STIRLING, J.—This is an application to discharge an order which I made last week for the appointment of a receiver of the estate of William Wells, late of Holme, in the county of Huntingdon. The action is brought by a creditor on behalf of himself and all other creditors against the legal personal representative of the testator, and against a trustee of the will, who is named as an executor, but has not proved. These were the only defendants when the order was made, but since then other persons, including the present applicant, have been added as defendants, and are now parties to the action. I do not discharge the order which I made, as I said, yesterday week, on the ground that any of the parties to the proceedings were guilty of any impropriety when they came here and asked for the appointment of a receiver, or that they withheld anything from the court of which the court ought to have been informed. Certainly, as far as regards what took place in court, there was no impropriety whatever, because I was informed by the learned counsel engaged, of all the facts which appear to me now on this hearing really material to the decision of the case. The application was one for a receiver, and I was informed on the one hand that the executor was not unwilling, to say the least—perhaps I may go as far as to say was willing—that the receiver should be appointed; but on the other hand, that he could not consent, because the present applicant insisted that the right of retainer legally vested in him, the executor, should be exercised in his favour, and that, further, a summons had been taken out by the present applicant for the purpose of enforcing that right. Under these circumstances, seeing that the executor was not unwilling that the assets of the testator should be distributed in the manner which is favoured, if I may say so, by a court of equity, where lawfully it can be done—that is to say, in such a way as to produce equality among the various creditors—I thought the best course to take was to appoint a receiver, and at the same time to protect the interests of the then absent party by imposing a term upon the plaintiff in the action that he should accept short notice of motion to discharge the order which I made. I did not make that order altogether without consideration, but I am bound to say now, having further considered the matter and heard the arguments, I think I should have done better if I had simply directed the motion to stand over in order that the present applicant might be brought here. However, the present applicant immediately gave notice of motion. An application was made to me to stay the completion of the order until this motion was heard, and the order has not been completed, still less has anything been done under it, and the position of the assets is precisely the same at this moment as it was yesterday week, when the order was made, and no party has as yet been prejudiced. Now I have to consider whether it is really right and proper that a receiver should be appointed on the present occasion.

The position of matters is this. The defendant, Lord Brooke, who is the legal personal representative of the testator, has vested in him and Admiral Wells, as trustees of the settlement, a debt due from the testator's estate. The beneficiaries under the settlement, of which Lord Brooke and Admiral Wells are trustees, say this: "You, Lord Brooke, by virtue of your position as executor, have acquired at law the right of retaining out of the legal assets of the testator the debt which is legally due to you, and we insist that that legal right you shall use for our benefit"; and they have taken out a summons in this branch of the court for the purpose of having that question determined.

The summons is not ripe for hearing, but it is obvious that there is a question to be considered upon it, and it is not right that anything should be done to prejudice the position of the present applicant until that question is determined.

Now the effect of appointing a receiver is this, that the assets will be intercepted before they reach the hands of the executor, and it may be, I do not say necessarily that it will be, that by that means assets which would otherwise be applicable in payment of the debt due to the trustees of the settlement will be prevented from being so applied.

The present applicant, therefore, has an interest in seeing that no order is made which would prejudice the right which he claims, and he comes here and says that no sufficient ground has been shown for the appointment of a receiver. Now the state of the matters is this—namely, the appointment of a receiver was not made by consent. The executor expressly says that he is very willing to submit to the appointment of a receiver, and is very willing to abstain from exercising his right of retainer if he can properly do so, but that while this question is pending between him and the beneficiaries under the settlement of which he is a trustee he cannot consent to any order which would prejudice their rights; therefore he does not consent, and the order cannot be treated as a consent order.

The only question is whether any ground other than that of consent can be shown for obtaining the order. Now it is admitted, and it is common ground to all parties, that Lord Brooke has not been guilty of any impropriety as regards the assets; he has not wasted them, or done anything which is wrong in any way, and the only question which arises is this, whether it is right and proper that a receiver should be appointed simply on the ground that Lord Brooke may exercise the legal right of retainer which is vested in him to the prejudice of the general creditors of the testator. The question in that precise form does not seem to have been the subject of decision; but there are certain decisions which have been referred to which appear to me to indicate clearly the course which I ought to take under the circumstances. In the case of the European Assurance Society v. Radcliffe it was decided by the late Master of the Rolls that "where an executor or administrator, after the commencement of a creditors' administration action and before judgment, has voluntarily paid any creditor in full, the rule in equity and not at law must now prevail, under the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 11, and he will accordingly be held to have made a good payment and will be allowed it in passing his accounts, even though he may have had notice of the action before payment." That decision has recently been followed by the Court of Appeal. But the Master of the Rolls at the conclusion of his judgment said this:—"The only way to prevent such payments being made is by the plaintiff, upon issuing the writ, immediately applying for and obtaining a receiver." That was a dictum only, but I believe that I am right in saying that upon that dictum many applications for receivers were made and were acceded to both by the late Master of the Rolls and also by other judges of the Chancery Division, and that in none of these cases was any resistance offered to the application. But that came to an end upon a decision of the Court of Appeal, in the year 1884, in the case of Phillips v. Jones. There the application was made for the appointment of a receiver to the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster, and the only ground alleged for asking for a receiver was that the executors would not admit assets, and that they would be entitled, according to the settled rule in equity, before judgment in the action to pay in full any creditor whom they might choose to prefer. Reliance was placed on the power given to the court by sub-section 8 of section 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873, to appoint a receiver by an interlocutory order in all cases in which it shall appear to the court to be just and convenient that such order should be made; and on the observation made by Jessel, M.R., in European Assurance Society v. Radcliffe; Bristowe, V.C., however, declined to appoint a receiver, and the Court of Appeal (Cotton, Bowen, and Fry, L.JJ.) affirmed his decision. The court said that "sub-section 8 of section 25 of the Judicature Act only gave the court power to appoint a receiver in aid of existing rights. The words 'just and convenient' must be construed with reference to the existing law of the country. To accede to the present application would amount to a reversal of the decision of the House of Lords in Darston v. Lord Orford, Prec. in Ch. 188, Colles, 229, which established the right of an executor to pay a creditor in full after the institution of a suit to administer the testator's estate, but before decree. The observations of Sir George Jessel, M.R., in European Assurance Society v. Radcliffe were only dicta, not necessary to his decision in that case; if they were intended to be a decision that in any creditors' administration action, without making any special case, merely because that executor would not admit assets a receiver would be appointed, they were inconsistent with the course of authority." The matter does not rest there, because in the case of Harris v. Harris an application was made to Chitty, J., for the appointment of a receiver on the like grounds, and what his lordship said was this: "The principle is, that a plaintiff in an administration action is only entitled to interim relief against the administrator or executor when a case is shown of assets being wasted. The law allows the administrator or executor to prefer one creditor to another, and there is no equity which entitles the court to interfere, except after judgment for administration. That is the law, and it is a curious state of things, and I do not say that I approve of it. I cannot, however, accede to the plaintiff's application, nor do I think that he would fare better in the Court of Appeal. I will, however, if the plaintiff still desires it, give leave to serve short notice of motion."

There the matter stopped; but that is a clear statement by the learned judge of the principle on which these applications ought to be dealt with. It is that the plaintiff in the administration action is only entitled to relief against the adminstrator or executor when a case is shown of assets being wasted. Now here there is no such case made. Then it is said that these cases only relate to the preference by an executor or administrator of one creditor to another, and that here I have to deal with the right of the executor to retain for his own debts. No doubt that is a difference, and it is a substantial difference, because although the judgment for administration would interfere with the executor's right to prefer one creditor to another, it does not interfere with the creditors' right of retainer, therefore there is a substantial difference between the two. But it seems to me in principle one case governs the other. The Court of Appeal in Phillips v. Jones says that the legal right of an executor to prefer one creditor to another ought not to be interfered with. It seems to me that in like manner I ought not to interfere with the legal right of the executor to retain in satisfaction of his own debt. In coming to that conclusion in the present case I feel strongly that if I abstain from appointing a receiver the general creditors are not likely to be prejudiced, whereas if I do continue the present order, and appoint a receiver, the applicants in this case may be prejudiced. As I have already pointed out, by the appointment of a receiver assets applicable for the payment of the applicants' debt may be diverted from the hands of the executor, he is not thereby precluded at the proper time from asserting his right of retainer, and there is every ground to believe that he will, if he can do so, exercise it in favour of the general creditors who are represented by the plaintiff.

I think, therefore, that, with the view of keeping the matter in statu quo, and not prejudicing any right, I ought to discharge the present order; but for the sake of saving expense I will allow the motion to be again brought on after the decision upon the summons which has been taken out by the present applicant. As regards costs, it seems to me I shall be doing justice if I make them costs of the action.

REG. v. BISHOP OF LONDON (No. 2). (a.)

Ecclesiastical law — Reredos — "Representation" under Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 85), ss. 8, 9 — Second representation — Alleged similarity—Bishop's discretion—Mandamus.

In May, 1888, a "representation" had been made to the Bishop of London under sections 8 and 9 of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, that the Dean and Chapter had set up in St. Paul's Cathedral Church images or sculptured subjects which tended to encourage ideas and devotions which were alleged to be of a superstitious kind, and to be unlawful. The bishop refused to transmit this "representation," on the ground that the case was the same as the Exeter case (Phillpotts v. Boyd, 23 W. R. 491, L. R. 6 P. C. 435). A mandamus was granted by a divisional court directing the bishop to transmit the representation; but this decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and the matter is now pending before the House of Lords.

A second representation was presented to the bishop, stating that the images had in fact encouraged ideas and devotions of an idolatrous kind, and that idolatrous regard had been in fact paid to them. The bishop refused to transmit this second representation, on the ground that it was in substance the same as the former.

On a rule for a mandamus to the bishop to transmit the representation, former, inasmuch as it asserted that the images had, in fact, led to idolatry, whereas the former representation only asserted that they tended to idolatry.

Held, by Hawkins, J., that the mandamus ought not to go, on the ground that, if the new matter disclosed a new offence, it was not within the Act at all; if it did not, then it was substantially the same as the former. Further, that, as the bishop had stated in his answer that he "had considered the whole circumstances of the case," his opinion formed thereon was not open to appeal.

The court being divided in opinion, the rule for a mandamus was discharged.

Rule calling on the Bishop of London to show cause why a mandamus should not issue ordering him to transmit to the persons complained of a "representation" under sections 8 and 9 of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, with respect to the reredos erected in St. Paul's Cathedral.

On the 4th of May, 1888, a former "representation" had been made to the bishop by the prosecutors, to the effect that the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral church of St. Paul, in the City of London, had introduced and set up upon the altar-piece or reredos of the cathedral, an image or sculptured subject representing our Lord upon the Cross, in a conspicuous position, and also an image or sculptured subject representing the Blessed Virgin Mary with the Child in her arms immediately above the communion table; that the said images or sculptured subjects tend to encourage ideas and devotions of an unauthorized and superstitious kind, and are unlawful.

The bishop, in his reply, delivered in pursuance of section 9 of the Act, refused to transmit the "representation," upon the ground chiefly that the main question at issue in the case had already been decided in the Exeter case (Phillpotts v. Boyd, 23 W. R. 491, L. R. 6 P. C. 435). A rule for a mandamus ordering him to send forward the "representation" was made absolute by the Divisional Court, Pollock, B., dissenting (Reg. v. Bishop of London, 23 Q. B. D. 414, 37 W. R. Dig. 72). This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal (38 W. R. 214, 24 Q. B. D. 213), and the case is now pending before the House of Lords.

In the meantime the present "representation" was sent to the bishop, and it differed from the former "representation" in this, that, whereas the former "representation" set out that the images or sculptured subjects tended to encourage ideas and devotions of an unauthorized and superstitious kind, the present "representation" set out that they had done so in fact. The present "representation" stated "that the said images or sculptured subjects have, in fact, encouraged ideas and devotions of an idolatrous and superstitious kind, and have been, in fact, abused, and idolatrous and superstitious regard and reverence have been, in fact, paid to them, and these allegations we are prepared to establish by evidence, and that the setting up of the images has, in fact, brought about violations of the 22nd article."

The bishop being of opinion that this second "representation" was in effect the same as the former one, declined to entertain it, and gave his reason as follows:—"That we, having considered all the circumstances of the case, consider that proceedings should not be taken for the following reason—viz., that the questions raised in this case are identical in substance with those raised in the former case, on which an appeal is now pending before the House of Lords."

The prosecutors then obtained the present rule for a mandamus to the bishop, directing him to proceed on the "representation."

The bishop filed an affidavit in answer, and in it he stated "that after considering the whole circumstances of the case according to the provisions of the Public Worship Regulation Act, I was and am of opinion that the main question raised in the first representation is identical with the main question raised by the present representation—viz., whether certain portions of the reredos of St. Paul's Cathedral are or are not illegal, and that it appears to me that it was highly inexpedient that the present representation should be allowed to proceed until it was determined by the House of Lords whether the first representation should proceed or not, and I submit that my decision, based on this opinion, is a good and valid decision under the provisions of the Act."

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (Jeune, Q.C., and Coward with him), showed cause.

Moulton, Q.C. (Danckwertz with him), in support of the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 14.—STEPHEN, J.—In this case I am sorry that my brother Hawkins and myself have not been able to agree. He thinks that no mandamus ought to go; I think it ought to go. The court being divided, the result is that there will be no rule for a mandamus. The question turns upon the bishop's statement of his reasons for not allowing the representation to proceed, and in those reasons and in his affidavit the bishop says that the first representation was substantially the same as the present, and practically identical with it, and that the charge in the second representation, that superstitious reverence has, in fact, been paid to these sculptured figures or images, does not in substance distinguish the cases, and that it was a charge common to both representations that the sculptured figures were illegal.

These are the reasons why the bishop declines to proceed on this representation, and there can be no doubt of the good faith of the bishop in the matter. I think, however, that that view was arrived at without considering, as the statute requires, "all the circumstances of the case," and that he came to this decision under a mistake. It has escaped the bishop's attention that the representation in the second case goes considerably beyond the representation in the first, and the charge in the second is entirely different from the charge in the first. The second contains a charge that the images in question not only tend to superstitious reverence, but that, in fact, they have been made the objects of superstitious reverence.

That is a separate and distinct charge, and the bishop has, I think, failed to see that there are two different charges, and that the second raises questions of law and fact which are not raised on the first, so that there is a considerable difference between the two representations. The overlooking this difference appears to me to run through and vitiate the reasons of the bishop. I consider, therefore, that in the present case the complainants are entitled to proceed upon their representation, and that, therefore, this mandamus ought to go.

HAWKINS, J., read the following judgment:—On the 17th of June last a rule nisi was granted by a divisional court calling upon the Bishop of London to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding him to transmit a copy of a representation of Sir Christopher Robert Lighton and three others to the persons complained of—viz., the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's—and proceed thereon further in accordance with the Public Worship Act, 1874, or, in the alternative, why a mandamus should not issue commanding him to proceed to consider the whole of the circumstances of the case affecting such representation, without considering any other circumstances or taking into consideration reasons other than the circumstances of the case.

This rule came on for argument before my brother Stephen and myself early in the present sittings, and we now have to give our judgments upon it.

The representation referred to in the rule was made and sent to the bishop on May 1, 1890. On May 9 the bishop duly stated in writing and deposited in the registry of the diocese his opinion touching the said representation and his reason therefor. Such opinion and reason were as follows:—"We, Frederick, by Divine permission Bishop of London, having, in pursuance of the provisions of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, considered the whole circumstances attending the above representation, are of opinion that proceedings should not be taken thereon for the following reason—viz., that the questions raised in this case are, in substance, identical with those raised in the case of the representation of 'Allcroft and others against the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's,' and the application for a mandamus by Allcroft and others against us, and that such application is now pending on appeal to the House of Lords, and will shortly be ready for hearing by that tribunal."

It is necessary, in order thoroughly to understand this case, that I should now shortly describe the proceedings in the case of Allcroft and others, referred to by the bishop.

On the 4th of May, 1888, one Allcroft and three others made a representation to the bishop complaining of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's respecting the introduction and setting up of identically the same images or sculptured subjects as are made the subject of Sir C. Lighton's representation, charging simply (in paragraph 4) that each of the said images or sculptured subjects "tends to encourage ideas and devotions of an unauthorized and superstitious kind, and is unlawful; and, in paragraph 5, that the said images or sculptured subjects are respectively additions to the fabric, ornaments, or furniture of the Cathedral church, and are decorations forbidden by law."

On the 23rd of May, 1888, the bishop duly stated in writing his opinion that, having considered the whole circumstances of that representation, he was of opinion that proceedings should not be taken thereon, and he stated at length his reasons for such opinion, the principal reason being that substantially the principal at issue had been already decided in Phillpotts v. Boyd, in which it was held that the reredos in Exeter Cathedral showing a figure of our Lord in the act of ascending to heaven was held to be lawfully erected, and that in his view it could not be said that one reredos offered serious temptations to idolatry and the other did not. With that opinion Allcroft and his fellow complainants were dissatisfied, and obtained from a divisional court a mandamus to compel the bishop to take further proceedings upon their representation. On appeal made by the bishop, the Court of Appeal, on the 17th of December, 1889, reversed the judgment of the Divisional Court, and against this reversal an appeal to the House of Lords is now standing for argument.

It was not, of course, open to the learned counsel for Sir C. Lighton to contend before us against the judgment of the Court of Appeal, nor do I think he could have hoped, if the two representations of Allcroft and Sir C. Lighton and the questions raised thereon were substantially identical, successfully to contend that the opinion of the bishop with the reason assigned—viz., that the latter representation ought not to be proceeded upon until the earlier one had been finally adjudicated upon by the House of Lords—were not unimpeachable. It was contended, however, that the representations were not identical either in form or in substance, and for these reasons—first, that the new ornaments introduced into the representation of Sir C. Lighton in paragraphs 5 and 6 in themselves furnished fresh and distinct grounds of complaint which were not to be found in Allcroft's representation; and, secondly, that the additional matters introduced into paragraph 4 and the statements in paragraphs 5 and 6 were, at all events, new circumstances not present to the bishop's mind in the earlier case, and which of themselves required the fresh consideration of the bishop. I propose to deal with these reasons in their order. First, do the new statements in the representation of Sir C. Lighton furnish new ground of complaint against the Dean and Chapter, and, if so, is such new ground of complaint one over which the bishop has jurisdiction under the 8th section of the Public Worship Act? For if no such new ground of complaint is shown, or if, being shown, the bishop has no jurisdiction over it, no duty is cast upon him to take cognizance of it. Now, the new or additional circumstances introduced into Sir C. Lighton's representation may be shortly stated as follows—viz., that, though the images when first erected may have been innocent and harmless, and may not then have had any tendency to encourage idolatrous ideas or devotions, they are now in danger of being abused and idolatrous reverence is in the future likely to be paid to them; that, in fact, such images have since their erection encouraged such idolatrous ideas and devotions, and that superstitious regard and reverence have been, in fact, paid to them; and, moreover, that the setting up of the images has tended to bring about, and has brought about, breaches of the 22nd Article of Religion, and so it was contended that even if lawful in their origin they have become unlawful by reason of the new matters now charged. That the law by some proceeding or other will interfere to prevent the idolatrous worship of images, however lawful their origin may have been, and however innocent their tendency, cannot, I am afraid, be questioned. In delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in Phillpotts v. Boyd, Lord Hatherley said:—"Their lordships desire it to be clearly understood that nothing decided in this case affects the question of superstitious regard being paid contrary to the 22nd Article of Religion to any representations or images that are or may at any time be set up in churches. The law will at all times be sufficiently strong to correct and control any such abuse." In Clifton v. Ridsdale, 1 P. D. 358, Lord Penzance says:—"I doubt whether any narrower or more exact definition of what is lawful and what unlawful can, for practical purposes, be framed than that which is set forth in the case of Phillpotts v. Boyd. But, adhering to that decision, and each case standing on its own circumstances, it is, I think, to be presumed that the Court of Appeal would not hesitate to adjudge even painted windows or paintings portraying the same subject to be unlawful if it were satisfied, from the mode in which the subject was treated, the place which they occupied, or other the incidents in surrounding circumstances, that they were in real danger of adoration, worship, or superstitious reverence. So long as they are free from this charge and fulfil no other function but that of fitly decorating the church, they are free from objection; the moment that, from any cause, whether residing in the objects themselves, or arising among those who worship in the church, the danger of their adoration is made manifest, I conceive that they cease to be innocent and fall under the charge of illegality."

What is to be done in such a case I do not pretend to say; whatever the law is upon the subject it must, of course, be obeyed; but I trust in any event some other alternative will be found open to the dean and chapter than the removal or destruction of objects in themselves beautiful and elevating erected by lawful authority, having in themselves, in the bishop's opinion, no tendency to promote the superstitious reverence of reasonable persons, but which may yet be proclaimed unlawful and calculated to sap the foundation of the Established Church simply because some erratic or capricious persons have in their folly or ignorance offered idolatrous worship to them. Assuming, however, that the images would be rendered unlawful by reason of the matters complained of in paragraphs 5 and 6 of the representation, such complaints do not appear to me to come within the cognizance of the bishop upon such proceedings as those instituted by Sir C. Lighton and his fellows. The jurisdiction conferred upon the bishop by the 8th and 9th sections of the Public Worship Act, 1874, is confined to such matters as are specifically pointed out in the 8th section—viz., to complaints—"(1) That in such church any alteration in or addition to the fabric, ornaments, or furniture thereof has been made without lawful authority, or that any decoration forbidden by law has been introduced into such church." "(2) That the incumbent has used or permitted to be used unlawful ornaments of the minister," &c. "(3) That the incumbent has failed to observe the directions contained in the Book of Common Prayer relating to the performance of services," &c.

We have only to deal with the first of these matters of complaint, the essential elements of which are the making without lawful authority of alterations or additions to the fabric, ornaments, or furniture, or the introduction of forbidden decorations. The continuance of alterations or additions not unlawful when made, but which have since become so, or the continuance of decorations not forbidden when they were introduced, but which have since become so, is not pointed at in the section. To continue a thing already made is not to make it, nor is the continuance of a thing already introduced to introduce it. Now, the bishop has already, in Allcroft's case, substantially expressed his opinion, based upon the authority of Phillpotts v. Boyd, that the images set up upon the reredos in question were not unlawful when set up. By that opinion, which is substantially repeated in the present case, we are, for the purposes of this case, bound. It follows, therefore, if my interpretation of the language of the statute is correct, that the bishop is not bound to take cognizance of the new matter introduced into the present representation as constituting a new offence. In short, it comes, in my mind, to this. If the new matter discloses a new and distinct offence, it is not one within the jurisdiction of the bishop under the Public Worship Act. Stripped of such new matter, the two cases are in substance identical. But it may be argued that even if the new matter does not furnish in itself a ground of complaint, at least it ought to be regarded as some evidence that the images had from the first a tendency to provoke idolatry, and, therefore, the bishop was bound to consider them as "circumstances" of the case.

My answer to this argument is that the bishop in his statement and in his affidavit alleges that he has "considered the whole circumstances attending the representation." Why are we to be asked to say he has not done so? I refuse to come to such a conclusion. If he has honestly considered them, and upon them and them only he has formed the opinion upon which his action is to depend, he has fulfilled the only obligation cast upon him by the law, and the opinion so formed is not open to appeal. The statement of the bishop's reason for his opinion is not essential to the validity of it, but still, with other objects in view which I need not now consider, the Legislature has required that the bishop's reasons shall be deposited in the registry of the diocese, and if the bishop were to disobey the law and refuse to observe its requirements in this respect, a mandamus no doubt would lie commanding his obedience. But in this case he has registered his reason which influenced him in forming his opinion, and against that reason there is again no appeal. Both the opinion and the reason may be good or bad, but they are, I am satisfied, the bonâ fide opinion and reason of the bishop, based on the whole circumstances of the case, and there is no evidence to satisfy my mind that his judgment has been in the least influenced by any other circumstances or considerations. In this state of things to issue a mandamus commanding the Bishop of London to send forward the representation in the teeth of his opinion that he ought not to do so, or to compel him to consider the circumstances of the case and no others when I am satisfied he has already done so, is not what reason or the law requires, and therefore I think this rule ought to be discharged.

The court being divided in opinion the rule for a mandamus was discharged.

OVERSEERS OF PUTNEY v. LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Poor rate—Railway company—Deficiency in the course of an undertaking—Lands occupied but not used—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 133.

A railway company, in the course of completing a portion of their line, purchased and took certain properties which were outside the limits of deviation for the indirect purpose of buying out opposition to the undertaking, and not for actual use in the undertaking. A deficiency in the poor rate was thereby created.

Held, that the railway company were liable to make good the deficiency under section 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

This was a special case stated by the consent of the parties to determine whether the defendant railway company was liable to make good a deficiency in the rates of the parish of Putney caused by the said defendants or their predecessors having taken certain lands in that parish for the purposes of their railway, whereby the neighbouring property generally had been depreciated in value.

The question arose under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), section 133 of which is in the following terms: "If the promoters of the undertaking become possessed by virtue of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, of any lands charged with the land tax, or liable to be assessed to the poor rate they shall from time to time until the works shall be completed and assessed to such land tax or poor rate be liable to make good the deficiency in the several assessments for land tax and poor rate by reason of such lands having been taken or used for the purpose of the works, and such deficiency shall be computed according to the rental at which such lands, with any building thereon, were valued or rated at the time of the passing of the special Act."

In the present case part of the property in question consisted of a row of houses called The Cedars. These houses had been purchased by the company, but, being outside the limits of deviation, had not been taken or used in the construction of the line. Most of the tenants left the houses at the end of the tenancies, and the houses had either remained unoccupied or had been relet by the defendants and reassessed by the assessment committee.

Jelf, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—We rely on section 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and contend that the defendants are liable to make up the deficiency in the rates caused by their having taken the houses, although they have not, in fact, used the houses for the purposes of the railway. The only question which the rating authority has to be satisfied upon is the completion of the works: Governor and Guardians, &c., of Bristol v. Mayor of Bristol, 35 W. R. 619, 18 Q. B. D. 549. All the property was essential to the undertaking and taken for the purpose: Barnes v. Southsea Railway Co., 32 W. R. 976, 27 Ch. D. 536.

Balfour Browne, Q.C., for the defendants.—The company are not liable for this deficiency. The houses are outside the limit of deviation, and some of them have not been used at all. It is essential to prove that the lands were taken for the purposes of the railway, which is not the case here: Stratton v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 23 W. R. 447, L. R. 10 C. P. 76.

DAY, J.—This is an action for the recovery of moneys alleged to be due in respect of a deficiency of rates for property at Putney, caused by the railway company having become possessed of land liable to poor rate. The main portion of the property is a row of houses facing the Thames, called The Cedars, which had a garden in front common to all the houses. There are some difficulties in construing section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act, but I need not anticipate any which may arise in other cases. The general effect of the section is, that while a railway is in the course of construction, a company, if possessed of lands liable to be assessed to the poor rate, are liable from time to time, and until the completion and assessment of the works, to make good the deficiency in the assessments caused by the taking of lands; and on the whole I am of opinion that the plaintiffs in this case have established their right to recover. The defendants were the "promoters" of the undertaking. They "became possessed of these lands by virtue of their Act." They acquired the leases and the reversion of the leases by purchasing the interests of landlords and tenants, and the tenants had attorned to them. The railway company are in possession of all the houses, and they must be so by virtue of their Act, for they could not do it by any other way. They did not take all the houses in the sense of working in them or putting materials in them while constructing their line, but they were in receipt of the rents and profits, or entitled to receive them, and they had no other power to take them than that conferred by their Act. In the contracts of conveyance it was set out that these properties were taken for purposes incidental to the undertaking. The company could not, therefore, now be heard to say that that was not the case. On the contrary, it must be taken that it was so, and as there had been a deficiency in the poor rate in consequence of the houses having been taken, that deficiency must be made good. The company would have credit for all rates which they had paid, and as the works are now completed their liability to make good such deficiency ceases. There must be judgment for the sum of £1,986 1s. 9d. now claimed.

BELL-COX v. HAKES. (a.)

Practice — Appeal — Habeas corpus—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 19.

Where a person has been discharged by the High Court under a writ of habeas corpus, the Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction, under section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, to entertain an appeal from such order.

Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed (Lords Morris and Field dissenting).

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.), reported 36 W. R. 12, 20 Q. B. D. 1, reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division.

In June, 1886, a suspension was published and served on the appellant, Mr. Bell-Cox, by which he was suspended from his clerical office for six calendar months. In the same month he disobeyed that suspension, and in July was pronounced to be in contempt, and a significavit was issued.

On the 2nd of May, 1887, a writ contumace capiendo was issued, and Mr. Bell-Cox was arrested under that writ on May 4. Thereupon an application was made for a habeas corpus in the Queen's Bench Division, and under the new procedure in relation to habeas corpus the Queen's Bench Division made the rule absolute, and directed the release of the appellant.

The respondent Hakes appealed, and the Court of Appeal reversed that decision.

Mr. Bell-Cox appealed.

The appeal was first argued at great length in July, 1889, before Lord Halsbury, C., and Lords Fitzgerald, Herschell, and Macnaghten.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Sir W. Phillimore, and Hansell, for the appellant.

Jeune and Danckwerts, for the respondent Hakes.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and R. S. Wright, appeared for Lord Penzance.

The death of Lord Fitzgerald took place before judgment was delivered, and the appeal was re-argued before Lord Halsbury, C., and Lords Watson, Bramwell, Macnaghten, Morris, and Field. The point considered was whether an appeal lay from the Queen's Bench Division to the Court of Appeal under the circumstances above stated.

Sir W. Phillimore and Hansell (Sir H. Davey, Q.C., with them), for the appellant.—There was no power in the Court of Appeal to replace in custody, and under section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, no appeal is given from an order granting a discharge under a habeas corpus. This, too, is a criminal matter, and therefore no appeal lies by section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873: Ex parte Woodhall, 36 W. R. 655, 20 Q. B. D. 832; Reg. v. Barnardo, 38 W. R. 315. 23 Q. B. D. 305; O'Shea v. O'Shea, 38 W. R. 374, 15 P. D. 59. This is new to all constitutional law. Swinfen v. Swinfen, 5 W. R. 203, 1 C. B. N. S. 364, affords an analogy. The respondent Hakes was in no way affected; it is an order directed to the gaoler, and he has therefore no locus standi. As to the question of costs, Dodd's case, 6 W. R. 537, 2 De G. & J. 510, 525, 532, was referred to.

Jeune, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the respondent Hakes.—Section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, gives a right of appeal in clear terms in all cases with certain exceptions. This strengthens the general rule: Walsall Overseers v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 27 W. R. 189, 4 App. Cas. 36, per Lord Cairns; Enraght's case, 6 Q. B. D. 376, 29 W. R. Dig. 78; Green v. Lord Penzance, 30 W. R. 218, 6 App. Cas. 657; Reg. v. Barnardo, 38 W. R. 315, 24 Q. B. The cases before the Privy Council are—Attorney-General of Hong Kong v. Kwok-a-Sing, 21 W. R. 825, L. R. 5 P. C. 179; Reg. v. Mount, 23 W. R. 572, L. R. 6 P. C. 283.

Yeo v. Tatum, L. R. 3 P. C. 696, 19 W. R. P. C. Dig. 14; Witt v. Corrcoran, 24 W. R. 501, 2 Ch. D. 69; Great Western Railway Co. v. Swindon Railway Co., 32 W. R. 957, 9 App. Cas. 787; Crawcour v. Salter, 30 W. R. 329, were also referred to.

Sir W. Phillimore replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Aug. 5.—Lord HALSBURY, C.—Probably no more important or serious question has ever come before your lordships' House. For a period extending as far back as our legal history the writ of habeas corpus has been regarded as one of the most important safeguards of the liberty of the subject. If, upon the return to that writ, it was adjudged that no legal ground was made to appear justifying detention, the consequence was immediate release from custody. If release was refused a person detained might, according to Ex parte Partington, 13 M. & W. 679, make a fresh application to every judge or every court in turn, and each court or judge was bound to consider the question independently, and not to be influenced by the previous decisions refusing discharge. If discharge followed, the legality of that discharge could never be brought in question. No writ of error or demurrer was allowed: City of London case, 8 Rep. 121.

In days of technical pleading no informality was allowed to prevent the substantial question of the right of the subject to his liberty being heard and determined. The right to an instant determination as to the lawfulness of an existing imprisonment and the twofold quality of such a determination that, if favourable to liberty, it was without appeal, and if unfavourable it might be renewed until each jurisdiction had been exhausted, have from time to time been pointed out by judges as securing in a marked and exceptional manner the personal freedom of the subject. It was not a proceeding in a suit, but was a summary application by the person detained. No other party to the proceeding was necessarily before or represented before the judge except the person detaining, and that person only because he had the custody of the applicant, and was bound to bring him before the judge to explain and justify, if he could, the fact of imprisonment. It was, as Lord Coke described it, festinum remedium. The Act of Charles II., commonly called the Habeas Corpus Act, did but provide remedies and penalties to enforce the known state of the law and to prevent its evasion. It was confined to criminal cases or alleged criminal cases, and provided that except in cases of treason and felony plainly expressed upon the face of the warrant its strongest provision should have operation. But the Act 56 Geo. 3, c. 100, supplied the omission to provide for cases where the cause of detention was neither crime or debt. The preamble of the Act recites both the efficiency and quickness of the remedy in these words: "Whereas the writ of habeas corpus hath been found by experience to be an expeditious and effectual method of restoring any person to his liberty who hath been unjustly deprived thereof; and whereas extending the remedy of such writ and enforcing obedience thereunto and preventing delays in the execution thereof will be advantageous to the public; and whereas the provisions made by an Act passed in England in the thirty-first year of King Charles the Second, intituled 'An Act for the better securing the liberty of the subject, and for prevention of imprisonment beyond the seas,' and also by an Act passed in Ireland in the twenty-first and twenty-second years of his present Majesty, intituled 'An Act for the better securing the liberty of the subject,' only extend to cases of commitment or detainer for criminal or supposed criminal matter,—Be it therefore enacted, &c. . . . That where any person shall be confined or restrained of his or her liberty (otherwise than for some criminal or supposed criminal matter, and except persons imprisoned for debt or by process in any civil suit) within that part of Great Britain called England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, or the isles of Jersey, Guernsey, or Man, it shall and may be lawful for any one of the barons of the Exchequer of the degree of the coif, as well as for any one of the justices of one bench or the other, and where any person shall be so confined in Ireland it shall and may be lawful for any one of the barons of the Exchequer, or the justices of one bench or the other in Ireland, and they are hereby required, upon complaint made to them . . . ." Then follow the provisions with which we are familiar.

The Act proceeds thus: "And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid that in all cases provided for by this Act, although the return to any writ of habeas corpus shall be good and sufficient in law, it shall be lawful for the justice or baron before whom such writ may be returnable to proceed to examine into the truth of the facts set forth in such return by affidavit or by affirmation (in cases where an affirmation is allowed by law) and to do therein as to justice shall appertain; and if such writ shall be returned before any one of the said justices or barons, and it shall appear doubtful to him, on such examination, whether the material facts set forth in the said return or any of them be true or not, in such case it shall and may be lawful for the said justice or baron to let to bail the said person so confined or restrained, upon his or her entering into a recognizance with one or more sureties, or in case of infancy or coverture or other disability, upon security by recognizance in a reasonable sum to appear in the court of which the said justice or baron shall be a justice or baron upon a day certain in the term following, and so from day to day as the court shall require, and to abide such order as the court shall make in and concerning the premises; and such justice or baron shall transmit into the same court the said writ and return together with such recognizances, affidavits, and affirmations; and thereupon it shall be lawful for the said court to proceed to examine into the truth of the facts set forth in the return in a summary way by affidavit or affirmation (in cases where by law affirmation is allowed), and to order and determine touching the discharging, bailing, or remanding the party." It will be observed that the judge is to satisfy himself, and if he is satisfied that the matter returned is matter which, if true, would be a good return, he is to do what justice requires—i.e., if he thinks the imprisonment lawful to remand to custody; if otherwise, to enforce the immediate liberation. If, on the other hand, he is doubtful, he may hold to bail. The essential and leading theory of the whole procedure is the immediate determination of the right to the applicant's freedom.

I have insisted at some length upon the peculiarities of the procedure, because I think one cannot suppose that the Legislature intended to alter all the procedure by mere general words, without any specific provision as to the practice under the writ of habeas corpus or the statutes which from time to time have regulated both its issue and its consequences. I do not deny that the words of section 19 literally construed are sufficient to comprehend the case of an order of discharge made upon an application for discharge upon a writ of habeas corpus; but it is impossible to contend that the mere fact of a general word being used in a statute precluded all inquiry into the object of the statute, or the mischief which it was intended to remedy. In the great case of Stradling v. Morgan, 1 Plow. 198 B, the Court of Exchequer Chamber was called upon after verdict to construe the statute upon which the action was brought, and which used the words "any treasurer, receiver, or minister accountant," and the Court held that, however wide the words, the statute must be taken not to have meant to use the words in their absolute generality, and yet all agreed that the receiver in question was within the words of the statute. In the argument and the judgment illustrations are given of the principle upon which statutes ought to be expounded, which have many times since been referred to as satisfactory in reason and common sense. Thus the word "presently" answer to the creditor—i.e., immediately in a statute—has been construed to mean not that the extenders shall immediately pay but immediately become debtors. The words "no writ shall abate by exception of nontenure of parcel but for the quantity of the nontenure which is alleged," was held to mean only some writs shall not abate, which determination is quite contrary, it is said, to the text. So the Statute of Marlbridge enacts that "none from henceforth shall cause any distress that he has taken to be driven out of the county where it was taken," and says, further, "if the lord presume to do so against his tenant he shall be grievously punished by amercement." Yet in 1 Henry 6 it was held that "if one had a manor in one county, and a person holds lands which he has in another county of this manor, that it was lawful for the lord to distrain for the services and to carry the distress to the manor into the other county where the manor is, notwithstanding the said statute. And yet it seems contrary to the letter of the Act, as it is, in truth, contrary to the generality of the letter of the Act. But the judges have expounded the intent of the makers of that Act not to extend to the lord, but where the seigniory and tenancy are in the same county. So that by such exposition made according to the intent of the Act the generality of the words is abridged."

From these and similar examples a canon of construction has been arrived at which has often been quoted, but which is so important with reference to the question now before your lordships that I quote it once again: "From which cases it appears that the sages of the law heretofore have construed statutes quite contrary to the letter in some appearance, and those statutes which comprehend all things in the letter they have expounded to extend but to some things, and those which generally prohibit all people from doing such an act, they have interpreted to permit some people to do it, and those which include every person in the letter they have adjudged to reach to some persons only, which expositions have always been founded on the intent of the Legislature, which they have collected sometimes by considering the cause and necessity of making the Act, sometimes by comparing one part of the Act with another, and sometimes by foreign circumstances. So that they have ever been guided by the intent of the Legislature, which they have always taken according to the necessity of the matter, and according to that which is consonant to reason and good discretion."

If the Judicature Acts are looked at by the light of such principles as are here indicated, I cannot conceive it to be possible that the framers of those Acts had in their minds the dealing with such an important branch of the law of this country by the use of one word, the necessity for the use of which is amply satisfied by the other provisions of the Acts in question. It was the known and well-settled state of the law that a discharge under a writ of habeas corpus was final, and the Act from which I have quoted in the latter part of the third section calls upon the court to "order and determine touching the discharge of the party detained." Undoubtedly the construction of these words would have been, according to the then known course of the law, a final and absolute discharge, and if it had been expressed in words the Judicature Acts could not have dealt with such a discharge without repealing the statute. Neither of the statutes 31 Car. 2 nor 56 Geo. 3 is referred to in the voluminous schedules of those Acts, and I am brought to the conclusion that they were intended to deal with the cases of hostile litigants, each representing a personal interest, and without hearing or giving an opportunity to be heard it would be impossible for the High Court to adjudicate. This is a proceeding on the part of the court itself examining the lawfulness of the imprisonment for itself, and though it may, it is not bound to do more than satisfy itself of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of an imprisonment. It is upon this part of the case that I think the absence of a proper appellant is important. I admit at once that if I were to assume an appeal it would be easy to find a person who might appropriately represent the interests of those who authorize the imprisonment. The original complainant, the judge, or even the gaoler, might properly fill that character; but when the nature of the transaction is such that there is no one whom the court would be bound ex debito justitiæ to hear, I think it reflects some light upon the nature of the proceeding, and whether the court must regard it as a proceeding in which there cannot be a right of appeal, it can hardly be disputed that no machinery is provided for giving effect to an appeal against a discharge under a writ of habeas corpus.

Is it possible that the Legislature, intending to give an appeal for the first time, and upon a matter of such supreme constitutional importance, yet left the matter unprovided for? I cannot think so. The Court of Appeal, indeed, disregard this consideration as being immaterial, since they are of opinion that the appeal is certainly given, and that they are bound so to declare the law, whatever may be the consequences; but, though I quite agree with that proposition, if I am to assume an appeal certainly given, yet it surely is one mode of arriving at the intention of the Legislature to consider whether the machinery provided by the statute is appropriate to the alleged intention.

The section under construction I think was framed with a view to the creating of a Court of Appeal, and giving the powers necessary for the exercise of the jurisdiction so created. If in the words themselves, or in the ancillary machinery to the exercise of the jurisdiction, it can be discovered that the Legislature did not intend the exercise of the jurisdiction in a particular case, it is no straining of the words to assume the limit which the Legislature has thus expressed by the limitation of the machinery. The case of Kwok-a-Sing, in the Privy Council, appears to me to be entirely irrelevant. If it were an authority at all, it would only be relevant to show (what it was hardly contended could be shown) that an order of discharge under a writ of habeas corpus was always open to review, and independently of the Judicature Act. But in truth there are two grounds upon which that decision is intelligible.

Apart from any practical determination of existing litigation, the Judicial Committee can do what the High Court cannot do — i.e., give advice upon abstract propositions of law. Secondly it can advise the exercise of Her Majesty's prerogative with respect to the appeals from her colonial courts in matters where undoubtedly no appeal lies. Indeed, the particular discussion arose in that case upon a criminal charge, and the real point in debate was, whether a discharge before a court having no jurisdiction was a case under the provisions of 31 Car. 2. In the case of Reg. v. Mount the Judicial Committee were giving an opinion as to the course to be pursued where in the particular colony no provision had been made for carrying out a sentence of penal servitude, although that question assumed the form of an appeal. But, as I have said, both these cases are irrelevant, or they prove too much, and when the relation to the colonies is borne in mind it is obvious that neither case can have any relevancy to the true construction of the 19th section of the Judicature Act. I am quite at a loss to understand what relation Dugdale's case has to the matter in hand. A misdemeanant convicted and sentenced gave bail in error, and by mistake was permitted to be at large, when, as afterwards turned out, he had not complied with the conditions under which alone he could have been permitted to be at large. The proceedings which released him were without jurisdiction, and the court having jurisdiction remanded him to custody. Technically, I think it was an escape, and he was recaptured to undergo his imprisonment on an existing judgment which had not been qualified or set aside, and the execution whereof had only been interrupted by mistake.

It would be a very small point here to decide as to the costs for the purpose of founding jurisdiction; but I am of opinion that, if the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, they had no jurisdiction to award costs, I desire to express no opinion whether a new significavit can be followed by a new order of arrest; that is a question which does not now arise, and may hereafter arise, and I wish to keep myself quite free to decide that question when it shall arise. Whether it can or cannot does not seem to me to reflect any light upon the question now under debate. I entertain no doubt that the writ delivered to the sheriff is spent by the execution by the sheriff of the mandate therein contained, and certainly cannot be made the foundation for a fresh arrest, or for a detention which has once by lawful authority been declared to be unlawful. As to the power to retake, it is enough to say that the sole authority which Mr. Jeune's industry and ability have been able to discover is impliedly an authority the other way, inasmuch as the writ in the Registrum Brevium recites an unlawful deliverance from prison as the ground and foundation of the right to recapture. Except so far as may be inferred from what I have said as to the argument which would imply a repeal of the Habeas Corpus Act, I do not desire to express any opinion upon what the law would be if a refusal to discharge should be the subject of appeal. Upon the merits of this appeal I have of course formed no opinion. The preliminary point has alone been argued, and I will only say that, if it be true, as one of the parties contends, that there has been a disobedience to the law obstinate and persistent, I have no doubt that the law is or can be made strong enough to deal with it. But your lordships are here determining a question which goes very far indeed beyond the merits of any particular case. It is the right of personal freedom in this country which is in debate, and I for one should be very slow to believe, except it was done by express legislation, that the policy of centuries has been suddenly reversed, and that the right of personal freedom is no longer to be determined summarily and finally, but is to be subject to the delay and uncertainty of ordinary litigation, so that the final determination upon that question may only be arrived at by the last court of appeal.

For these reasons I move your lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed.

Lord BRAMWELL.—I think that this appeal should be allowed, on the ground that the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal to them. That an appeal from a decision of a judge or court on the grant or refusal of a writ of habeas corpus, and on the adjudication on its return, would be reasonable, this case abundantly shows. I do not say so on account of the original question between the parties (the particulars of which are wholly unknown to me), but on account of the question which has resulted from the application for a writ of habeas corpus. A court of competent jurisdiction has decided that the appellant has broken the law, and has suspended him from the exercise of his functions as a priest. He has deliberately disobeyed the orders of the court, on no ground except that he chose to do so; he has been sent to prison for his contumacy. And the question, on the return to a writ of habeas corpus, for the Divisional Court and Court of Appeal was, whether that imprisonment was lawful or not; in other words, whether he was to be punished or go unpunished. This is a serious question, and there can be no doubt that out of proceedings on writs of habeas corpus, and on application for them, most serious questions may and do arise, much more important than the majority of those which are the subject of appeal. However, as has been said, we have got on without such appeals hitherto, and might continue to do so and thrive. I say without such appeals, for, with all respect, I cannot agree that going first to a judge of one court, and then, on being refused by the judge, going to a court, or, being refused by one court, going to another, was or is an appeal. The court applied to, after refusal by a judge or other court, was not exercising an appellate jurisdiction in entertaining the application. It was exercising a primary jurisdiction. It need not have heard of the former application, nor known of the materials on which it was founded; and, indeed, those before it might be different from the former. If, indeed, such a proceeding was an appeal, that appeal exists still. Clearly, where the first application is to a single judge, and where to the High Court, the Lord Chancellor could grant the writ refused by them on application to him, and vice versâ. Whether, if one division of the High Court, before the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Division were fused, had refused the writ, then another division would have been bound to entertain an application for one, I know not. If yes, then the Judicature Act left the matter as it was before. Anyhow, there is the possibility of a second application now as of right, so that there is the less need for an express appeal to supply the want of being able to try more than one tribunal. The second application may be "improper," as Cotton, L.J., says, but it is one that may be made and must be entertained. Still the question is, has the Judicature Act provided such an appeal? That it has done so intentionally I think no one can suppose. It is impossible that if an appeal had been intended there should not have been some particular provisions as to its procedure up to and after the final order, and there are none.

The very able and learned arguments of Mr. Jeune and Mr. Danckwerts have shown or suggested that in some cases, perhaps, a reversal of an order to discharge a person brought up on a writ of habeas corpus might leave him subject to proceedings for restoring him to custody; for instance, where a sentence is unexpired, and possibly Mr. Cox may in some way be got at, I do not know. But there are some cases where the discharge is of such a character that its effect cannot be undone. I say that the absence of specific procedure in the Judicature Act to enforce an order reversing an order of discharge on a writ of habeas corpus, and the possible futility of such reversal, is a strong argument to show that an appeal does not lie. I cannot, with great submission, agree that the court may reverse, though no good may come of it. If no good may come of it eventually, I think the argument is strong to show that the power is not given. Of course, if the statute in express terms said the appeal should lie, it must be obeyed. But when the question is one of construction, surely it is a good argument to show that a particular construction would be futile. What is the substance of the appeal? I speak of where there is a discharge. There may be a writ without a previous rule nisi, or with one. It cannot be contended that an appeal will lie where there is a rule nisi, and not where there is not. Indeed, where there is a rule nisi on sufficient primâ facie materials, and the body is brought up, or the matter is discussed as though it were, it seems to me it would be wrong to discharge the rule nisi if there were an appeal, and the discharge was revoked.

In this case the Queen's Bench Division made absolute the rule for a habeas corpus, and also ordered that the appellant should be discharged without being brought up. How can it be right to discharge the rule for the habeas corpus? What is the consequence? Does the bringing up of the body become unlawful, or would it have been if the writ had issued and the body been brought up? These considerations show that the substantial question is whether the order for the discharge of the body which is to be brought up, or treated as though brought up, was right. When there is an order of discharge I have a difficulty in seeing how a court of appeal can undo that order. The body is gone. The Court of Appeal cannot reverse what has been done. It cannot give the judgment that ought, if right, to have been given—viz., that he be remanded. He is not there. No doubt power could be given to it to remedy the error. But without express power it can do nothing. It does not issue the process from the Ecclesiastical Court, nor the writ de contumace recapiendo, if there is one.

As to the case of Reg. v. Dugdale, I do not understand it. I have no notion where the prisoner was or what was done with him. On these grounds I think an appeal was not intended. But then there are the words of the statute, "The Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order of her Majesty's High Court of Justice, or any judges or judge thereof." I have an indistinct misgiving whether in awarding or disposing of a writ of habeas corpus a judge of the High Court or the High Court itself is acting as a court or judge of a court of judicature. There is no lis; there is no action; these proceedings are entitled ex parte. No doubt section 16 transfers the power to grant writs of habeas corpus, but is that power a power of judicature? Section 19 speaks of a judgment or order—i.e., an order in the nature of a judgment. This is only a doubt; but, further, I think the proper way of dealing with section 19 and section 18 is to consider their object to be to establish a Court of Appeal, not to make things appealable of a character not appealable before.

The section begins, "The Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction," &c. Section 18 transfers certain powers to it, in which are certainly not included the power of hearing an appeal from a decision as to a writ of habeas corpus. I do not say that appeals do not lie in cases where they did not before. I say that to give such appeals was not the object of sections 18 and 19. But still further, though the words are there, though they comprehend in words the case of an appeal from a decision on the return of a writ of habeas corpus, yet, if the result would be futile, or lead to an absurdity, the right way of dealing with those words is to put a limit on them. As, for instance, thus, shall "have jurisdiction to hear appeals from any judgment or order appealable, or where the Court of Appeal, or the court appealed from, can execute the order or judgment of the Court of Appeal."

I submit that this is perfectly legitimate. All judges who have had occasion to speak of it have unhesitatingly dealt in this way with section 38 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 131. And see Maxwell on Statutes, 242, where many cases to the same effect are collected. On these grounds I think this judgment should be reversed. My reasons would, perhaps, apply to a case when the prisoner had been remanded, but I limit my opinion to where he has been discharged. Of course, I think that part of the order appealed from which orders payment of costs to Mr. Hakes, the appellant, in the Court of Appeal, should be reversed, as there was no jurisdiction to entertain the matter at all. Even if there was, I do not see why he should have costs from Mr. Cox. True, I think that Mr. Hakes was a proper appellant if there could be an appeal, though the question was not one between him and Mr. Cox. And that is one of the difficulties I feel as to whether there could be an appeal. Of course, it is right to give him an opportunity of being heard against the discharge and of informing the court as to the facts, but not him exclusively. Suppose he had died or left the parish? In the result I think the question is, Is there an appeal from an order discharging a person brought up on habeas corpus? That sections 18 and 19 of the Judicature Act are directed to the establishment of a court of appeal, and not to making a matter the subject of appeal not formerly so, and different in kind and character from those previously the subject of appeal. That if an order of discharge is a judgment or order of judicature, and so within the very words of section 19, a limitation must be put on them excluding such appeals to avoid the futility, inconvenience, and incongruity which would otherwise result.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The preliminary question argued upon the hearing of this appeal is one of great importance. It touches closely the liberty of the subject and the protection afforded by discharge from custody under a writ of habeas corpus.

The law of this country has been very jealous of any infringement of personal liberty, and a great safeguard against it has been provided by the manner in which the courts have exercised their jurisdiction to discharge under a writ of habeas corpus those detained unlawfully in custody. It will be convenient, before proceeding to an examination of the section of the Judicature Act upon which this case turns, to state briefly the mode in which the courts have administered the law in relation to that writ. It was always open to an applicant for it, if defeated in one court, at once to renew his application to another. No court was bound by the view taken by any other, or felt itself obliged to follow the law laid down by it. Each court exercised its independent judgment upon the case, and determined for itself whether the return to the writ established that the detention of the applicant was in accordance with the law. A person detained in custody might thus proceed from court to court until he obtained his liberty. And if he could succeed in convincing any one of the tribunals competent to issue the writ that he was entitled to be discharged, his right to his liberty could not afterwards be called in question. There was no power in any court to review or control the proceedings of the tribunal which discharged him. I need not dwell upon the security which was thus afforded against any unlawful imprisonment. It is sufficient to say that no person could be detained in custody if any one of the tribunals having power to issue the writ of habeas corpus was of opinion that the custody was unlawful.

This was the state of the law at the time the Judicature Act was passed. If the contention of the respondent is to prevail, that statute has effected a grave constitutional change. The discharge from custody by a court of competent jurisdiction no longer avails to protect from further proceedings. The propriety of the discharge may be questioned in the Court of Appeal, and even if that court should concur with the court below, an appeal would lie to your lordships' House; so that, although the court of first instance and the Court of Appeal should concur in thinking the custody illegal, their decisions might be set aside by a majority of this House. It is not easy to exaggerate the magnitude of this change; nevertheless it must be admitted that if the language of the Legislature, interpreted according to the recognized canons of construction, involves this result, your lordships must frankly yield to it, even if you should be satisfied that it was not in the contemplation of the Legislature.

Reliance is naturally placed by the respondent upon the broad general words of the 19th section: "The said Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order, save as hereinafter mentioned, of her Majesty's High Court of Justice." It cannot be denied that an order for the discharge of a person in custody such as was made in the present case, is, primâ facie, an order to which this section applies. It does not come within any of the exceptions to which reference is made in the section. It was, indeed, somewhat faintly argued by the learned counsel for the appellant that this was an appeal in "a criminal cause or matter" within the meaning of section 47. But, in my opinion, they failed to establish this proposition. And if there were nothing in the statute which could be appealed to as showing that the Legislature intended some further limitation to be put upon the general words used, I think it might be impossible to resist the respondent's contention. But the section contains two clauses. That which confers the right of appeal and the jurisdiction to hear and determine it is immediately followed by a provision which is obviously intended to make the power of review complete and effectual by furnishing the means of enforcing it. The learned judges in the court below considered that it was quite immaterial to inquire what would be the effect of their judgment, or how it could be enforced. If an appeal were given in such a case as the present in specific terms, I should agree with them. It would then be their duty to entertain it and to pronounce their judgment, even if there were no means of compelling obedience to it.

But the attention of the learned judges does not appear to have been drawn to the language of the second branch of the section, or to the bearing which it might have upon the construction to be put upon the earlier words. It cannot, I think, be denied that, for the purpose of construing the enactment, it is right to look not only at the provision immediately under construction, but at any others found in connection with it which may throw light upon it, and afford an indication that general words employed in it were not intended to be applied without some limitation. The enactment following the words which confer jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals gives to the Court of Appeal, for the purposes of the "enforcement of any judgment or order made on any such appeal," all the power, authority, and jurisdiction by the Act vested in the High Court of Justice.

The first observation I have to make is this. I think it must be held that the Court of Appeal has no power to enforce its judgments beyond that which is here conferred. Even if it be conceded that, in the absence of any such provision, some authority to enforce its judgments might be implied, it would be contrary to sound principles of construction to extend by implication the express powers given. The court, then, has the same power to enforce its judgments as the High Court, and is not empowered to use any further or other means. It appears to me, therefore, legitimate and relevant to inquire whether, in any particular class of cases, the Court of Appeal has been left powerless to enforce its orders in case its conclusion should differ from that arrived at by the court below.

The case with which we have to deal is an order discharging a person from custody under a writ of habeas corpus. It was said, indeed, that the order of the Queen's Bench Division was twofold, and might be treated as two separate orders—first, to bring up the body of the applicant, and, second, to discharge him from custody. I shall revert to this argument presently, but, for the moment, I shall treat it simply as an order discharging from custody. Has the Court of Appeal any power effectually to review such an order, and to undo what was done by the court below? For the reasons I have already given I think this must be determined by the answer to the further question, Has the High Court any power to enforce an order for the arrest of a person at large, under such circumstances as the present, or in any like case? It needs no argument to prove that the High Court is destitute of any such power. It has inherited the combined powers of the courts whose functions were transferred to it, but none of these had any jurisdiction or authority to review a discharge by a competent court under a writ of habeas corpus, or to enforce the arrest of one thus freed from custody. And I need hardly add that they possessed no general power of arrest for the purpose of enforcing their judgments. It seems to me to follow that, however wrong the Court of Appeal might think a discharge to have been, it would be powerless to order a re-arrest, or, at least, to enforce such an order.

Great reliance was placed upon the case of Reg. v. Dugdale, which it was said showed that the Court of Queen's Bench had the power to order the re-arrest and commitment to custody of a person improperly discharged. In that case the defendant had been convicted and sentenced to two years' imprisonment at the quarter sessions. He brought error on this judgment, which, however, was in part affirmed by the Queen's Bench, and, having been bailed pending the suit, he was remanded to custody. He then took the necessary steps to carry the writ to the Exchequer Chamber, and obtained his discharge by acknowledging recognizances before Platt, B., at chambers under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 68 and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 24. These recognizances, however, did not comply with the statutes, under which alone he was entitled to be out on bail pending the appeal. The discharge was, in fact, without jurisdiction. For the purpose of testing the question of jurisdiction a rule was obtained to show cause why he should not be again apprehended and recommitted to the custody of the keeper of the house of correction, "in execution of the judgment in this prosecution." This rule was made absolute, but he was not arrested merely by virtue of this rule. A warrant was granted by Erle, J., for his recommittal, reciting the judgment and sentence, and stating the recommittal to be "in execution of the judgment in the said prosecution." The defendant in that case was at large during the currency of a valid sentence and judgment, having been set free pending an appeal by a learned judge acting without jurisdiction. I am unable to see the bearing of that case upon the present, or how it shows that when a prisoner has been discharged from custody, under a writ of habeas corpus by a court of competent jurisdiction, there can be any power in the court to issue a warrant for his recommitment.

The counsel for the respondent called attention to ord. 48, r. 4, and insisted that this supplemented the power conferred on the Court of Appeal by the section under discussion. That order provides that the Court of Appeal shall have power to draw inferences of fact, and to give any judgment and make any order which ought to have been made, "and to make such further or other order as the case may require." It was these latter words which were relied on. I think it is a somewhat extravagant proposition that a rule such as this would enable the court to order the re-arrest of a person discharged under a writ of habeas corpus, and to enforce its order. I think it impossible to hold that it gave any such authority or enlarged the power to enforce its order which is vested in the Court of Appeal by the 19th section of the Act. It was argued, however, that it was unnecessary to empower the Court of Appeal to remit to custody a person erroneously discharged by the court below, seeing that as soon as the order of that court was reversed, the person discharged might again be arrested by the sheriff; and, indeed, that it would be his duty, upon receiving notice of the order of the Court of Appeal, so to arrest him. No authority was cited, nor could any precedent be appealed to in support of this proposition, and I find myself wholly unable to assent to it. Where the sheriff has taken the person named in the writ and handed him to the gaoler for custody under it, his duty is at an end, save in the case of an escape. And the suggestion that a discharge by a court of competent jurisdiction becomes, when its order is reversed by a superior court, equivalent to an escape will not bear examination.

It was said that the writ commanded the sheriff to attach the body of the appellant "until he shall have made satisfaction for the contempt," and that, no such satisfaction having been made, the writ was still in force and effectual to authorize his re-arrest. But the limitation, "unless he shall have been sooner discharged by a court of competent jurisdiction," must be applied in this case just as much as if the warrant had been to attach the person named for a definite term. Then it was said that the appellant might be arrested again, inasmuch as the sheriff had not yet notified to the justices how he had executed the precept. I am unable to follow this argument. In the present case the sheriff would make a true and sufficient return by stating that he had attached the appellant by his body, and delivered him to the gaoler for safe custody under the writ. And if he were to add that the prisoner had been discharged from custody by the High Court of Justice, the return would, in my opinion, none the less be good and sufficient. When the sheriff returns that he has not executed the writ, and that the party cannot be found within his bailiwick, the court is empowered by sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the 5 Eliz. c. 23 (which by section 1 of the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, is made applicable to writs de contumace capiendo) to award successive writs of capias with heavy pecuniary penalties until the person named in the writ has yielded his body to the gaol and prison of the sheriff. But when once he has yielded his body or been taken into custody, and has been discharged by a court of competent jurisdiction, I can find no authority for the subsequent arrest.

Next it was argued that he might be re-arrested under a writ de contumace recapiendo. But it is clear from the terms of that writ that it would be inapplicable to such a case as the present. Godolphin describes it as a writ whereby an excommunicated person who had been "unduly delivered" may be again committed to prison. The writ itself (as set out in Registrum Brevium), after stating that a complaint had been received from the bishop that the person named had been liberated from prison in lesionem libertatis ecclesiasticæ et nostri contemptum manifestum, directed that they should be taken again nisi modo legitimo a prisone prædicta deliberati fuerint. It is clear that a person discharged by a court of competent jurisdiction has been delivered modo legitimo, and not in contempt of the Sovereign. Finally, it was said that a new writ de contumace capiendo might be issued under the significavit; but when a writ has been once issued in conformity with the provisions of the 53 Geo. 3 I am at a loss to understand what warrant there would be for issuing a second writ. The truth is, that if your lordships were to hold that the person named in the writ could be arrested again, after his discharge by a competent court, on the ground that his custody was unlawful, you would not be declaring a law which has hitherto existed, but inventing a fresh power which has never yet, and, indeed, never could have been exercised, in order to meet the altered circumstances created by the jurisdiction which the Court of Appeal is alleged to possess. It may be that there could be another significavit in the ecclesiastical suit, followed by another writ de contumace capiendo. But so there might have been before the Court of Appeal pronounced its judgment just as well as now. The utmost that can be said is, that if an application were made to the High Court for discharge from custody under that writ, the court would, in all probability, defer to the opinion expressed by the Court of Appeal in the present case on any point of law. But deference in a subsequent proceeding to an expression of opinion by a higher court in a previous proceeding is as far as possible removed from the enforcement of the judgment pronounced in that proceeding. The function of a court of appeal is to deal with the judgment before it for review, and not to pronounce opinions on a point of law which may remove a difficulty from the path of a litigant in future proceedings. That the exposition of the law by the Court of Appeal might have the suggested effect of removing a barrier to the further action of the Ecclesiastical Court is a mere incident of the present case, not applicable to the class of cases in general, and it is with the general question whether an appeal lies in such cases that we have to deal.

I am driven, then, to the conclusion that, where a person has been discharged by the High Court under a writ of habeas corpus, the Court of Appeal has no power effectually to interfere with the action of the court below. The judgment of the higher court cannot in anywise affect the discharge, or restore to custody the person liberated. It is incompetent to give effect to its judgment, and cannot undo that which it holds to have been wrongly done by the order appealed from.

I think it is impossible ro read the section your lordships have to construe without seeing that the power to hear and determine an appeal, and the power to enforce the judgment of the Court of Appeal in case it should differ in opinion from the court below, were intended to be co-extensive. And I cannot think that it was ever contemplated that an appeal should be entertained from any class of orders when that which was affected by them could never be effectually interfered with. The jurisdiction of the courts whose functions were transferred to the High Court to discharge under a writ of habeas corpus was well known, and if it had been intended that an appeal should lie against such an order, I think that provision would have been made to enable the Court of Appeal to restore to custody the person erroneously discharged. In the absence of such a power the appeal is futile, and this appears to me to be a sufficient reason for holding that the Legislature did not intend the right to hear and determine appeals to extend to such cases. It was said that it sometimes happens that events subsequent to the judgment of a court of first instance render it impossible for the Court of Appeal to remove the effect of the judgment below, even though it should hold that judgment to have been a wrong one, and that it could not be contended that on this account the judgment could not be appealed against. This is no doubt true, and many illustrations of it might be given. But the difficulty there arises from the accidental circumstances of the particular case. Here it is inherent in the nature of the order itself in all cases in which a person is discharged from the custody of the law. This distinction appears to me to be a vital one.

I ought to notice the decisions of the Privy Council which were strongly pressed upon your lordships, though I confess I do not think they have any great bearing upon the present case. It was said that the Privy Council had in these cases reversed the judgment of the court below, which had discharged a prisoner under a writ of habeas corpus. But it must be observed, in the first place, that the power of the Privy Council to enforce its judgments is conferred in very different terms to those which we have been considering (see 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 41, s. 21). And next, no question arose there as to the power of the Privy Council to entertain the appeals, and indeed no such question could be raised. Her Majesty in Council may entertain an appeal by any person aggrieved by the action of her colonial courts, and might well determine a question of law, for the purpose of guiding those courts in the future. The relation of the Queen in Council to the colonial courts differs altogether from the statutory relation of the Court of Appeal to the High Court of Justice.

It was contended by the learned counsel for the respondent that, inasmuch as the Legislature has, by the Judicature Act, limited the number of courts to which application for a writ of habeas corpus might be made, it had, by way of compensation, given an appeal against the orders made in all such cases. I do not think that such an explanation of the legislation can be sustained. The remedy of habeas corpus would be sought in a majority of cases in a criminal cause or matter, where admittedly no appeal has been given. It will be seen that the reasoning which has led me to the conclusion that an appeal will not lie from an order discharging a person from custody under a writ of habeas corpus has no application to an appeal from an order refusing to discharge the applicant. I intend to express no opinion whether there is an appeal in such a case. That question does not arise here, and any opinion expressed upon it would be extra-judicial. I refer to it only because it was suggested that, if there was an appeal in the one case, it was scarcely to be conceived that there should not be an appeal in the other. I do not think so. There would be, to my mind, nothing surprising if it should turn out that an appeal lay by one whose discharge had been refused; but that there was no appeal against a discharge from custody. It would be in strict analogy to that which has long been the law. The discharge could never be reviewed or interfered with, the refusal to discharge, on the other hand, was always open to review; and although this review was not, properly speaking, by way of appeal, its practical effect was precisely the same as if it had been.

Another argument was submitted, to which I ought, perhaps, to refer. It was urged that the Court of Appeal could, at all events, deal with the costs in the court below, and that an appeal lay, if only for the purpose of enabling them to do so. But when once the conclusion is reached that, in orders of this description, it was not intended that there should be an appeal on the merits, I think it impossible to hold that it was intended that an appeal should lie merely for the purpose of dealing with costs. There remains the contention that the proceedings in the present case were irregular, that there ought to have been first a rule to bring into court the body of the applicant, and then a rule to discharge him from custody. It was said that, if this course had been pursued, there might well have been an appeal from the first of these rules, as the Court of Appeal would have full power to enforce their judgment, in case they considered that there was no ground for bringing up the body of the applicant. It is unnecessary to determine whether an appeal would lie from an order for a writ of habeas corpus if it were brought to the Court of Appeal before there had been a discharge under it. No such point arises here. But the respondent argues that it was not competent for the High Court to discharge the prisoner without having him first brought before them. It was admitted that the procedure adopted was sanctioned by the Crown Office Rules of 1886; but it was suggested that the rule which gives sanction to this course was ultrà vires, inasmuch as the presence in court of the person whose custody was in question was essential to the jurisdiction of the High Court to discharge him. No such point was raised on the argument in the present case in the Queen's Bench Division, and the respondent has failed to satisfy me that the rule was ultrà vires.

I do not think that the authorities cited support the view that what was undoubtedly the practice was essential to the jurisdiction. I think that the judgment appealed from should be reversed.

Lords WATSON and MACNAGHTEN concurred.

Lord MORRIS.—I am of opinion that the Court of Appeal rightly decided the preliminary question of jurisdiction raised before them, and that they had jurisdiction to entertain and decide the appeal from the order of the High Court of Justice made upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The order of the Queen's Bench Division, dated the 20th of May, 1887, orders "that a writ of habeas corpus issue directed to the gaoler of her Majesty's prison at Walton-on-the-Hill in the county of Lancaster, commanding him to have the body of" the appellant "before this court immediately after the receipt of the said writ, then and there to undergo and receive all and singular such matters and things as the said court shall then and there consider of and concerning him," and further ordering that the said appellant "be discharged out of the custody of the said gaoler as to his detention by virtue of a writ de contumace capiendo, issued from the Chancery of Lancashire, without being brought up personally before this court." The question turns on the construction of the 19th section of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873. By the 16th section of that Act the whole of the jurisdiction of the several courts enumerated, amongst which is the Court of Queen's Bench, was transferred to the High Court of Justice. The section collects into the new court all those various jurisdictions. That under section 19 an order refusing a writ of habeas corpus can be appealed from and can be heard and determined by the Court of Appeal, was not argued against at your lordships' bar on the part of the appellant, and could scarcely, in my opinion, be so argued after the various decisions on such appeals in the Court of Appeal and in your lordships' House. Why, then, should not an order granting a writ of habeas corpus and discharging the prisoner be also appealed from under section 19? The argument that no appeal lies in such a case appears to me fallacious upon two grounds: first, because it goes upon the view that the Court of Appeal has no power under the Act and present rules, and (what is, I think, involved) could not acquire power by rules which could be lawfully made under the Act, to order a person who had been wrongfully released from legal custody on writ of habeas corpus to be retaken and replaced in his former custody under the former commitments; secondly, because, even if it had not the power, that would not affect the jurisdiction of the Appeal Court to hear, and the obligation to determine, the appeal, and reverse, so far as it could, the illegal order appealed from.

As to the first ground, there is, to my mind, a confusion between the order made on any appeal and the power, authority, and jurisdiction for the enforcement of that order. Section 19 undoubtedly gave the Appeal Court power to make orders that could not have been made before—i.e., on appeals from interlocutory orders of the Common Law Division, and for the enforcement of those orders the Appeal Court was to have the powers of enforcement the former courts had in respect, not of such orders (for there could not have been any such), but of the orders they lawfully could make, such powers as attachment, sequestration, &c. If the Appeal Court made an order that the discharged prisoner should attend in court on a specified day, and if he did not he could be attached and brought up under attachment, being then in court, whether attending voluntarily and then ordered in custody, or brought up in custody under the attachment, the question would be as to the order the court could then make and not the power of enforcing such order. Why could not the Court of Appeal then lawfully re-commit him? No question of enforcement would arise, for, ex hypothesi, he was before the court in custody.

Thus, the question turns on the nature of the order the Court of Appeal could lawfully make, and not at all on the enforcement of the order made. The importance of this view appears to me to lie in this, that the limitation by reference to the power vested in the High Court applies only to enforcement, which is not in question, and not to the nature of the order, which is the point in question. The nature of the order the Court of Appeal may make is prescribed by ord. 58, r. 4, which (inter alia) says the Court of Appeal "shall have power to make any order which ought to have been made," and which would, in this case, be to re-commit the prisoner. I cannot concur with the argument applying the limitation introduced by reference to the powers of the High Court to the "order" to be made, which in many cases must be essentially new, instead of to the enforcement of it, to which alone the limitation is applied by the second paragraph of the section. But now I will assume that there would not be under the express words of the 19th section power to enforce the order. Does that necessarily limit the appealable matter? In my judgment, No. The real limits of the appealable matter are defined by the first sentence of section 19, dealing with jurisdiction to hear and determine; the second sentence is ancillary only to that which is defined by the first sentence, and can neither extend nor restrict it. The exceptions made, such as by section 47 of criminal matters, show a clear intention that every order, not expressly excepted in the Act, should be subject to be appealed from. Now, the argument for the appellant engrafts a new exception not mentioned, but said to be implied—and why so? by reason of a sentence intended not to cut down the prior subject-matter, but to extend to the entire of it. The first sentence of section 19 taken by itself would clearly include the order in this case. The second sentence in ancillary only, and is intended to be co-extensive with the first, and if in the result it was not co-extensive, then, in my opinion, the maxim should come in, Quando lex aliquid alicui concedit conceditur et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potest. Whenever anything is authorized to be done by law, and it is impossible to do that thing unless something else not authorized by express terms be also done, then that something else will be supplied by necessary intendment. But, without applying this maxim, there is surely at least power to formally reverse the former order. If the order is within the section and the subject of appeal, it cannot be taken out of it by reasoning based on practice or procedure; and if alteration in the latter (namely, practice or procedure) be wanted the judges have, in my opinion, full power to make rules as to the practice and procedure suitable for all habeas corpus cases; and if by the present rules the order reversing the order of the Queen's Bench cannot be effective to put the appellant back in prison again, that goes merely to its effect, not to the jurisdiction to make it. I see no reason why a rule could not be made by the judges under the Judicature Act whereby in such a case as the present the sheriff could be directed to retake the party discharged and render him to prison, there to remain under the original writ de contumace capiendo. If so, the absence of such a rule should not affect the jurisdiction to hear the appeal. I confess I am not at all impressed with the arguments derived from "the liberty of the subject" or "constitutional changes." In the first place, no appeals lie from any judgment of the High Court to the Court of Appeal in criminal matters, and it has been decided that what is criminal matter should be taken in its widest sense.

Next, Mr. Jeune, in his very able argument, referred to two cases before the Privy Council. In the first, Reg. v. Mount, an appeal was entertained from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria holding that the return to the writ of habeas corpus was bad, and ordering the discharge of the prisoner and setting him at large. Again, in the Attorney-General for Hong Kong v. Kwok-a-Sing, on appeal from two orders of the Supreme Court of Hong Kong, whereby the prisoner was twice released from custody on writs of habeas corpus on appeal, while the first order was confirmed, the second was reversed. Of course, I am aware that these appeals were not brought under a statute, but on petition to Her Majesty referred to the Privy Council. But I fail to see why, if it was not unconstitutional to reverse an order of discharge of a prisoner on writ of habeas corpus under the advice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it is unconstitutional to do so by the Court of Appeal or by your lordships' House, provided the intention of the Legislature as conveyed by the words of the section of the statute cover the case. The intention of the Legislature in this case, as in others, should be governed by Id voluit quod dixit; and I cannot attempt to express my opinion better than in adopting the words of Lord Cairns, C., on the construction of this same 19th section in the case of the Overseers of Walsall v. London and North-Western Railway Co., as follows: "I do not think it is open to doubt that these clear and definite words of the Legislature must have their full effect given to them. You have here on the one hand a rule of the Queen's Bench Division, and on the other hand an enactment that every rule of the Queen's Bench Division is to be open to appeal." In the same case Lord O'Hagan says: "We are acting in our judicial, not in our legislative capacity, and we are not free to act on speculation or theory as to what law would be wisest." I say for myself my duty is jus dicere, not jus dare, when construing a statute. I consequently concur in the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal that they had jurisdiction to hear and to determine the appeal in this case.

Lord FIELD.—I am of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal, so far as it relates to the point of jurisdiction, is correct, and ought to be affirmed. I think that, when the Legislature gave to that court jurisdiction "to hear and determine appeals from any order of the High Court," it rendered all orders in habeas subject to appeal. I arrive at this result by applying to this statute to the best of my ability the well-known and settled rules of construction. Admittedly, the word "order" used in the 19th section is comprehensive enough in its literal sense to include the order now in question; but it seems to me that the Legislature has not left the matter standing there, it has reduced the generality of the word "order" to specific orders by making careful specific exceptions. All orders not excepted, and therefore orders in habeas in civil causes or matters, are thus, in my opinion, included. In order to arrive at the exceptions the framers of the Act must have passed in review the nature and characteristics of all the various orders which it was competent to the High Court to make, and it has divided those in which an appeal should not be given from those which were to be so liable.

Now the admitted rules of construction lay down that I am not at liberty to infer an intention contrary to the literal meaning of the words of a statute, unless the context, or the consequences which would ensue from a literal interpretation justify the inference that the Legislature has not expressed something which it intended to express, or unless such interpretation (in the language of Parke, B., in Beck v. Smith, 2 M. & W. 191) leads to any manifest "absurdity or repugnance," with this superadded qualification, that the absurdity or repugnance must be such as manifested itself to the mind of the law-maker, and not such as may appear to be so to me: Willes, J., in Motteram v. Eastern Counties Railway Co., 8 W. R. 77, 7 C. B. N. S. 58. See the authorities collected in Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, c. 9, s. 1. These principles were not, indeed, denied by the appellant's counsel at your lordships' bar, but they argued that, as well from the consequences which would ensue if such an order were liable to appeal, as from the context of the statute itself, it was apparent that the Legislature had not included or intended to include the "order" now in question in the enacting part of section 19.

In support of this argument it was correctly stated, as some of the noble lords who have addressed your lordships have already pointed out, that at the time of the passing of the Act it was the undoubted right of a subject detained in custody to question by habeas the lawfulness of his detention before every one of her Majesty's courts in succession, without regard to the refusal to discharge by any one or more of them, and that if any one court came to the conclusion that the applicant was entitled to be discharged, no other court had any power of modification or reversal. It was argued, therefore, that if the Judicature Act had to be construed as giving a right of appeal to the Crown or prosecutor, that would be so manifest and unreasonable an encroachment upon the rights and liberty of the subject, and so manifestly repugnant, that it could not have been intended. It was not denied that habeas in some shape or stage was within the contemplation of the Legislature as coming within some of the provisions of the Act in question. Indeed, as Lord Bramwell has pointed out, the jurisdiction of the High Court to issue writs of habeas, and to remand, hold to bail, or discharge, does not exist unless it is conferred by section 16. So that habeas is clearly within the provision of that section. Moreover, it was (in my judgment advisedly) conceded by the appellant's counsel in their arguments before the Lords Justices that, if upon application for habeas an order of remand was made, such an order was included in the word "order." Indeed, this has been so decided, for an appeal was held to lie from an order of attachment in habeas in a civil matter (Reg. v. Barnardo), and no appeal to lie from an order of remand in a criminal matter as being within the exceptions in sections 19 and 47: Reg. v. Alice Woodhall.

Now, I quite agree that it does not follow, of necessity, that because an order of remand is liable to appeal an order of discharge is so. The two orders are, as has been relied upon by some of your lordships, very different in their nature and consequences. But the admitted intention to include one form of order in habeas seems to me to render it highly improbable that the eminent lawyers who are thus shown to have had some forms of order in habeas in their minds, and were thoroughly acquainted with their several peculiar characteristics, would not, if they had intended to except an order of discharge, have guarded against the alleged encroachment upon the liberty of the subject by adding that order to the exceptions which they have so carefully specified, some of which do not seem to me to vie in importance with it. I also feel the weight of the argument which has commended itself to some of your lordships—viz., the giving in such a matter a new right of appeal as against a subject where none in point of form, if not in substance, existed before; and if nothing in the shape of an equivalent had been given the argument would, although not conclusive to me in face of the actual language of the statute, have derived great additional force. But I cannot conceal from myself that the Legislature has still left to the subject a recourse in succession to such a number of the highest tribunals in the land as, in my judgment, effectually prevents any hurtful consequences from any new limitation which they have effected. Whether strictly appeals or not, the subject has still the right of obtaining a practical review of any improper refusal of his application, not only by the Lord Chancellor and by individual judges, but also by a court composed of as many judges as the president may think it right to convene. The Legislature has also given, in my judgment, an appeal to an applicant unjustly committed or held to bail, a new right of enormous advantage.

For these reasons it appears to me that the appellant's argument, in this respect, fails, and that to construe the 19th section as inclusive of the order of the Divisional Court is imputing a reasonable view to the Legislature rather than anything like absurdity or repugnance. If ever there was a statute to which these elements ought not to be imputed without great necessity, or to which the rules justifying the departure from the literal meaning on the ground of absurdity or repugnance should be carefully and sparingly applied, the Judicature Acts seem to me to claim that place. But it was further argued that, even if an order for discharge be an order to which the first part of the 19th section would, taken by itself, apply, and that the respondents' contention to that effect was impossible to be resisted, the provisions of the section which follow show that the Legislature intended some further limitation to be put upon the general words of the first part, and that such limitation was to be found in what was alleged to be the case, that the applicant having once been discharged by the Divisional Court from detention under the writ de contumace capiendo of the 4th of May, 1887, there was no process of any court or courts, ecclesiastical or lay, or ecclesiastical and lay, by which the applicant could again be brought up ad subjiciendum until he should in the words of the writ, "have made satisfaction for the contempt" of which he has been adjudged guilty, and that to suppose therefore that the Legislature intended to confer a right of appeal which was said to be absolutely futile was again to suppose an absurdity rendering it necessary to add or to vary the literal words of the statute. But, although this argument is entitled to very great weight, I am unable to yield to it for several reasons. In the first place, the words at the end of section 19 relied upon in this view do not appear to me to be restrictive, but rather ancillary to the jurisdiction already created. It is "for the purposes of and incidental to that jurisdiction" that the Appeal Court is to have all the powers, authority, and jurisdiction by the Act vested in the High Court. These words seem to me to be words of complement, and not of curtailment. Neither am I satisfied by the appellant's argument that any such grave blot as it supposes does, in fact, under the circumstances in evidence in this case, rest upon the administration of justice in this country, and that no means exist whereby a contumacious subject can be compelled to pay obedience to the authority of the established tribunals of the land. I have listened with care to the arguments upon this point, and I have carefully examined the authorities cited on both sides.

In the result I am unable at this moment to say whether the authority of the spiritual court to signify the persistent contempts and disobedience of the appellant is exhausted, so that a new significavit and a new temporal writ may not issue. One of the noble lords who have preceded me appears to think such a view is possible. Neither can I say whether a new writ de contumace capiendo may not issue upon the existing significavit, or whether, the existing writ not having been returned, an arrest may or may not be made under it, or, if that writ is exhausted, whether an alias may or may not issue. These questions are of a highly technical character. But this I can say, and it seems to me to answer the objection, that whether the appellant's or the respondents' views in this respect are correct, the matter could not have appeared so unmistakably clear to the framers of the Act as to induce me to suppose that upon these grounds they intended what they have not expressed, and have expressed what they did not intend. I do not propose to discuss the authorities here—not from any want of respect, but because any opinion which I may have formed upon the questions raised does not appear to me to bear upon the only question now before your lordships, which is one of the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal, and not of what ought to be done upon the appeal. It also appears to me that ord. 58, r. 4, forms another answer to the appellant's contention upon this head. The Court of Appeal has held (rightly or wrongly, for that point has not yet been argued) that the Divisional Court erred in discharging the appellant from custody, and that the order nisi obtained by him should have been discharged instead of being made absolute. It may be true, and probably is, that the Court of Appeal has no process by which it can do what the court below ought in that event to have done, but restitutio in integrum is the right of every successful appellant (Rodger v. Comptoir d'Escompte), and the Appellate Court, by doing part of that which the court below in the case supposed ought to have done—viz., by discharging the order nisi wrongfully obtained—will not only free the respondent from an erroneous decision which must stand very much in the way of any future attempt to enforce the obedience of the appellant, but will also settle the construction of the statutes of Elizabeth and Geo. 3. In the case of Reg. v. Mount, although the respondents had been discharged from custody, and had presumably placed themselves outside the jurisdiction of the colonial court, the Judicial Committee did not hesitate to reverse the judgment below.

The appellant's counsel also raised some minor points in bar of jurisdiction, but they were not sufficiently weighty to induce me to alter my view, which is, that your lordships have the jurisdiction, and therefore the duty, to determine the appeal.

Order appealed from reversed; order of the Queen's Bench Division restored. The respondent Hakes to pay the costs of this appeal and in the courts below.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

This appeal raised a question as to the liability to succession duty as between vendor and purchaser on a contract for sale under the following circumstances.

Sir J. H. Langham, the present owner of an estate in fee simple in possession of the Langham Hotel (subject to a lease thereof for an unexpired term of seventy years held by the Langham Hotel Co.) was a widower, aged eighty-eight years, and without issue. He was a lunatic so found, and was believed to have made no will. Herbert H. Langham was at present the heir-presumptive of Sir J. H. Langham.

On May 16, 1890, Herbert H. Langham entered into a contract in writing with the Langham Hotel Co., the material parts of which contract were as follows:—"(1) Mr. Herbert H. Langham shall sell, and the Langham Hotel Co. shall purchase, the fee simple of the freehold land and premises . . . known as the Langham Hotel . . . as the same are now held by the company, and to which the said Herbert H. Langham is entitled in reversion expectant on the death of Sir J. H. Langham, Bart., intestate and without issue, and contingently on the said Herbert H. Langham surviving him. (2) The interest of the said Herbert H. Langham, as defined in clause 1, shall be sold free from incumbrances." The contract also contained a stipulation that the vendor should effect and should assign to the company a policy on his life payable in the event of his predeceasing Sir J. H. Langham.

The company, as the purchasers under this contract, insisted that the vendor was thereby bound to pay or provide for the succession duty payable on the death of Sir J. H. Langham. The contract contained no express stipulation as to the payment of the succession duty.

On a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, Stirling, J., sitting in chambers, held, on the authority of Cooper v. Trewby, 8 W. R. 299, 28 Beav. 194, that the duty was payable by the purchasers.

The purchasers appealed.

A. E. Dryden, for the appellants.—The Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), s. 42, makes the succession a charge upon the land. The vendor has contracted to sell, and the purchasers to buy, "free from incumbrances," and it is, therefore, the duty of the vendor to pay or provide for the succession duty. Cooper v. Trewby cannot be supported on principle. [FRY, L.J.—The sale is a sale in præsenti, and the succession duty is not an existing incumbrance.] What is sold is the expectancy, and that is an interest to arise in futuro, and carries with it incumbrances to arise in futuro. On a sale by the tenant for life and the reversioner jointly, in an open contract, the purchaser is bound to pay the succession duty: Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, 6th ed., p. 667.

Bliss v. Putnam, 7 Beav. 40, was also referred to.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and C. C. Tucker, for the respondent, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This appeal raises the question, as between a purchaser and a vendor of an expectant interest in real estate, which of the two is liable to pay succession duty?

The vendor in this case has got no estate in the property which is the subject-matter of the contract, but he is the heir-presumptive of a gentleman who is seised of that property in fee simple in possession, and who has no issue. The vendor, therefore, has a mere expectancy, a chance of succeeding to the property in question, and he has contracted to sell that free from incumbrances. Now at present there are no incumbrances whatever, and it may be there never will be any, and it may be there will be. If the vendor should become the successor of the present owner, then there will be a liability for succession duty, but if he never succeeds, of course there will not. The question we have to decide is, whether under this contract which of the two, the purchaser or the vendor, is to be exonerated from the payment of succession duty. The contract says nothing about succession duty, it only states that what is sold is sold free from incumbrances. Cooper v. Trewby, which I think is right, clearly covers this case, which is not even so strong a case as that.

In re GRIFFIN. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Discharge—Omission to keep proper books—"Business"—One or two transactions—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28, sub-section 3 (a).

When a court of bankruptcy is considering whether a bankrupt has "omitted to keep such books of account as are usual and proper in the business carried on by him" within the meaning of section 28, sub-section 3 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, proof that he engaged in one or two building transactions is sufficient proof that he carried on the business of a builder if it be shown that he intended the one or two transactions to be followed by similar transactions.

Appeal by the Board of Trade from an order of Mr. Registrar Giffard, granting the bankrupt an absolute order of discharge.

The report of the official receiver stated that the bankrupt had omitted to keep proper books of account; that he had contracted debts without having any reasonable expectation of being able to pay them; that he had brought on his bankruptcy by rash and hazardous speculation; and that he had been guilty of misconduct with reference to an execution.

The bankrupt was a civil engineer. He entered into certain contracts for making roads. In October,

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1888—his only property, independently of what he was earning by making roads, being an equity of redemption, which the official receiver found to be worth not more than £100—he bought half an acre of land for £135 with the intention of building thereon seven cottages. He employed a builder and advanced him money; but the builder failed, and the bankrupt was obliged to complete the building himself, though he had at the time no available capital. He then sold the land and cottages at a loss. In April, 1889, while he owed money to various creditors under the road contracts, he undertook the building of a house, and all the money he received under the road contracts he spent on the building, without paying his existing debts.

One of the questions which arose on the appeal was whether the registrar ought to have suspended the order of discharge, on the ground that the bankrupt had omitted to keep proper books of account.

Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade.

H. Reed, for the bankrupt.

Lord ESHER, M.R., after coming to the conclusion that the bankrupt had been guilty of rash speculation and also of misconduct, and that on those grounds the order for his discharge ought to have been suspended, continued:—It was next said that the bankrupt had offended against sub-section 3 (a) of section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, in that he "omitted to keep such books of accounts as are usual and proper in the business carried on by him." As to road contracting I am not certain that that is a business in which it is usual to keep kooks; that is a question on which more evidence might have been given, and we cannot decide it now. It is, however, clear that building is a business in which it is usual and proper to keep books. The question then arises, Did the bankrupt carry on the business of a builder? It was argued that one or transactions do not make a business. The registrar seems to have acceded to this argument, and to have laid it down as a rule that where you prove only two transactions you do not prove a business. I am of opinion that that is too drastic a statement. If the one or two transactions were isolated transactions, undertaken without any intention that they should be followed by other similar transactions, I think that would not amount to a business. But if a transaction is such as if repeated would make a business, and if it is undertaken with the intent that it should be the first of a series of similar transactions, I think that one transaction constitutes a business. But in this case it has not been satisfactorily proved that the two building transactions were part of an intended series.

We think that, on the ground of rash speculation and misconduct, the bankrupt's discharge ought to be suspended for twelve months.

Petition.

This was a petition for the payment out of court of a sum of £2,060 16s. 6d. Consols paid in under the Trustee Relief Act.

The petition was unopposed, the trustees being the only respondents, and there was no doubt as to the title of the petitioner, but the question arose whether, in accordance with order 5 of the Chancery Funds Amended Orders, 1874, notice of the payment into court ought not to have been served on certain persons mentioned in the affidavit made on such payment in as possibly entitled to a charge on the said fund.

It appeared by such affidavit that the petitioner came of age on the 17th of October, 1890, having while still an infant purported to charge the said fund in favour of two persons named Hargreaves and Marks by deeds post-dated the said 17th of October, 1890, but the trustees were unaware of any subsequent ratification of such charges, and to the best of their knowledge and belief the only persons entitled to the said sum were the petitioner and such persons (if any) entitled under him as thereinbefore mentioned.

The evidence filed on behalf of the petitioner showed that the charges of Hargreaves and Marks were nugatory, and the petitioner submitted that notice of the payment in need not be given to them under order 5 aforesaid.

Maclean, Q.C., and Prior, for the petitioner.—The Trustee Relief Act directs persons paying money into court under its provisions to file an affidavit shortly describing the instrument creating the trust. Then the Chancery Funds Consolidated Rules, 1874, r. 34, directs the person making such affidavit to set forth (inter alia) "the names of the persons interested in or entitled to the money or securities, and their places of residence to the best of his knowledge and belief." This rule was revoked on the 1st of March, 1884, by the Supreme Court Funds Rules, 1884, r. 2. The Chancery Funds Amended Orders, 1874, ord. 5 (Ann. Prac. Supp., p. 12), directs the same person to forthwith give notice of such payment into court to the several persons named in his affidavit to be made in pursuance of rule 34 aforesaid and the Trustee Relief Act as interested in or entitled to such money or securities. This order has never been expressly revoked, but rule 34, on which alone it can operate, is gone, and it is therefore ineffective. The note in Ann. Prac. Supp., p. 29, citing In re Stening, 50 L. T. N. S. 586, 32 W. R. Dig. 217, is clearly wrong, and is not borne out by the decision. The present practice is regulated by rule 41 of the Supreme Court Funds Rules, 1886, which repeats in effect rule 41 of the Rules of 1884, and does not require the names of the persons interested to be stated. Further, order 5 is inconsistent with the Supreme Court Funds Rules, 1886, and is therefore revoked by rule 2 (Ann. Prac. Supp., p. 16).

Methold, for the respondents.

CHITTY, J.—The form of affidavit to be used by a trustee who desires to lodge funds in court is given in rule 41 of the Supreme Court Funds Rules, 1886, and this is a subsisting rule. That form of affidavit does not require the trustee to state the names of the persons interested in or entitled to the money or securities, or their places of residence to the best of his knowledge and belief. In the abrogated Chancery Funds Consolidated Rules, 1874, the form of affidavit was given in rule 34, and it was required that it should state the above particulars. Now I must take it that when the rules of 1886 were framed, the matter came before those who had authority to frame them, and that they deliberately left these particulars out of the affidavit.

Now the Chancery Funds Consolidated Rules, 1874, r. 34, is clearly abrogated, but it appears that the Chancery Funds Amended Orders, 1874, ord. 5, which required a person having made a payment or transfer of moneys or securities into or a deposit of securities in court under the Trustee Relief Act to forthwith give notice thereof to the several persons named in his affidavit to be made in pursuance of this rule 34 and the said Act as interested or entitled to such money has never been in terms repealed. The question is, however, whether it has any effect now. It is clear it has not. As the trustee is not required according to the existing form of affidavit to state the names and addresses of the persons interested, it follows that he cannot be required forthwith to give notice to the several persons named, and the result is that he need not do so.

The alteration in the rule was probably deliberate, because there was often great difficulty in serving the notice. In many cases the money was only paid in because the trustee could not discover the person entitled, and, of course, he could not serve them with notice. Again, he often might know the names, but could not give the addresses. A further reason is, that as the matter must come before the court in any case the proper service of parties will be attended to as a matter of course before the money is paid out. [His lordship then, after referring to the facts, and holding that no notice need be served, continued:—] Pearson, J., in In re Stening, gave no decision inconsistent with what I have said, but merely thought it desirable that notice should be served at as early a period as possible in the particular case in order to protect the trustees and to prevent the initiation of useless litigation. I leave Mr. Maclean's second point untouched, though it is very possible that Chancery Funds Amended Orders, ord. 5, is repealed by the Supreme Court Funds Rules, 1886, r. 2.

BELLAMY v. WELLS. (a.)

Injunction — Club — Nuisance — Crowds — Cabs — Whistling.

A proprietary club was established at which entertainments consisting of pugilistic encounters were given, which caused the collection of large crowds outside the club. The noise of the shouting of the crowd, and the frequency on all nights, and until early in the morning, of whistling from the club for cabs, which, in their turn, created much noise in driving to the club, prevented the tenants and occupiers of adjoining houses from sleeping at night. In an action brought by the owners, lessees, and occupiers of a neighbouring house against the proprietor of the club,

Held, that the nuisance from the crowds and cabs was the reasonable and probable consequence of the defendant's acts, and that an injunction ought to issue to restrain it, as well as the whistling for cabs during certain hours.

Trial of action.

The plaintiffs were the owners, lessees, and occupiers of No. 33, Gerrard-street, Soho, and the defendant was the proprietor of a sporting club known as the Pelican Club, which was erected on the site of Nos. 34 and 35, Gerrard-street and opened in February, 1890. The action claimed an injunction restraining the defendant, his servants and agents, from using or permitting to be used the premises in question for the purpose of glove fights, boxing contests, music, or other sports or entertainments, or in any other manner, or for any other purpose whereby a nuisance might be occasioned to the annoyance and injury of the plaintiffs. Boxing contests were from time to time held at the club, on which occasions large crowds collected, and created noise and disturbance. Besides this the club was continually kept open to an early hour in the morning, and cabs were constantly whistled for during the night, and made much noise in coming to the club. Concerts were also occasionally given at the club, and singing and music was frequently indulged in by the members, but the claim as to this part of the case was dismissed. The other details of the facts of the case appear sufficiently from the judgment.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., Neville, Q.C., and Rowden, for the plaintiffs.—The best definition of the rights of an occupier to restrain such a nuisance as this is contained in Walter v. Selfe, 4 De G. & Sm. 322, at p. 323, where the circumstances under which an injunction is granted is where "the ordinary comfort of existence" has been interfered with. As to whether the club can be held liable for the nuisance created by the people coming there, The King v. Moore, 3 B. & Ad. 184, is in point, and shows that where this is the probable consequence of the defendant's act he is liable. Walker v. Brewster, L. R. 5 Eq. 25; Inchbald v. Robinson, 17 W. R. 459, L. R. 4 Ch. App., p. 397; and Reinhardt v. Mentasti, 38 W. R. 10, 42 Ch. D. 685, are all to the same effect. The real question in all these cases is, Is the neighbour in fact injured? There is no objection to people turning night into day if they like to do so, but they must be careful not to injure their neighbours in so doing.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., Haldane, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the defendant.—The street in question, up to a few years ago, was a noisy one, and was a thoroughfare before Shaftesbury-avenue was opened. In all cases of nuisance arising from use of a place in a certain way, the character of the neighbourhood has to be taken into consideration. If any nuisance arose from the cabs which came to the club, that is a matter over which the club proprietor has no control, and for which he is not liable, nor is he liable for the crowds collected on the occasion of the glove contests. [ROMER, J.—As to the crowds three questions arise: (1) Whether in fact a nuisance was created by them; (2) whether the collection of crowds was a probable result of the action of the club; and (3) whether the fights and contests to which the crowds might be due, have been of so frequent occurrence as to justify the interference of the court.]

Haldane, Q.C.—As the contests were quite legal, we are not liable for the collection of crowds. As to the complaints of the noise of the whistle, the language of the cabmen, and the noise of the cabs, these are but the ordinary incidents of London life, and must be submitted to.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., in reply.—The defendant is entitled to whistle so long as he does not annoy other people, which in our case he does.

ROMER, J.—This is an action to restrain a nuisance by noise alleged to be committed by the defendant, as proprietor of a club called the Pelican Club, whose premises are situate in Gerrard-street, Soho. The plaintiffs are the occupants and owners of No. 33, Gerrard-street. The club is a proprietary one, and the business of the club is carried on by the defendant alone for his own benefit, he alone receiving the profits derived from it, so that, beyond question, if any nuisance is caused by the club the defendant is responsible for it. The case sought to be established by the plaintiffs may be divided into three heads—First, nuisance caused by certain boxing contests held at the club; secondly, nuisance caused by the whistling for the cabs and carriages for members leaving the club, and the noise of the cabs and carriages themselves; and, thirdly, nuisance caused by music and singing in the club and applause consequent thereon. With regard to the boxing contests, the facts are these:—The club is one formed for the purpose (inter alia) of affording entertainments to its members by boxing contests for large money prizes between celebrated professional pugilists. These contests are held from time to time in the season between October and August, in the basement of the club premises, generally about midnight or later. No complaint is made by the plaintiffs of any nuisance by noise arising directly from the contests, but it is said that they cause a large and rough crowd to assemble in Gerrard-street, which remains for hours until the early morning after the contests are decided, and which blocks up the street and makes a great noise by cheering, hooting, and whistling, especially when the combatants and their friends arrive at or leave the club, and when the result of the contests is announced and during the time that the police are endeavouring to cause the crowd to move on or to disperse. Three of these contests, which admittedly took place for large sums of money between well-known pugilists, were held, the first in November, 1889, before the club premises were fully opened to the members, the second in February, 1890, on the occasion of the club premises being formally thrown open to the members, and the third in June. And the result of the evidence of the plaintiffs' witnesses was that each of these three occasions caused a large mob to assemble, whose noise created an intolerable nuisance to the occupiers of No. 33, Gerrard-street, and the surrounding houses, and prevented sleep until a late hour in the morning. Now on the question whether or not, on the three occasions I have referred to, the crowd, in fact, caused a nuisance by noise to the occupiers of No. 33, after hearing the witnesses on both sides I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs have proved such nuisance.

It remains, then, for me to consider the point whether the defendant can be held responsible for this nuisance. On his behalf it was said that he had not invited the crowd, and did not desire its presence. This is true.

But the question appears to me to turn upon this—whether the collection of the crowd under the circumstances was not the probable consequence of the defendant's acts, for, if it was, then he is answerable, whatever may have been his object or desire, on the principle pointed out by Littledale, J., in the well-known pigeon-shooting case of The King v. Moore. And the same principle is referred to in the case of Walker v. Brewster. Now, I think that the collection of this crowd was a probable consequence of the defendant's acts and one which (again to cite Littledale, J.) the experience of mankind would lead anyone to expect as the result. This appears to me to follow on consideration of the following facts. As appears from the evidence, these contests require at least a month's training on the part of the combatants, who are selected amongst the most distinguished of their calling, and a somewhat long notice has to be given to the competitors of the day on which the combat will take place between them, and this day so becomes known to their numerous friends and admirers, who appear to take a deep interest in the result of the contest, and flock to the spot where the combatants can be seen and the result most speedily known. Moreover, the club is a large one, numbering (as appears from the evidence) about 1,200 members, and notice of each approaching contest is given to the members some considerable time beforehand, and through them would naturally become well known to the numerous class who take an interest in pugilistic encounters. For instance, the notice given for the contest on the 27th of June is in evidence, and was clearly given before the 4th of June. Again, the defendant himself evidently contemplated that the result of his acts would be the assemblage of a crowd on these occasions, for on each of the three he gave previous notice to the police, so that they might be prepared with extra force to deal with the apprehended assemblage, and the police authorities made arrangements accordingly. And, lastly, I refer to the fact that on each of the three occasions, as also on the only other somewhat similar but less formidable occasion of the 31st of March, the prognostications of the defendant were amply fulfilled, and a mob did collect. It further appears from the evidence that, unless the defendant be restrained by injunction, the occasions of nuisance I have referred to will probably be repeated, for the arrangements of the club are that these special contests shall take place at least four times in the course of each season, which commences some time in October and ends at the end of July, or thereabouts.

Under these circumstances, and having regard to the serious nature of the nuisance, as proved by the plaintiffs' witnesses, being one taking place and preventing sleep on the part of those suffering from it for some time before and for some hours after midnight, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction on this head, for it certainly cannot in my judgment be successfully contended by the defendant that, in holding these contests and so collecting noisy crowds at the late hour he does, he is using the club premises in an ordinary way or is not materially interfering with the ordinary comfort of existence of the occupiers of No. 33, "according to plain and sober and simple notions among the English people" (see judgment of Shadwell, V.C., in the well-known case of Walter v. Selfe). The next complaint of the plaintiffs I have to consider is with reference to the whistling for cabs and carriages, and the noise caused by the cabs and carriages driving up to and away from the club. As to this there is again a conflict of testimony. I will first state what is the result I have arrived at, after seeing and hearing the witnesses on both sides and considering their evidence. The club is what is called a late one, and was described by one of its members (a witness for the defendant) as a Bohemian club. It appears to be largely frequented after midnight, and remains open until a very late (or early) hour in the morning. Members are leaving from time to time, and frequently (on some nights, of course, not so often as on others) at all hours after twelve up to as late as six in the morning. During these hours, from time to time, cabs are whistled for by the usual loud street whistle familiar to us all, and then the cabs answer to the whistle and pass rapidly to the club over the adjacent street, which is here paved with cobbles. Often, in answer to the whistle, two or more cabs race for the fare, and this causes additional noise, often varied by the violent language of the cabman who fails to secure the fare. The effect of the loud noises caused by the cabs, and the whistling repeated night after night at divers times between midnight and six in the morning, has been, in my judgment, to wake up repeatedly between those hours and almost every night those occupants of the houses near the club who sleep in rooms fronting on the street, and to cause a nuisance to them, and in particular to the occupants of No. 33, and an injury to the lessee and freeholders of No. 33 by lowering the rental value of that house (which is let out to the occupants as weekly tenants), and by making it difficult to procure tenants except of an inferior class, and at reduced rents. This being the conclusion of fact I have come to on this part of the case, it follows that an injunction must go against the defendant. For him it was urged that every householder has a right to call cabs to his house for the convenience of himself and guests, and to use a whistle for the purpose. The answer is that, whatever may be the right of a householder when using his house in an ordinary way, the present is in no wise an user of an ordinary or common kind. The defendant is carrying on a large business as a club proprietor and a business of a peculiar kind. It is not the ordinary practice of the occupier of a house in London to keep it habitually open for numerous guests up to five or six every morning, and to call cabs for those guests by whistles at frequent intervals between midnight and five or six a.m. Counsel for the defendant urged that even in the quietest parts of London the occupants of a house must occasionally suffer, without complaint, from a ball at a neighbour's kept up late, and from the noise arising from the calls of the linkmen and the arrival and departure of the carriages and cabs of the guests. That is because the balls are not frequent, and people in London must and do act on the give-and-take principle and reasonably. But those who have been kept awake by the noise of a neighbour's assembly know that it is not pleasant, even for a single night, and no inhabitant would be bound to submit to his rest being disturbed night after night because his neighbour chose to indulge in over-lavish hospitality.

I should observe that an attempt was made on behalf of the defendant to make out that Gerrard-street was a noisy street; but on the whole evidence I think it appears that that street is not at all an exceptionally noisy street, and certainly the noises suggested to arise from other houses in the street, such as the Italian Club and the French Club, and from cabs going to the railway stations through the street, could not be compared with or excuse the noises complained of by the plaintiffs in this action. I may add that, assuming a nuisance by noise to arise from the club to the occupiers of No. 33, who are weekly tenants, it is clear that the case is one entitling the owners and lessees of that house to sue as co-plaintiffs, and indeed that proposition was not contested by the defendant's counsel. [His lordship then proceeded to examine the part of the case relating to alleged nuisance arising from music and singing in the club, and held that it was not substantiated by the evidence.]

I have now to consider the form the injunction must take on those parts of the case on which the plaintiffs have succeeded. It requires care in framing in order not to press upon the defendant unduly or beyond what is absolutely required to protect the plaintiffs. It will go in the following form—and it will be seen that I have limited the injunction, in the case of the whistling and cabs, to the hours between midnight and 7 a.m., as I think it is from the noise within those hours that substantially the plaintiffs are suffering:—"An injunction to restrain the defendant from carrying on or permitting to be carried on by himself, his manager, or agents, the business or concern of the Pelican Club on club premises in the pleadings mentioned so as to cause a nuisance by noise to the plaintiffs (other than the plaintiff Isabella Phillips), or any of them, as owners, lessee, or occupiers of the premises No. 33, Gerrard-street, Soho, or any of the tenants or under-lessees of the plaintiffs Bellamy, Tylden, and Eliza Turner, or any of them, as owners or lessee of the last-mentioned premises, (1) by cabs or carriages driving to or leaving the club premises and the whistling for carriages or cabs to the club between the hours of midnight and 7 a.m.: and (2) by any crowd caused to be assembled by the boxing contests or entertainments held at the club premises." The injunction thus limited will not in any way prevent the defendant from efficiently carrying on the business of the club in a reasonable manner. This is not a case for inquiry as to damages, nor was any asked for by the plaintiffs' counsel.

At the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions for the county of Leicester, on the 15th of October, 1849, it was resolved to divide the county into eight police districts, pursuant to the provisions of sections 3 and 4 of the Police Act, 1840. The resolution was approved by the Secretary of State, and since that time the county has been divided into police districts, and general and local police rates have been assessed and levied as provided by the Act.

At a meeting of the county council held on the 23rd of October last, it was resolved that in the opinion of the council no distinction ought to be made in the assessment and levying of the rate for police purposes throughout the county, but that the entire expenditure in connection with the police should be defrayed in common by the entire county.

The question for the court was whether the powers formerly exercised by justices in quarter sessions of assessing and levying police rates, of altering the existing police districts, and of assessing and levying one equal police rate throughout the county, instead of assessing and levying a general police rate and local police rates as hitherto, were transferred to and exercisable by the county council or to and by the standing joint committee.

Buszard, Q.C., and Macmorran, for the county council.—All questions of rating are transferred to the county council by the Local Government Act, 1888. This is purely a question of rating, for the primary object of making police districts was to enable special rates to be made on those districts which required more police than the rest of the county. The county council, therefore, and not the joint committee, ought to deal with it.

R. S. Wright, for the standing joint committee.—The question is one as to management, not as to the power of making rates. It is only the power of making rates that is transferred to the county council. All matters connected with the management of police, to which class the alteration of existing police districts clearly belongs, are transferred to the joint-committee: Ex parte The Somerset County Council, In re The Local Government Act, 1888, 58 L. J. Q. B. 513, 38 W. R. Dig. 117.

Buszard, Q.C., in reply.—The case cited applies only to questions connected with the maintenance and repair of buildings, and does not affect the assessment or levying of rates.

HAWKINS, J.—This case raises an important question depending chiefly on section 27 of the Police Act, 1840, and on section 3 of the Local Government Act, 1888. Section 27 of the former Act vests the power of regulating police districts in the justices. In pursuance of this power police districts were, in 1849, constituted by resolution of the justices, approved of by the Secretary of State, and ever since that time the county had been divided into police districts, and general and local police rates had been assessed, and this arrangement had continued for forty years, and it may be fairly assumed that it has worked well. Then comes the Local Government Act, 1888, upon section 3 of which the present question mainly turns.

That section enacts that "there shall be transferred to the council of each county the administrative business transacted by the justices in sessions, comprised under various heads set forth, including "the assessing and levying of police rates," and the application of the expenditure thereof, &c. I cannot, however, suppose that it was intended to include the powers expressly given to the justices by the Police Act of 1840. If a transfer of these powers to the county council had been intended, there would surely have been some special reference to it in the Act. Moreover, we find that by section 9, sub-section (1), "all the powers, duties, and liabilities of the justices in quarter sessions, or out of sessions, as to the police shall vest in the standing joint committee of the justices and of the county council." I am of opinion, therefore, that these powers are vested in that committee, and that the question raised in the case must be decided in their favour.

ENO v. DUNN. (a.)

Trade-mark—Registration—Words calculated to deceive —"Fruit salt"—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 73.

The respondent applied to register a trade-mark, of which the words "Dunn's Fruit Salt Baking Powder" formed a conspicuous part. The appellant had for many years used the words "Fruit Salt" as his trade-mark for a powder for an effervescing drink, and opposed the application.

Held (Lords Halsbury and Morris dissenting), that the proposed words were calculated to deceive the public, that the registrar had a discretion whether to register or not under section 73 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, and should refuse were it is not clear that the public would not be misled.

Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Fry, L.JJ., Cotton, L.J., dissenting), reported 41 Ch. D. 439.

The respondent applied to register as a trade-mark a label representing a woman holding up a dish of cakes with the words "Dunn's Fruit Salt Baking Powder," "The Cook's Best Friend," and was opposed by the appellant.

The respondent thereupon took out a summons that the application might be proceeded with, the appellant opposing on the ground that the use of the term "fruit salt," as proposed by the respondent, was calculated to deceive.

The evidence and proceedings generally are stated in the judgments. Kay, J., dismissed the respondent's application, but this decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

June 19.—Lord HALSBURY, C.—I am unable to concur in the view entertained by the majority of your lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was wrong. I think that court put the right construction upon the 73rd section of the statute, the section upon which, I believe, we are all agreed the question must turn, and, indeed, I do not see that any difference of opinion exists among us as to that construction; but while I agree that no absolute right to the registration of a trade-mark is given to an applicant for registration, the meaning and intent of the statute itself is that, unless for some of the reasons contemplated by the statute there is an objection to the registration, the trade-mark ought to be registered. Unless we are of opinion that there is something in the proposed trade-mark which the statute renders an objection to its registration, we ought to grant the application.

I think I may dismiss all other considerations here except the objection that the proposed trade-mark comes within that part of the 73rd section which enacts that it shall not be lawful to register, as part of, or in combination with the trade-mark, any words the exclusive use of which would, by reason of their being calculated to deceive or otherwise, be deemed disentitled to protection in a court of justice, or any scandalous design. Then, again, I may omit to consider the words "or otherwise," and the words "scandalous design," and confine myself to the consideration of the words "fruit salt." The trade-mark itself is free from all objection, unless these words make it objectionable. While the statute is wide enough to include within it any deceit, one must remember one is dealing with a trade-mark, and a deceit which is relevant to the subject-matter in debate is, as I understand, what is here insisted on. Could the comptroller refuse to register this trade-mark upon the ground that it so nearly resembled Mr. Eno's trade-mark, already on the register, as to be calculated to deceive a purchaser into believing that he was buying Mr. Eno's powder when he was buying Mr. Dunn's? It is only necessary to place them side by side to see the difference of them even as marks. A cook with a dish of baked confectionery, with Mr. Dunn's name very prominently exhibited as the maker of a baking powder, bears no resemblance, even the slightest, to Mr. Eno's Fruit Salt, or Fruit Saline, or Fruit Powder, surrounded by grape leaves and grapes. I must add, however, that no verbal description of the difference does entire justice to the dissimilarity of the two trade-marks. If Mr. Eno were to rely upon the section which I have quoted, he would be further met by the objection that the same goods, or description of goods, form essential words in the section, and a baking powder is not a powder for an effervescing drink, nor for a medicine. I accept the evidence as true that "fruit salt" is now only applied to Eno's Fruit Salt, since it is clear that, until Mr. Dunn sought to use the phrase, the words "fruit salt" only meant in shops where such articles were sold the "fruit salt, fruit saline, or fruit powder" which Mr. Eno sold; but it does not, therefore, follow that two ordinary words in the English language, though, I will assume, new in their combination, here become the property of Mr. Eno.

Apart from what Lindley, L.J., says upon this subject, though I do not disagree with him, so long as that combination of words was only applied to one thing, and that one thing was advertised as Mr. Eno's "fruit salt," the phrase would naturally mean Eno's Fruit Salt. But if it were applied to a baking powder, I cannot believe that anyone would either suppose he was buying an effervescing drink, or that Eno's Fruit Salt formed an ingredient in it. It is here, I believe, that the difference arises in the minds of some of your lordships. For my own part, I cannot conceive the possibility of an ordinary person supposing that the medicinal salt obtained from fruit by Mr. Eno was the same salt which Mr. Dunn used as a baking powder. It is the knowledge of the chemist, and not that of the ordinary person, which recognizes the bitartrate of potassa as the basis of both. At least three salts can be obtained from, and exist naturally in, fruit. Why, to the popular mind, should a baking powder obtained from fruit be the same salt as that which furnishes its medicinal qualities to Mr. Eno's effervescing drink? It is admitted that Mr. Eno has no right to the exclusive use of the words. It is admitted he has no patent right in the thing, and yet a trade-mark totally unlike Mr. Eno's must not be registered, because the exclusive use of the words in debate is calculated to deceive. I cannot think that is right. It may be true that the statute gives no right to the applicant to be registered, which is, in its nature, absolute. Indeed, where so much must be left to discretion and judgment, it could hardly do so; but I do not think that is of importance here, since it clearly means that if no such objections as it points at can be made to the registration, the comptroller ought to register, and we are now in the position of the comptroller, and ought to register, if these objections do not exist. I think they do not exist here, and, therefore, I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed.

Lord WATSON.—This appeal does not appear to me to raise any serious question in regard to the construction of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, but depends upon matters of fact, as to which opinions may differ. The statute nowhere confers an absolute right to register a trade-mark. The comptroller, by section 62, may, if he thinks fit, refuse to register, his refusal being subject to an appeal to the Board of Trade, who may either hear parties and decide whether, and subject to what conditions, if any, registration is to be permitted, or may refer the matter to the court for its determination.

Section 72 (2) prohibits the registration, with respect to the same goods or description of goods, of a trade-mark so nearly resembling a trade-mark already on the register, with respect to such goods or description of goods, as to be calculated to deceive. That provision is supplemented by the broader enactments of section 73, to the effect that "it shall not be lawful to register, as part of or in combination with a trade-mark, any words the exclusive use of which would, by reason of their being calculated to deceive or otherwise, be deemed disentitled to protection in a court of justice, or any scandalous design." These prohibitory clauses cast upon the applicant the duty of satisfying the comptroller, or the court, that the trade-mark which he proposes to register does not come within their scope. In an inquiry like the present, he does not hold the same position which he would have occupied if he had been defending himself against an action for infringement. There the onus of showing that his trade-mark was calculated to mislead rests, not on him, but upon the party alleging infringement; here he is in petitorio, and must justify the registration of his trade-mark by showing affirmatively that it is not calculated to deceive. It appears to me to be a necessary consequence that, in dubio, his application ought to be disallowed. I think the present case must be dealt with under the provisions of the 73rd section. If the use of the words "fruit salt" in the trade-mark, which the respondent asserts his right to register, would be calculated to deceive the public, such use is expressly forbidden by that clause. Whether it would or would not have a misleading effect is, according to my apprehension, the only question arising for decision. I do not think it necessary to refer to the evidence in detail. It appears to me to establish conclusively that, although the words "fruit" and "salt" are in common use wherever the English tongue is spoken, they have in combination no technical or scientific meaning, and, before the respondent entered the field, were never applied, in popular language, to any known substance other than the article manufactured and sold by the appellant under the name of Eno's Fruit Salt. That circumstance does not give the appellant a right of property in the words "fruit salt," or entitle him to use them, by themselves, in a registered trade-mark; but it is, nevertheless, a material circumstance in considering whether the use which the respondent proposes to make of them in his trade-mark would be calculated to mislead. I have come to the conclusion that the proposed use of the term "fruit salt" by the respondent might, and in many instances probably would, have the effect of deceiving the public.

It is no doubt said that the respondent's trade-mark is for a baking powder, to be used in the manufacture of bread, whereas the appellant's mark is for a powder to be used in producing an effervescing drink; and that there can be no risk of any member of the public confounding the two things. To a certain extent the criticism is well founded. I do not suppose that persons intending to bake would buy Eno's Fruit Salt, or that persons desiring to indulge in an aperient drink would invest in Dunn's Fruit Salt Baking Powder. But I do think that there would be a supposed connection between the two articles in the minds of many persons, who would naturally assume that the baking powder had been manufactured with the appellant's fruit salt, and purchase it in that belief; so that a batch of badly-made baking powder might seriously injure the credit of the effervescing powder. Having regard to the uncandid statements made by the respondent with respect to his selection of the words, I cannot avoid the conclusion that he adopted them, as they now stand in his trade-mark, with the deliberate purpose of obtaining pecuniary advantage from the wide reputation of the appellant's manufacture and the probability of purchasers connecting it with his own baking powder. I do not for a moment suggest that everybody would be misled. Skilled chemists and persons of intelligence who gave heed to the matter might incur no risk of error; but I cannot assume that these are the only classes who may be expected to purchase packets of baking powder and Eno's Fruit Salt.

It was argued that to give effect to these considerations would be equivalent to allowing the appellant to appropriate, as his own property, two words in common use. The argument appears to me to underrate the resources of the English language, which are, in my opinion, quite sufficient to enable anyone, honestly desirous of distinguishing his own goods, to use these words in a trade-mark in such a manner as to prevent any possibility of their being connected with the appellant's fruit salt. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed with costs and the order of Kay, J., restored, and I move accordingly.

Lord HERSCHELL.—This appeal arises out of an application made by the respondent on the 29th of June, 1887, to register a trade-mark, of which the words "fruit salt baking powder" formed a conspicuous element, although any right to the exclusive use of the words "fruit salt" was disclaimed. The appellant opposed the application on the ground that the proposed trade-mark was an infringement of a trade-mark registered by him, and also that it was calculated to deceive. On the 12th of April, 1888, the respondent took out a summons for an order directing the comptroller to proceed with his application. Kay, J., refused to make such an order, but the Court of Appeal reversed this decision, and ordered the comptroller to proceed. The judgment was that of the majority of the court, Cotton, L.J., dissenting.

It was not contended at the bar that the respondent's application to have the mark registered should be rejected on the ground that it was an infringement of the appellant's trade-mark. The only point insisted on was that it ought not to be registered because it was calculated to deceive. In order to appreciate the point it is necessary to bear in mind the facts which have been proved. I take it to be indisputable upon the evidence that prior to the appellant's use of the term "fruit salt" to describe the powder manufactured by him that expression had not been in use, either in scientific or popular nomenclature, as descriptive of any substance. The combination of words appears to have been adopted by him for the first time for the purpose of describing the powder he prepared and sold. Owing to his having extensively advertised it, "fruit salt" had, at the time the respondent applied for his trade-mark, come to be well known by the public, and was largely dealt in as an article of commerce. I can draw no other conclusion than that these two words if employed alone would then have been understood by the public and those engaged in trade as applying to the powder manufactured by the appellant. I am for the moment speaking only of the use of these words by themselves. I shall have to consider presently the effect of using them in combination with others. Fry, L.J., says that they are common English words, so collocated as to become descriptive, and that they convey to his mind an intelligible, if vague, notion similar to that derived from them by Mr. Clayton, the chemist—viz., that the preparation which Mr. Eno sold contained some ingredients derived from fruits. I have no doubt that this might well be so in the case of a person with some chemical knowledge; but I see no reason to think that the same idea would be conveyed to the minds of the public generally. I give credit to the evidence, which I see no reason to differ from, that the idea suggested by the words to those engaged in commerce, and to the public at large, would be Mr. Eno's powder, and that alone.

Assuming this to be so, the next question is, would the words, in the collocation in which they are found in the proposed trade-mark of the respondent—viz., Dunn's Fruit Salt Baking Powder—be calculated to deceive? I do not understand it to have been doubted that if this language would induce the public to believe that Eno's Fruit Salt Powder was an ingredient of the baking powder, or employed in its preparation, or that the appellant was connected with the manufacture of the baking powder, the proposed trade-mark would be open to objection. But it is said that there would be no danger of any such notion being acquired by the public; that an aperient medicine and a baking powder are such essentially different things that no one would imagine that the one could enter into the composition of the other. I think this is scarcely a fair statement of the case. Fruit salt is described in its registration under class 42, in which the respondent seeks to be registered, as "a dry preparation for making a non-intoxicating beverage," though it is true that it does possess slight aperient properties, and that the trade-mark is registered also in class 3, where the description of goods is "a proprietary medicine for human use." Nevertheless, the argument remains, and is, no doubt, deserving of serious attention. I may say at once that in my opinion the appellant has no exclusive property in the words "fruit salt," and if it were proposed so to employ them that no reasonable person could suppose that they had reference to the appellant's preparation, such a use would be perfectly unobjectionable. For example, I cannot conceive anyone imagining that a "fruit salt umbrella" was in any way connected with the article manufactured by Mr. Eno. And numberless similar illustrations might be given.

But I am unable to arrive at the conclusion that fruit salt and baking powder are of so essentially different a character that the one could not be supposed to enter into the composition of the other. The evidence appears to me to be cogent the other way. Two persons at least did, before this litigation was even contemplated, use Eno's Fruit Salt with success as baking powder. It not only occurred to them that this fruit salt might be so used, but they actually so employed it. I do not think the importance of this evidence was fully appreciated in the court below. It was said, I have no doubt truly, that the appellant had never advertised or sold his preparation as a baking powder, and that his powder and the respondent's were not likely to be sold the one for the other. But this does not, to my mind, dispose of the evidence. Seeing that "fruit salt" would mean, in the eyes of the public, the appellant's powder, and that it had occurred to people to use it for the purpose of baking, does it not seem highly probable that the words "fruit salt baking powder" would convey widely the idea that the appellant's powder was one of its principal ingredients? I cannot avoid the conclusion that it would, and that the proposed use of the words "fruit salt" would be calculated to deceive. But I do not think it is necessary to go so far as this. I think it is enough to say that I am not satisfied that there would be no reasonable danger of the public being so deceived.

The case was argued on behalf of the respondent as if he had an absolute right to have any trade-mark registered which was not proved to fall within the terms of either the 72nd or 73rd section of the Act. I do not so read the statute. Those sections prohibit the registration of a trade-mark in certain specified cases, but there is no duty cast upon the comptroller of registering every other trade-mark that may be applied for. On the contrary, whilst he is in certain cases prohibited from registering, a discretion, whether to register or not, appears to me to be in all other cases plainly conferred. Of course this discretion must be reasonably, and not capriciously, exercised; but it is, in my opinion, a reasonable exercise of it to refuse registration when it is not clear that deception might not result from it. To prevent misapprehension, I desire to add that your lordships have not now to determine whether the appellant could in any, and, if so, in what, cases restrain the use of the words "fruit salt." I have already indicated my opinion that the appellant has no private property in them. The sole point for decision is, whether the comptroller ought to be directed to proceed with the registration of a particular trade-mark of which they form an element.

For the reasons I have given I think he ought not, and that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—If it had not been for the difference of opinion to which this case has given rise I should have thought the question before your lordships tolerably free from difficulty. Ever since courts of equity have interfered to protect traders in the exclusive use of marks and words which they have lawfully appropriated for the purpose of distinguishing their goods, it has been an established principle that this protection is not to be extended "to persons whose case is not founded in truth." That is said to be a clear rule. Unfortunately, in the keen competition for business, a trader not unfrequently endeavours to attract custom by representing that the goods which he offers for sale are different in origin, composition, or character from what they really are. The public are constantly tempted to buy one thing when they think they are buying another. It is not, as has been observed, the province of the court to protect speculations of this kind. Between rival traders the application of the principle is necessarily a matter of extreme difficulty. But as between the innocent public and a trader seeking registration of a proposed trade-mark there is, I think, no room for hesitation or doubt. The statute allows any person to oppose an application for registration, whether he has or has not a personal interest in the result. It declares that it is not lawful to register as part of, or in combination with, a trade-mark any words the exclusive use of which would, by reason of their being calculated to deceive, be deemed disentitled to protection in a court of justice. It seems to me that in registering trade-marks the principle to which the enactment so plainly refers ought to be applied without any qualification whatever, and that the comptroller to whom in the first instance is committed the "discretionary power," as it is termed in the Act, of registering a trade-mark, ought to reject words which involve a misleading allusion or a suggestion of that which is not strictly true, as well as words which contain a gross and palpable falsehood. In the present case the evidence shows that the expression "fruit salt" has come to mean Mr. Eno's preparation, that at present it means nothing else, and that Mr. Eno's preparation is well known and very popular. Mr. Dunn adopts the expression "fruit salt," and gives it a prominent position among the words he seeks to register. I have no doubt that those words are calculated to deceive. They are calculated, and I think designed, to create confusion in the minds of those persons to whom Mr. Dunn's advertisements are addressed, and to lead the ordinary run of such persons to suppose that his baking powder is in some way or other connected with Mr. Eno's preparation. The object, I think, was, and if Mr. Dunn's application were successful the result I am convinced would be, in some cases at any rate, to induce people to buy under an impression not founded in truth, and not, perhaps, the less misleading because it is vague and indefinite, and it may be incapable of bearing the very slightest examination. Mr. Eno has not, and cannot have, any exclusive property in the expression "fruit salt." The words of which it is composed are common English words. Anybody may use them in any manner and in any connection he pleases, provided he takes care that the use to which they are applied is not calculated to deceive. The learned judges who were in favour of Mr. Dunn in the court below seem to have come to the conclusion that Mr. Dunn's object was to obtain the benefit of the celebrity which the name adopted by Mr. Eno has acquired, but that it was not his object to steal Mr. Eno's trade. So far I am disposed to agree; but I do not think that those propositions cover the real question. The question is one between Mr. Dunn and the public, not between Mr. Eno and Mr. Dunn.

It is immaterial whether the proposed registration is or is not likely to injure Mr. Eno in his trade. Equally immaterial, as it seems to me, is the fact that for a considerable time Mr. Eno had on the register as his trade-mark the words "fruit salt." Mr. Eno may have gained some advantage to which he was not properly entitled; but that is hardly a reason for permitting Mr. Dunn to practise a deception upon the public. I am of opinion that the decree under appeal ought to be reversed, and that the decision of Kay, J., ought to be restored.

Lord MORRIS.—I concur with the conclusion arrived at by the Lord Chancellor in this case. The facts necessary to recapitulate are: The appellant had caused to be registered the words "fruit salt" as a trade-mark. The label printed in the appendix to the case represents it thus: "Eno's Fruit Salt, Fruit Saline, or Fruit Powder, a dry preparation for making a non-intoxicating beverage." The respondent applied for registration of a trade-mark consisting of a label having thereon, "Dunn's Fruit Salt Baking Powder." A representation of the respondent's label is also set out in the appendix. Except that the two labels use the words "fruit salt," they could scarcely be more dissimilar. The appellant opposed the respondent's application upon two grounds—first, that the trade-mark proposed to be registered was an infringement of the appellant's trade-mark in using the words "fruit salt"; second, that the use of the term "fruit salt" was calculated to deceive.

The respondent, on the other hand, contended that the appellant had never been entitled to be registered in respect of the words "fruit salt" as a trade-mark. This contention was yielded to by the appellant, and he submitted to an order to remove the words off the register. The case is consequently out of the 72nd section of the Act of 1883, and is narrowed to one point—Is the respondent's use of the words "fruit salt" calculated to deceive within section 73? The respondent stated in his affidavits that he adopted the words "fruit salt" from a copy of "Brande's Manual of Chemistry." No such phrase is in the book, and I discredit the statement. The respondent obviously adopted the phrase from the appellant's use of it. The words "fruit salt" in connection are not per se calculated to deceive; for the baking powder has a main constituent, bitartrate of potassa, a salt contained in fruit. But, as I understand it, the appellant contends that buyers of the respondent's baking powder would believe, from the use of the words "fruit salt," that it was an adaptation of the appellant's so-called invention. This contention is, in my judgment, untenable. It appears to be founded on the assumption that the words "fruit salt" is a fancy phrase invented by the appellant, who has given evidence that none of the ingredients of his fruit salt were salts found in fruit. I can arrive at no other conclusion than that the use of the two words "fruit salt," words of ordinary English, when used in that connection, imply that there was a salt extract from fruit in the preparation, and I must act on my own understanding of the words "fruit salt, fruit saline, or fruit powder," as, in their ordinary signification, meaning that some salt extract from fruit formed an ingredient of "Eno's Fruit Salt Powder."

The appellant's contention is founded on a supposed invention of an arbitrary term or fancy phrase, "fruit salt"; whereas it appears to me to be the description of an ingredient of his powder, whether truly or untruly stated to be so. In my judgment this case stands thus: Eno advertises that he has a powder for producing an aperient drink of which salt derived from fruit enters into the preparation, while Dunn advertises that he has a powder for baking bread of which salt derived from fruit enters into the preparation. Why is Dunn suggesting anything deceptive in truly stating that his baking powder contains fruit salt, because that Eno had previously used the same words to convey that his aperient drink contained it? The appellant, however, has given evidence to prove that his fruit salt powder does not contain any ingredient of salt extracted from fruit, and, as I understand, relies upon that evidence to establish that the words "fruit salt" must be taken to denote only a fancy description of his preparation, and not a description of any of the ingredients of which it was composed. But, in the view I entertain, that argument would lead to this result, that Eno, from having deceived the public into the belief that his powder for making a drink contained salt derived from fruit, can now prevent Dunn from truly stating his powder for making bread contained it, because, forsooth, the catchwords "fruit salt," used to describe the ingredient in both compositions, may deceive a purchaser of these most dissimilar and different articles of consumption and use. To avoid so untenable a position the appellant resorts to what appears to me an extraordinary contention—namely, that his powder might be used for baking as a baking powder also, and that consequently his trade for baking purposes might be interfered with, and that persons who wanted "Eno's fruit-salt powder" to bake, might be deceived into buying Dunn's ditto. This argument wants a foundation in fact. It is true an archdeacon of Pietermaritzburg, when unable to obtain baking powder, states he used Eno's fruit salt for baking in 1877 and 1880, and apprised Eno of the fact; and the appellant's accountant states his wife had used it for four years past as a baking powder, and two other witnesses deposed to the same, on experiments made, I collect, after this action had commenced, as no date is given, and the experiments are stated to have been lately made: the same evidence could be given of the possible use of a seidlitz powder. Can it be gravely asserted that such a use of the aperient drinking powder could ever be an ordinary one, or that it was ever contemplated by Eno, or that he could or would adopt such a trade of his powder? He has never advertised or purported to sell it to bake bread. In my opinion there is nothing in the use by Dunn of the words "fruit salt," to deceive purchasers; and in deciding in favour of the appellant we should practically give him the exclusive right to use the words "fruit salt," though admittedly incapable of being registered by him as a trade-mark, to the exclusive use of which words he is not entitled.

I am of opinion the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

Order appealed from reversed, and judgment of Kay, J., restored, with costs here and below; cause remitted to the Chancery Division.

Bill of sale—Form in schedule—Repayment of principal and interest—Instalments—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 9.

By a bill of sale, dated the 26th of September, 1887, and given as security for an advance of £50 and interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per month, the grantor agreed that he would pay to the grantee the principal sum, together with the interest then due, as follows:—The sum of £2 10s. on the 26th of October, 1887, and the like sum of £2 10s. on the 26th of each and every succeeding month until the 26th of September, 1889; then the balance and interest as aforesaid was to be paid.

Held, that, upon the true construction of the bill of sale, the monthly payments of £2 10s. were in respect of interest only, and not of principal, and that the principal sum of £50 was not repayable until the 26th of September, 1889; and that the bill of sale so drawn was in accordance with the statutory form.

Held, further, that, apart altogether from its construction, the bill of sale was in accordance with the form, and was therefore valid.

Goldstrom v. Tallerman, 35 W. R. 68, 18 Q. B. D. 1, distinguished.

Appeal from the judgment of Charles, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was by the plaintiff, as grantee of a bill of sale, to recover damages for the conversion of a carriage assigned to him by the grantor. Subsequently to the execution of the bill of sale the grantor sold and delivered the carriage to the defendant.

The bill of sale, which was dated the 26th of September, 1887, assigned the chattels described in the schedule (including the carriage in question) by way of security for the repayment of an advance of £50, and interest thereon at the rate of £5 per cent. per month; and the grantor agreed that he would duly pay to the grantee "the principal sum aforesaid, together with the interest then due as follows: the sum of £2 10s. on the 26th day of October, 1887, and the like sum of £2 10s. on the 26th day of each and every succeeding month thereafter until the 26th day of September, 1889, then the balance and interest as aforesaid is to be paid."

Charles, J., held that the bill of sale was valid, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

J. A. Foote, for the defendant.—According to the language of Fry, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court in Goldstrom v. Tallerman, 35 W. R. 68, 18 Q. B. D. 1, the instalments mentioned in the statutory form mean instalments of principal, and not of interest. But these twenty-four monthly instalments taken together amount to more than the £50 advanced. Therefore the instalments must include some interest, or else the sum repaid would be the £50 advanced, plus £10, together with interest at the rate of five per cent. per month. It is impossible to tell how much is for interest and how much for principal, and therefore it is impossible to tell what the final instalment will be. The monthly payments of £2 10s. cannot be in respect of interest only, as the words "the balance and interest as aforesaid" show that the whole principal cannot be repayable then. "Balance" assumes that part of the principal has been repaid. According to the form the equal instalments must be principal, and the interest is then calculated and payable in addition. This bill of sale is therefore void as not being in accordance with the form.

He referred to Hazlewood v. Consolidated Credit Company, ante, p. 54, 25 Q. B. D. 555; Davis v. Burton, 32 W. R. 423, 11 Q. B. D. 537.

Cock, Q.C., and Crispe, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question in this case is whether the bill of sale is void as not being in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. The objection to the validity of the bill of sale is directed to the mode in which the payments are described to be made. The bill of sale is in printed form, with certain blanks left in it to be filled in in writing. The bill of sale, so far as the printed part is concerned, exactly follows the form in the schedule to the Act. Does it, then, depart from the form as regards the part in writing? The form states that "A. B. doth further agree and declare that he will duly pay to the said C. D. the principal sum aforesaid, together with the interest then due, by equal payments of £ on the day of [or whatever else may be the stipulated times or time of payment]." The part in brackets is an alternative mode of repayment. The form may therefore be read thus: The principal sum aforesaid, together with the interest then due, at the stipulated times or time of payment. The payment, therefore, in my opinion, need not be by equal instalments. The present bill of sale follows the form exactly until the mode of repayment is specified. The repayment is to be by £2 10s. on the 26th of each month—that is to say, the times of each payment are specified—until the 26th of September, 1889, when the balance and interest is to be paid. That seems to me to be in accordance with the very terms of the form. If that is so, the construction to be placed upon the words is immaterial to the present point. The bill of sale, therefore, being in accordance with the form, there is no use trying to pick holes in it. But if I do go into the construction of the bill of sale, I am prepared to say that the language used by Fry, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court in Goldstrom v. Tallerman, as to an instalment covering principal only and not interest, was applicable to that particular case, and was not intended to be of general application. Charles, J., thought that £2 10s. included some part of the £50 principal. I cannot agree with him in that interpretation. It seems to me that the language of this bill of sale is perfectly clear. It means that the loan of £50 is not to be repaid until the end of the two years, and that the interest alone is to be paid in the interval. The payment of £2 10s. per month for two years does not make up the sum of £50, but it exactly covers the five per cent. per month on the £50. The true construction of the bill of sale, therefore, is that the loan of £50 is not to be repaid for two years, the interest at five per cent. per month on the £50, which is exactly £2 10s. a month, being in the meanwhile paid. Though that is not expressly stated in the bill of sale, it seems to me to be a necessary implication from it. The bill of sale, therefore, is exactly in accordance with the form, and is perfectly good.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree that this bill of sale is in accordance with the form. The true construction of it seems to me to be this: The grantee lends £50 to the grantor for two years, and the grantor agrees to pay to the grantee five per cent. per month for the loan. That seems to me to be aptly expressed in this bill of sale. The monthly payments of £2 10s. correspond with the interest at five per cent. per month on £50. The bill of sale exactly follows the form. Goldstrom v. Tallerman was a different case from this, as there the total of the monthly sums exactly made up the principal sum.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Every word of the clause in the bill of sale before us is in strict accordance with the form except the last words, "then the balance and interest as aforesaid is to be paid," and those words can only be said to be not in accordance with the form because the form does not contain them. The first inquiry is, what is the sum of £2 10s. which is payable monthly? Is it principal or interest, or both? Now it is the exact amount of interest on £50 at five per cent. per month. It seems to me that no one can doubt that it was intended as a payment in the ordinary way between mortgagor and mortgagee in respect of interest. I entirely agree with the other members of the court as to the construction of the bill of sale. The interest, therefore, on the £50 is to be paid each month for two years. What, then, is the meaning of the words, "then the balance and interest as aforesaid is to be paid"? At that time—that is, at the twenty-fourth month—there would be the principal sum of £50 due and one month's interest, assuming that all the payments had been regularly kept up. Why should not this principal sum be called "the balance"? The bill of sale was given as security for principal and interest. If the interest has been duly paid, the principal is "the balance." No doubt the bill of sale does not say "the £50 and interest," but that may be for this reason. By agreement between the parties, part of this sum might have been paid back before the expiration of the two years. The balance might, therefore, not amount to the sum of £50, and that seems to me a good reason for using the word "balance." But even if no part of the £50 had been paid off in the interval, there seems to me no difficulty in describing this sum as the balance, the bill of sale being given as security for principal and interest. It is said, however, that by reason of the decision in Goldstrom v. Tallerman we are precluded from construing the bill of sale thus. It was urged that that case laid down a hard and fast rule that the instalments must include principal only. I cannot bring myself to see that that is the effect of the judgment in Goldstrom v. Tallerman. I should require very much more consideration before I came to the conclusion that that case decided any such thing. In my opinion this bill is in accordance with the form, and is, therefore, valid.

Appeal dismissed.

DARLINGTON WAGON AND ENGINEERING CO. (LIMITED) v. HARDING AND OTHERS. (a.)

Arbitration—Action—Order of reference by consent of "all matters in difference"—Setting aside award—Jurisdiction of court—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 14, 15.

An action having been brought to recover certain instalments due in respect of work done under a contract, upon an application for judgment under order 14, other instalments having become payable under the contract, an order was made by consent that "all matters in difference between the parties" should be referred to the award of an arbitrator.

The arbitrator having made his award, the defendants moved to set it aside, contending that, under section 15 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, the award was equivalent to the verdict of a jury.

Held, by the Queen's Bench Division, that section 15 did not affect the finality of an award, and that the application must be refused.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that as the order of reference was of "all matters in difference between the parties," section 15 was not applicable; and the award could not be set aside in the same way as the verdict of a jury.

Application by the defendants to set aside, vary, or remit an award made by an arbitrator.

An action was brought to recover £3,969, instalments due for work done under a contract for the construction of a pier. Upon an application for judgment under order 14, other instalments having become due since the date of the writ, an order was made by consent on the 10th of December, 1889, referring "all matters in difference between the parties" to the award of an arbitrator. The order of reference was made in a form somewhat similar to the form No. 33 in App. K. in the Annual Practice, 1890-91. The first meeting took place before the arbitrator on the 10th of January, 1890, and subsequently a supplemental agreement was made, including matters in difference arising under the contract since the order of reference. The arbitrator made his award in favour of the plaintiffs for £10,064, and the defendants moved to set it aside, contending that under section 15 of the Arbitration Act, 1889 (which came into operation on the 1st of January, 1890) the award was equivalent to the verdict of a jury, and could be set aside accordingly.

Nov. 1.—Jelf, Q.C., and W. S. Robson, for the plaintiffs, took the preliminary objection that the award of the arbitrator was a final decision and could not be appealed from on the ground of its being wrong in law or in fact.

J. E. Bankes, for one of the defendants.—The award of an arbitrator is open to appeal, because by section 15, sub-section 2, it is "equivalent to the verdict of a jury." This was so decided in Longman v. East, 26 W. R. 183, 3 C. P. D. 142, in regard to a reference to an official referee under section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873. Brett, L.J., says on p. 155—"I think the appeal is of the same nature as the appeal from the finding of a judge when he tries without a jury, or as the appeal from the finding of a jury; that is to say, the court must accept the finding of the referee unless they can set it aside, according to the ordinary rules which would be applicable to the finding of a jury or to the finding of a judge trying a cause without a jury." That is, for improper reception of evidence and misdirection, or a finding against the weight of evidence. The words in section 58 of the Judicature Act, 1873, are "the report of any referee upon any question of fact on any such trial shall (unless set aside by the court) be equivalent to the verdict of a jury." The words in sub-section 2 of section 15 of the Arbitration Act are: "The report or award of any official or special referee or arbitrator on any such reference shall (unless set aside by the court or a judge) be equivalent to the verdict of a jury." An award is put on the same footing as a report was under the earlier Act, and the right of appeal must be the same.

R. M. Bray, for the other defendants.

DAY, J.—When section 15 of the Arbitration Act was first called to my attention in this case I was disposed to attribute to it more importance than I now think it deserves. The words, "shall be equivalent to the verdict of a jury," do not in my opinion affect the finality of an award at all. The finality of an award has so long been established that if the Legislature meant to alter it it would have done so in plain terms. The words must mean equivalent to the verdict of a jury for other purposes, but I cannot believe that they were intended to make any change as to the finality of awards, which would destroy the great and undoubted boon of arbitrations. It would be intolerable, I think, if great trials of a technical character, which had been determined by an arbitrator specially selected for his competency to deal with the matters involved, could be reopened. I cannot, therefore, believe that that is the result. The case of Longman v. East is not important here, because that refers to the award of an official referee upon questions or issues referred to him in a cause, and such an award was never intended to be final. I do not think an arbitration when the whole cause has been referred to some person agreed upon by both parties is placed on the same footing. When the Master of the Rolls is speaking of a reference, he is speaking of a reference by order of a judge, that is a reference for the benefit of a judge, the award in which was not intended to be final. The words in sub-section 2 of section 15 were not intended to affect the question of finality, and I am of opinion that the preliminary objection is fatal, and that we are not at liberty to investigate whether the arbitrator was wrong in law or in fact.

LAWRANCE, J.—I entirely agree.

The defendants appealed.

Nov. 24.—Finlay, Q.C., and J. E. Bankes, for one of the defendants.—By section 25 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, this reference comes within the provisions of the Act. The order of reference comes within section 14 of the Act. It is an order made in an action, and therefore comes within section 14 as an order made "in any cause or matter." Where the parties consent to refer the cause plus something else, it is still an order referring the cause or matter. Therefore section 14 is applicable, and by section 15 the award is equivalent to the verdict of a jury. Further, section 15 is larger than section 14. It deals with any reference "in" any cause or matter, not "of" any cause or matter. This order was headed in the action. It was, therefore, made in the cause.

They cited Clark v. Sonnenschein, 38 W. R. 743, 25 Q. B. D. 464.

R. M. Bray, for the other defendants.

Jelf, Q.C., and W. S. Robson, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The order of reference in this case was made before the Arbitration Act, 1889, came into operation, but I shall assume that the Act is applicable to this case. The question, then, is whether this order of reference comes within sections 14 or 15 of the Act of 1889. Section 14 provides that "in any cause or matter" the judge may order "the whole cause or matter, or any question or issue of fact arising therein," to be tried by a special referee or arbitrator. Could this order have been made under that section? There was a cause here, but the order does not merely refer the whole cause, or any question or issue of fact arising therein, but refers "all matters in difference between the parties." It is made by consent, and is much larger than could have been made under section 14. If this order of reference is to be considered as made under section 14, the judge would have exceeded his jurisdiction. It is, therefore, not such an order of reference as could have been made under section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. Then could this order have been made under section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873? That section provides for an order of reference in any cause or matter "of any question or issue of fact or any question of account arising therein." There again the reference must be of some question in the cause or matter, and this order is larger than a judge could have made under that section. The order, therefore, was not and could not have been made either under section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873, or under section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. It is clear that it was a good order of reference, but it was made under the general authority of the judge derived from the consent of the parties. The whole validity of the order was derived from the consent of the parties. It was said, however, that the order of reference came within section 15 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. That section deals with cases of reference "in any cause or matter," and provides, inter alia, that the award of the arbitrator "on any such reference shall, unless set aside by the court or a judge, be equivalent to the verdict of a jury." It is clear to my mind that section 15 is a mode provided for carrying out references under section 14. It does not apply to references not made under the Act at all. But further still. It is obvious on looking at the order that the parties intended to bring themselves within the general consent jurisdiction of the judge, inasmuch as they have given to the arbitrator all sorts of powers which otherwise would not have been necessary.

Upon these grounds I have come to the conclusion that this order of reference was not made under the Arbitration Act, 1889. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LOPES, LJ.—I am of the same opinion. This order refers "all matters in difference between the parties." Such an order could not have been made under section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873, nor can it now be brought within sections 14 or 15 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. Sections 57 and 58 of the Judicature Act, 1873, have been repealed, but they have been re-enacted in substance by sections 14 and 15 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. There was always power to refer by consent any differences that the parties might desire. The present order was founded solely upon consent, and does not derive its efficacy from sections 14 or 15 of the Act of 1889.

KAY, L.J.—I agree. Both section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, provide for two things—a reference by consent, and a reference without consent. But in each case the subject-matter to be referred is the same—namely, something arising in any cause or matter. Take, first, section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873. It provides for the reference in any cause or matter of "any question or issue of fact or any question of account arising therein." So, too, section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, provides for the reference in any cause or matter of "the whole cause or matter, or any question or issue of fact arising therein"; and section 15 also deals with such a case. It is clear to me that the judge could not have made this order under section 14, whether with or without the consent of the parties. Under that section he could only have made an order referring the whole action or some question or issue of fact arising therein. This order operates, no doubt, to stay the action, but it derives its whole validity and efficacy from the consent of the parties.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MORGAN. (a.)

Royal mine—Gold mine—Crown rights to—Gold mixed with other metals—Right to work—1 W. & M. c. 30, ss. 3, 4—5 W. & M. c. 6, ss. 2, 3—55 Geo. 3, c. 134.

All gold mines in the United Kingdom are royal mines, and cannot be worked without a licence from the Crown.

A mine substantially worked for gold, though the gold is mixed with other metals, is a gold mine.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought on behalf of the Crown by the Attorney-General to restrain the defendant, Mr. Pritchard Morgan, M.P., from raising, working, or getting, and from selling or removing from the Gwynfynydd Mine, near Dolgelly, Merionethshire, and from other lands in the same county, any gold or gold ore, or quartz, or other substances containing gold or silver, the produce of the said mine or lands, without the licence of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and for an account of such as had been already obtained, and payment of the value thereof.

The defendant in 1887 obtained a lease of Gwynfynydd Mine for thirty years from the 29th of September, 1887, from the freeholder, subject to the rights of the Crown.

Some gold had been obtained by a company from the land and royalties paid, but the working had been abandoned as unprofitable some time prior to the defendant obtaining possession.

The defendant for a short time after commencing mining operations obtained gold in considerable quantities.

In January, 1888, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests applied to the defendant for an account of the gold raised and payment of a royalty, and a correspondence ensued, resulting in the issue of the writ in this action on the 26th of April, 1888. In May, 1888, an interlocutory injunction was granted. In June, 1888, the defendant issued the prospectus of the Morgan Gold Mining Co. (Limited), which was incorporated for the purpose of taking over the Morgan Gold Mine, near Dolgelly, and stated, amongst other things, that a royalty not exceeding one-thirtieth of the gross yields would be payable to the Crown, and giving favourable reports as to the yield of gold.

The freeholder obtained a licence from the Crown and assigned it to the company, under which they had since worked. The defendant refused the offer of the commissioners to stay proceedings on his payment of costs, and insisted on contesting the Crown's right to royalties, alleging that the Crown had only a right of pre-emption. The action, therefore, came to trial.

Sir R. Webster, A.G., Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the plaintiff.—The right of the Crown to all gold mines is incontestable: The Queen v. Earl of Northumberland, 1 Plow. 310; and where it is mixed with other metal, prior to the Acts of William and Mary, the whole belonged to the Crown: see s.c., pp. 336, 336a. The Acts of William and Mary were passed to enable mines of iron, tin, copper, and lead, to be worked without being liable to be claimed as royal mines because some trifling amount of gold was found in them, and they enabled the Crown to retain the gold and buy the baser metal from the subject: 2 Stephen's Commentaries, 9th ed., 552. If the mine is really worked for gold it is a gold mine. The defendant's is such a mine.

Mr. Morgan in person.—The Acts of William and Mary deprive the Crown of ownership, and grant instead a mere right of pre-emption at a fixed price. It is not limited to mines of iron, tin, copper, and lead, but applies to ores which contain these metals: 55 Geo. 3, c. 134. The Crown has refused to purchase the ores, and has no right to a royalty.

Wilkinson held a watching brief for the company.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., in reply.

NORTH, J.—The only question which I have to decide is by whom the costs of this action are to be borne, as the defendant has disposed of his mine to a company, who have a licence from the Crown and pay a royalty. I must, however, in order to arrive at a conclusion, consider the points in dispute. The existence of royal mines in this country for a long period is undoubted, and the fact that there is gold in Merionethshire has long been known, and various adventurers have from time to time sought gold, but, apparently, without much financial success. Among such workings have been the Gwynfynydd Mine, and the defendant, in a letter in April, 1888, says that the mine has been worked for a long period. In the years 1864-5 various small sums were paid by the then proprietors for royalties to the Crown.

In October, 1887, the defendant appears to have taken a lease of the mine from the owner of the farm on which it is situate, subject to the rights of the Crown and to a rent; and he thereupon worked them, and provided the necessary plant at considerable cost.

The Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods and Forests appear to have written to him claiming the Crown royalty and asking for accounts in January, 1888, and a considerable correspondence ensued, during which a claim to a royalty of one-thirtieth was made, and a request for information as to whether the defendant was prepared to apply for a licence. In March, 1888, the defendant applied for a licence for a year, and he also paid some royalty that was due. In April the commissioners informed the defendant that he had no authority to remove the gold or silver from the mine, and that, unless he gave an undertaking not to remove it, steps would have to be taken to stop him; and after further correspondence the writ in this action was issued on the 26th of April, and an injunction granted by me on the 4th of May. Two agreements have been put in by which the mine was transferred to the company, which was formed in May, 1888, and also the prospectus. Now the defendant is responsible for the prospectus, and it is, therefore, evidence against him. I come to the conclusion, on the whole of the evidence, that this is undoubtedly a gold mine. There is no record of gold having been found absolutely pure, but the suggestion that this mine is worked for the baser metals is a fiction not borne out by the evidence. Now, as regards the law with respect to the Crown's rights in mines, no serious difficulty arises. Originally, it seems that the right to all mines was vested in the Crown, but that the right to get the baser metals was conceded to the subject except in certain portions of the kingdom. But the right to all gold found was originally and still is vested in the Crown. The defendant commented on the hardship to the subject, but the well-established right of the Crown is not contestable.

In the great case of mines, The Queen v. The Earl of Northumberland, it was decided that all mines of gold and silver belong to the Crown, and, moreover, nine out of the twelve judges who gave their opinions held that the base metal mixed with the gold, as well as the gold, belonged to the Crown. It was accordingly held that copper extracted from a copper mine belonged to the Crown, because it contained some gold. Three of the judges thought that if it were proved that the value of the copper exceeded that of the gold, it might not have been a royal mine; but this view has not been adopted, and on the facts in this case is not material. Subsequently, questions arose as to what proportions the metals should bear to each other to make it a royal mine, and in 1640-1 an opinion was expressed by fifteen eminent counsel that, although the gold or silver contained in the base metal of a mine in the lands of a subject be of less value than the base metal, yet if the gold or silver countervail the charge of refining it, or be of more worth than the base metal spent in refining it, this is a mine royal, and as well the base metal as the gold and silver in it belong to the prerogative of the Crown (see Bainbridge on Mines, 4th ed., p. 129), and this view seems to have entensively prevailed. As, however, it seriously impeded mining enterprize, two statutes were passed in the reign of William and Mary modifying the Crown's rights.

By 1 W. & M. c. 30, passed in the year 1688, after reciting a statute of 5 Hen. 4 made against the multiplying of gold and silver, and making it a felony, the Act was repealed, and provided by section 3 that all gold and silver should be taken to the Mint and bought at its true value for money. This section was subsequently repealed in 1867. The defendant says that this provision is inconsistent with the Crown's claim to a royalty. But, if apart from this section a royalty is due, this section does not relieve the owner from paying it. The 4th section of the Act provides "that no mine of copper, tin, iron, or lead shall hereafter be adjudged, reputed, or taken to be a royal mine, although gold or silver may be extracted out of the same." This clearly does not assist the defendant, as his mine is neither copper, tin, iron, or lead.

By 5 W. & M. c. 6, s. 3, the Crown is authorized to purchase the ore raised from royal mines at a certain fixed price, according to the baser metal with which it is mixed. And by a later statute—55 Geo. 3, c. 134—the price of pre-emption is, in the case of lead, altered. The defendant bases his principal argument on the second section of the later Act, and contends that, as it speaks of the proprietor of any mine wherein any ore is found in which there is copper, tin, iron, or lead, and authorizes him to work such ore; he claims the right to work his mine under this statute. I do not think this is the true construction. The earlier Act deals only with mines of copper, tin, iron, or lead, and does not refer to gold or silver mines or other metal. And from the preamble of the later Act we see that the owners of the mines referred to were the persons prejudiced by the existing state of things, and which the Act was passed to remedy. It is also noticeable that the Act is expressly stated to be for the better explanation of the former statute. The Act only applies to cases where gold or silver exists in the mine worked, and then affords protection to the workers. And trivial quantities of the named metals found in such mines of other metals would not bring their proprietors among the class of persons intended to be benefited by the Acts. In my opinion both Acts of William and Mary are intended to benefit the owners or proprietors of copper, tin, iron, or lead mines, and no other. The object of these Acts is to secure to the subject the copper, tin, iron, and lead found in his land, or the full values thereof, and at the same time to secure to the Crown all the gold and silver, if it chooses to take it, paying the value of the copper, tin, iron, or lead which accompany any of it. The defendant seeks to use these Acts for the purpose of appropriating for himself and his company without payment the gold and silver in their land which belongs to the Crown.

The whole contest in this case has arisen from the persistent endeavour of the defendant to prevent the application of part of the public revenue of the country to its legitimate purposes, and direct it into the pocket of himself and his fellow-shareholders, and he says it is against public policy that this attempt should be opposed. The Attorney-General has in this action been wholly right throughout, and I hold that the defendant must pay the costs of this action.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — July 19, 1890.

ASHWORTH v. ROBERTS. (a.)

In a patent action the plaintiff delivered interrogatories asking step by step whether the defendant had used, and to what extent, the process, or any part of it, described in the specification, and asking also the names of some of his customers. The defendant set up a plea of "secret process," objecting to answer the interrogatories, on the ground that the answer would disclose his secret.

Held, that the defendant could not, by pleading a secret process, claim to decline to refuse discovery as to how far, either alone or in combination with his own process, he had used the plaintiff's.

Semble, also, that the names of customers must be disclosed.

Motion.

This was a motion by George Ashworth and Elijah Ashworth as owners and patentees of a patent for "improvements in wire cards, and in the preparation and treatment of wire therefor, applicable wholly or in part in the treatment of wire for some other purposes." They had brought an action against the defendant, Godfrey Roberts & Son, a licensee, for an account of all card clothing manufactured, sold, supplied, or used by him under the licence, and payment of what might be found due.

The defendant denied user of the plaintiffs' invention. The plaintiffs thereupon delivered interrogatories asking whether he had manufactured or sold under their licence articles made under the plaintiffs' patent, and, if he denied such sale, asking him to describe the processes and apparatus used by him, and how they differed from the plaintiffs'. The defendant denied ever having manufactured or sold articles which had been subjected to the processes claimed, and moreover alleged that he had himself invented and used a different process, which was a secret, and that it would be unjust to force him to disclose it to a trade competitor such as the plaintiffs.

On the 22nd of May, 1890, the plaintiffs delivered a further set of interrogatories, going through their specification step by step, and asking (1) whether he used each particular process; (2) requiring the defendant to state whether, if he had ever used any of the said processes, he had in using or employing the same adopted the same means with the same object, and by the use of an apparatus made or arranged as described in the plaintiffs' specification; (3) whether at any time since the 1st of October, 1886, he had used any of the processes referred to in the first interrogatory as part of the process employed by him as stated in the former answer to interrogatories; (4) whether he had not sold or supplied steel wire, and tempered according to his process or apparatus to a particular customer, and asking the names and addresses of some of them; (5) asking him to state if he had since the 1st of October, 1886, used any of the plaintiffs' processes referred to in interrogatory, what steps or stages or additional steps he took in hardening wire according to his own process; (6) whether he had used any apparatus constructed as described in the specification; (7) whether the apparatus in fact used by him did not contain parts of the apparatus shown in the plaintiffs' specification.

The defendant refused to answer so much of the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 5th, 6th, and 7th interrogatories as had not been already answered by him, on the ground of his using a secret process, and further declined to give the names of any customers. This was a motion by the plaintiffs for a full and sufficient answer to these interrogatories.

Moulton, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the plaintiffs.—Setting up a secret process is no excuse to answering step by step the questions as to user of the plaintiffs' invention as described in his specification: Renard v. Levinstein, 10 L. T. N. S. 94, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 68, and Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Levinstein, 31 W. R. 913, 24 Ch. D. 156—169. The other information asked as to user is relevant as a point at issue.

Goodeve, for the defendant.—The process described in the plaintiffs' specification is an old one, the apparatus only is new. The defendant says he has invented another method which is secret, and he ought not to be compelled to divulge it, and before he can be called on to disclose the names of customers actual infringement must be proved. He has given all the information up to this stage which can properly be asked: De la Rue v. Dickinson, 3 K. & J. 388.

KEKEWICH, J.—Born and bred, so to say, in Chancery, I have a leaning towards the rule adopted by the Court of Chancery of requiring full discovery. But I have at the same time a great fear in this case lest a full discovery should cause disadvantage to the defendant, and I confess to being unwilling to direct answer after answer where I can avoid so doing.

In this case I am by no means satisfied that the plaintiffs are entitled to all the discovery asked; but, on the other hand, I think some discovery ought to be given, and none has been given. The present case seems to me to come within the old class of cases where a defendant, in answer to interrogatories, has given an insufficient answer, and has denied the bill to be true, "save as aforesaid," or, "except as appears by the other facts of the answer," and it has been held that the addition of the words "save as aforesaid," or "except as aforesaid," does not make the traverse sufficient: Tipping v. Clarke, 2 Hare, 388. I think that even on this ground the plaintiffs would succeed; but this, no doubt, is somewhat technical. The question raised by this case is not one of infringement by a tort feasor, but of account of a licensee, and I must decide on that footing. What is it that is material for a plaintiff to know to enable him to conduct his case properly at the trial? He is entitled to know under what circumstances and to what extent the defendant has used his process, and unless he has enough information to show whether it be or not worth while to proceed to trial, he has not got all the discovery which the rules say he is entitled to. It may be—I have no wish to settle the interrogatories or answer—but it may be that when the interrogatories come to be answered the defendant will be able to show some ground for refusing to give the full discovery asked. But still he must say to what extent he has used the plaintiffs' process. The plaintiffs, in the first instance, asked whether he used their process by reference to the claiming part of their specification. That user being denied, and the plea of secret process being set up, the plaintiffs go into more detail and refer to the text of their specification.

That is a document which may require much interpretation, and in respect of which difficulties of construction may arise. Nevertheless, the plaintiffs are entitled to deliver these interrogatories so long as they are not oppressive, and so long as they do not compel the defendant to disclose his secret process. I agree that the mere plea of secret process does not preclude an answer to interrogatories, but the interrogatories must not be used so as to put unfair pressure on the party interrogated. With reference to the discovery of customers' names, Mr. Goodeve relies on De la Rue v. Dickinson, a leading authority, which was decided in 1857. The marginal note is as follows:—"When plaintiff's right to relief at the hearing is clear, assuming the title stated by his bill, defendant, by his answer denying that title, is, in certain cases, protected from discovery immaterial to that question, and which, when that question is decided, would be given under the decree." That is a fair epitome of the decision; but does not apply immediately and fully to an action like this—it does not follow that in an action for account by a patentee against his licensee, a licensee denying user is entitled to refuse to give discovery as to user because the question of user is material whether the account is to be given at all.

An order must be made in the terms of the notice of motion, the plaintiffs to have the costs in any event.

REG. v. COLONEL BYRDE AND OTHERS (JUSTICES) AND THE PONTYPOOL GAS CO. (a.)

Justices—Discretion—Declining jurisdiction—Dismissal of summons—Refusal to hear application for second summons—Mandamus.

Upon an application for a summons for penalties for which a company were liable under an Act of Parliament at a certain rate per week for every week during which a certain reservoir remained uncompleted, the justices refused to hear the application, on the ground that a summons for an offence of the same kind had previously been taken out by the present prosecutor and dismissed, as, in the opinion of the justices, the offence was not a continuing offence, and it had been completed more than six months before the date of the summons, and the claim was therefore barred by section 11 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 (Jervis's Act).

Held, that the justices were wrong in declining to hear the application, and that a mandamus ought to go directing them to hear the application and determine whether, upon the facts, a summons ought or ought not to be granted.

Rule for a mandamus to the justices of Monmouthshire, directing them to hear and determine the matter for the issuing of a summons.

The Pontypool Gas and Water Co. had obtained in the year 1873 an Act of Parliament called the Pontypool Gas and Water Act, 1873, and by section 47 of this Act the company were, within two years and six months after the passing of the Act (the 26th of May, 1873), to complete, to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade, a certain reservoir, and if the company should fail within that period to complete the reservoir, "then the company shall be liable to a penalty of £20 a week for every week after the expiration of the period so limited until the said reservoir is completed as aforesaid."

In the year 1880 the prosecutor had issued a summons for penalties under this section, the reservoir being still uncompleted; but on the hearing of this summons the justices were of opinion that the offence created by the section was not a continuing offence, and that the right to the penalties began to run from the date when the reservoir ought to have been constructed—that is, the 26th of November, 1875—and that as more than six months had elapsed since that date, the prosecutor's right to sue for such penalties was barred by the six months' limitation in section 11 of Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43). They accordingly dismissed the summons on that ground, but they offered to state a case, which the plaintiff declined, and no appeal was brought against that decision of the justices.

The prosecutor subsequently, in the year 1882, brought an action to recover these penalties under the section, but this action was dismissed, and judgment in the action given against the prosecutor, on the ground that he had misconceived his remedy as—the claim being one for penalties—an action was not the appropriate remedy, and this decision against the prosecutor was upheld by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords.

The prosecutor then, in May, 1890, the reservoir being at that date uncompleted, applied to the justices to issue another summons, but they refused to entertain the matter at all, on the ground that they had already, on the former occasion in 1880, disposed of the whole matter, and that they had no jurisdiction in the case, and they refused to hear the application for a summons, and refused to issue a summons.

The section of the Act was in force until July, 1890, when it was repealed by an Act of Parliament, but before that repeal the prosecutor obtained the present rule for a mandamus directing the justices to hear and determine the application for the issuing of a summons.

Ram, for the justices, showed cause.—The whole matter had been disposed of in the former summons in 1880, so that the justices had no jurisdiction to entertain the matter at all, and they were, therefore, right in refusing to hear the application or issue a summons. The prosecutor had a chance of appealing against the decision of the justices on the former occasion, as the justices offered to state a case, but the prosecutor declined to proceed with the appeal, and he cannot now apply for a fresh summons. The offence here was not a continuing offence, and the claim for these penalties was barred by the six months' limitation in Jervis's Act, as the time began to run from the 26th of November, 1875, when the reservoir ought to have been completed. Moreover, this reservoir was completed to the satisfaction of the surveyor to the Board of Trade.

A. T. Lawrence, for the company, also opposed the rule.

Ruegg, in support of the rule.—The justices here refused to hear the application on one ground and one ground only—namely, that they had already adjudicated upon the matter. The section in Jervis's Act only applies when the private Act is silent as to limitation. Here sections 145—151 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), are incorporated with the private Act, and by section 151 of that Act, which is the only section that applies, the words are, unless the complaint shall have been made "within six months next after the commission of such offence." These words mean after the end or completion of the offence; here the offence was a continuing offence, and the six months' limitation does not apply: Mayer v. Harding, 17 L. T. N. S. 140, 16 W. R. C. L. Dig. 90; Reg. v. West Riding Justices, 6 B. & S. 803. On the authority of these cases the justices were clearly wrong in holding that there was no continuing offence, and that the limitation applied; they were wrong in refusing to entertain or hear the application at all, and this rule ought to be made absolute.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 20.—The judgment of the COURT was read by WILLIAMS, J.—We are of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. The ground upon which the justices refused the summons was that a summons for an offence of the same nature had been taken out by the present prosecutor in 1880, and dismissed on the ground that the offence alleged had been completed more than six months before the date of the summons, and that, therefore, they had no jurisdiction to go into the matter again. It appears from the affidavit of the clerk to the justices that after the hearing of the complaint in 1880 the justices, at the instance of the prosecutor, consented to state a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, raising the question whether the non-completion of the reservoir by the 26th of November, 1875, the time limited by the special Act, was an offence which was complete at that date—namely, a date more than six months before the date of the summons, or whether it was an offence continuing in each week that the non-completion continued. It further appeared by his affidavit that the prosecutor failed to take up that case, and thus acquiesced in the validity of the decision of the justices.

The question, then, we have now to decide is whether that previous decision was a sufficient ground for the refusal of the justices to issue the present summons. Now, generally speaking, if on application for a summons for an indictable offence they have heard and determined the application, and on the merits have declined to grant it, the court will not grant a mandamus to compel them to review their decision.

Secus, if they have refused to hear the application, or if, after hearing, have refused to grant it from a mistaken view of their duty, amounting to a declining of jurisdiction: Reg. v. Fawcett, 19 L. T. N. S. 396, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 71. The justices, however, must have declined jurisdiction. This court cannot review the discretion of the justices if the justices have really and bonâ fide exercised that discretion, although the judgment of the justices may be wrong in law or in fact as to whether a legal offence has been made out.

This seems to be the outcome of the decisions, and in particular of Reg. v. Adamson, 24 W. R. 250, 1 Q. B. D. 201, and Ex parte Lewis, 37 W. R. 13, 21 Q. B. D. 191. Blackburn, J., in his judgment in the former case, points out that the words in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 9, "if they shall think fit," show that the justices have a discretion, and that the mandamus in that case was granted expressly upon the ground that the justices had not exercised a discretion. The justices may, however, it would seem, in the exercise of their discretion, refuse to issue a summons, even though there is evidence before them of an alleged indictable misdemeanour, if they consider that the issue of the summons would be vexatious or improper: see Reg. v. Ingham, 14 Q. B. 396—the only question for the court upon the application for a mandamus being, have, or have not, the justices exercised their discretion honestly in refusing to issue the summons. In the present case, however, it appears from the affidavit of the clerk to the justices that they had not exercised any discretion; they have simply declined jurisdiction. We think, further, that the justices were wrong in declining jurisdiction, and we think, therefore, that a mandamus must go directing them to consider the evidence and decide whether a summons ought or ought not to issue. We do not mean by this decision in any way to conclude the question as to whether a summons ought to issue, but merely to direct the justices, instead of declining jurisdiction, to hear and determine whether, upon the circumstances disclosed to them, a summons ought now to issue. In the case of The Queen v. Mayor of Wisbeach, 7 Times Rep., p. 21, the court refused a mandamus to direct justices to issue a summons, the justices in their discretion having refused a summons, on the ground, however, that one summons had already been issued and disposed of.

Under these circumstances the rule, as I have said, will be made absolute, but without costs.

Rule absolute.

DIX (Appellant) v. KENT AND ANOTHER (Respondents). (a.)

Election law—Parliament—Registration of voters—Disqualifying alms—Alms-person—Reform Act, 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45), s. 36.

On an objection made to a voter that he had received disqualifying alms during the qualifying period, it was proved that the voter was, during the whole of the period, an alms-person of a certain hospital; that, as such alms-person, he received a weekly allowance of ten shillings and washing, and occupied a plot of ground assigned to him by the trustees of the charity; that the alms-persons were elected from poor persons of good character; that they could not be absent from the almshouse without the consent of the trustees; and that they were liable to be removed at the discretion of the trustees for certain causes.

Held, that such alms-persons had received disqualifying alms within the meaning of section 36 of the Reform Act, 1832, and were not entitled to be registered as voters.

Appeal from the revising barrister of the city of Gloucester.

The appellant was entered on the list of freemen entitled to vote in the election of a member to serve in Parliament. His place of abode was stated to be St. Bartholomew's Hospital. Notice of objection was served by the respondent upon the appellant, on the ground "that he had received disqualifying alms during the twelve months ending July 15 last."

The appellant was thirteen years ago elected, and has since continued, and still is, an alms-person of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, in the city of Glocester, and as an alms-person he has, during the whole of that time, occupied gratuitously and resided in a room in the hospital assigned to him by the trustees, and has received a weekly allowance of 10s. in addition to washing and half a ton of coals every Christmas He had also a separate plot of garden-ground behind the hospital assigned to him by the trustees.

By the scheme approved by the Charity Commissioners for the management of the hospital the alms-persons are to be elected from poor deserving men and women of good character who have not, during the period of three years next preceding their appointment, been in receipt of parochial relief. No alms-person was to be absent from the almshouse, which was the hospital, for a period exceeding twenty-four hours without consent in writing of the trustees, and any alms-person can be removed from the hospital by the trustees for certain specified causes.

No evidence was given that the appellant had any other means of subsistence than the allowance from the hospital, and it was taken that he had no other means of subsistence.

The revising barrister thought the case governed by the cases of Baker v. Town Clerk of Monmouth, 34 W. R. 64, and Edwards v. Lloyd, 20 Q. B. D. 302, 36 W. R. Dig. 75, and was distinguishable from Smith v. Hall, 12 W. R. 172, 15 C. B. N. S. 485, on which the appellant relied, and he decided that the appellant, as an alms-person of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, had been, and was, receiving alms such as to disqualify him from being registered as a voter.

Ashton Cross, for the appellant, cited the cases already mentioned and the case of Harrison v. Carter, 25 W. R. 182, 2 C. P. D. 26, and contended that in cases of exclusion from the franchise there was the disqualification that the persons were not able to maintain themselves by their own exertions, which was not shown to be so in the present case, and he contended that the case came within the principle of Smith v. Hall.

F. Stroud, for the respondents.

GRANTHAM, J.—In this case we are constrained to agree with the decision of the revising barrister. I connot get over the circumstance that these alms-persons depended on the goodwill of the trustees for their position in the hospital. We have to consider whether the present case falls within the principle of Edwards v. Lloyd, Baker v. Town Clerk of Monmouth, and Harrison v. Carter, which were cases of exclusion from the franchise. We think that it does fall within the principle of those cases. In the scheme of the Charity Commissioners one element taken into account was that persons qualified for election should not be able to maintain themselves by their own exertions; and not only so, but there are provisions of the scheme which seem to leave the alms-persons dependent on the will and discretion of the trustees.

Under those circumstances we think we are bound to uphold the decision of the revising barrister, and exclude these persons from the franchise.

SHOWERS AND OTHERS v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE CHELMSFORD POOR LAW UNION. (a.)

Poor rate — Rateability — Residences of police—Police station.

Buildings and premises surrounded by one wall consisted of residences occupied by officers of the county police and of stores, stabling, and a parade ground used for police purposes. The whole was vested (under the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1888) in a joint committee of county justices and county councillors.

Held, that the premises were not a police station, and were liable to be rated for the relief of the poor.

Special case stated for the opinion of the court.

The material facts stated in the case were as follows:—

The appellants were Edward McLean Showers, chief constable of the county of Essex, the deputy chief constable, a superintendent, and a sergeant of police, all of whom resided in buildings called Springfield Court, in the parish of Springfield, and Union of Chelmsford, in the county of Essex.

On the 18th of October, 1889, a poor rate for the said union was made by the overseers of the poor of the parish of Springfield, in which the appellants were severally rated in respect of property, described as "House" or "House and Garden," "Springfield Court."

The appellants objected to these rates on the ground that the premises were not rateable, as they considered the buildings occupied as aforesaid were part of the county police station, and occupied solely for the purposes of the Crown. The appellants thereupon appealed against the rates to the assessment committee. The assessment committee, however, failed to give relief on appeal and confirmed the assessment.

The constabulary force for the county of Essex was appointed under the Act 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93, and the county was divided into police districts, and station houses and strong rooms were provided under the Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88. The parish of Springfield is situated within one of these police districts, and the property called Springfield Court is about a mile from the county town and borough of Chelmsford, being in fact the headquarters of the Essex constabulary. There are not now any police cells used for the reception and detention of prisoners at Springfield Court, but the county police make use of a portion of the ground floor of the Shire Hall in Chelmsford, which is county property, as a police office. This, however, is not provided with sleeping accommodation, being nothing more than a space partitioned off, and supplied with desks and office-fittings. The cells for the detention of prisoners whilst in the custody of the police are also in the Shire Hall. The office and cells are used both by day and night. There are no other premises in the Chelmsford Union used for police purposes than those before mentioned.

The whole of the premises called Springfield Court belonged formerly to the justices of the peace for the county of Essex, but are now, under the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), vested in a joint committee consisting of an equal number of county justices and county councillors. The whole of the premises are used exclusively for the purposes of the police, and consist of the chief constable's and deputy chief constable's houses and gardens, a superintendent's and a sergeant's quarters, and also of clerks' offices, store rooms for police clothing, &c., parade ground, stables, coach-house, and other outbuildings. The chief constable, deputy chief constable, and two other officers, and the wives and children of those who are married live and sleep at Springfield Court aforesaid.

The premises occupy three sides of a square, and open into one centre court and have gardens adjoining; the whole building is under one roof, the front doors from all the separate quarters opening into the court. The whole of the premises and grounds are enclosed by a large brick wall, so that they can only be entered by the main gate or through the back way to the stable-yard.

All the premises are used solely by the police force for the purposes of the county constabulary, the chief constable being bound to reside there as a condition of his appointment. Only the portions of the premises in which the chief constable and the other three officers before-mentioned reside are rated.

Each officer pays a rack rent for the premises occupied by him, such rent being deducted from his pay, such deduction being applied in aid of the police rate.

Channell, Q.C., and Woollett, for the appellants.—These buildings are occupied wholly by the police, and are in fact a police station, and, therefore, exempt from rating. This case comes within the principle laid down by Lord Coleridge, C.J., in Martin v. West Derby Union, 31 W. R. 489, 11 Q. B. D. 145; Coomber v. The Justices of Berks, 32 W. R. 525, 9 App. Cas. 61, is also in our favour. The whole premises belong to the county for public purposes, and the court will not inquire into the nature of the occupation of particular sets of rooms by the persons employed by the county for those public purposes. The fact that they pay a rent makes no difference: Justices of Lancashire v. Stretford, E. B. & E. 225, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 80. [LAWRANCE, J., referred to Gambier v. Overseers of Lydford, 2 W. R. 226, 3 E. & B. 346.] A place need not contain cells to be a police station; a police station is a place where police are, ready for duty.

W. J. Grubbe and Duffield, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

DAY, J.—This is a question of not precisely the same, but of similar, character to that which we have already decided to-day (Durham County Council v. Chester-le-Street Poor Law Union, 63 L. T. N. S. 461). In giving the decision which I am about to pronounce it must not be supposed that I in any way dissent from the principles laid down in the cases which have been cited in argument. Referring to the judgment of Lord Coleridge, C.J., in Martin v. The Assessment Committee of West Derby, I may say that I do not doubt that where portions of a building which in itself is not rateable are occupied for the benefit of the persons occupying them, those portions are not rateable. But is that the present case? Here we have a building occupied by persons who are members of the police force of the county; and it is no doubt desirable that the police should live near to their sphere of duty, and that good accommodation should be provided for them.

Springfield Court consists of residences of the police, the rateability of which is the very question at issue; it is not a building which is notoriously non-rateable. Portions, no doubt, may be non-rateable—for instance, the police stables, the parade ground, or the stores for police clothing. But those places do not constitute a whole; they are a part only, and perhaps a small part, of the building, Springfield Court, the rateability of which is in question. Therefore, that passage in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, strongly as it commends itself to our respect and to our common sense, has no application here. These are residences for the police and their families for which they pay rent. I do not think that the fact that one wall surrounds their houses and the places where the horses and clothes of the police are kept makes any difference as to their rateability; and if they were outside the wall there is no doubt that they would be rateable.

I do not see that these buildings come under the exemption which police stations enjoy. A police station means a place where police are stationed for the purposes of their duty and nothing else; not the place where they live for their own convenience. In my opinion, these buildings ought to be rated, and the appeal fails.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think that this case falls within the principle of the decision in Gambier v. Overseers of Lydford.

In the Goods of SLINN. (a.)

Probate—Deed poll—Execution as a will—Extrinsic evidence—Administration.

The deceased, prior to her death, executed a deed poll, which was duly witnessed by two witnesses, who signed as witnesses in the presence of each other. The person who drew up the document regarded it as a will, and added the words, "And in presence of each other." The sole beneficiary was present, and under the deed understood that she was to receive nothing until after the death of the deceased, and after the execution of the document she promised to give, at the request of the deceased, £10 to E. C. after her death, as she had omitted to mention it in the paper.

Held, that the beneficiary was entitled to administration, with the paper annexed, as the last will and testament of the deceased. As the document was ambiguous, extrinsic evidence was admissible to show whether the deceased intended it to operate as a testamentary document.

Motion by Elizabeth Walker for grant to her of administration to the estate of Rhoda Slinn, deceased, with the following paper annexed as the last will and testament of the deceased:—

"To all people to whom these presents shall come, I, Rhoda Slinn, do send greeting. Know ye that the said Rhoda Slinn, of No. 3 house, 3 court, West John-street, in the parish of Sheffield, in the West Riding of the county of York, widow, for and in consideration of the love, goodwill, and affection which I have and do bear towards my loving friend Elizabeth Walker, wife of Joseph Walker, of No. 5, Garden-street, of the same parish and county, file cutter, have given and granted, and by these presents do freely give and grant, unto the said Elizabeth Walker, her heirs, exetors, or administrators, the moneys invested in my name in the Sheffield Savings Bank, Norfolk-street, in the parish of Sheffield aforesaid, to have and to hold as her and their own, without any manner of condition. In witness whereof I have hereunto put my hand and seal, this 12th day of October, 1889.

It appeared that Rhoda Slinn died on November 3, 1889, and that about three weeks before her death she divided her furniture between the applicant, Mrs. Walker, who was her niece, and Mrs. Walker's son, and that she went to live with Mr. and Mrs. Walker, who nursed her and took care of her until her death. A few days before the date of the will Mrs. Walker called to see the deceased, who had on several previous occasions expressed a wish that she should have the money in the Sheffield Savings Bank. The deceased said she felt very ill, and would like to have a settlement of her affairs, as she did not think she would live long; she said that Mrs. Walker, or her husband, had better see to it. In reply to an inquiry whether she wanted to make a will, the deceased said she wanted to give Mrs. Walker the money in the savings bank in the cheapest way, and upon being informed that a will would cost one guinea she said that someone had told her that a deed of gift was the same as a will, and would not cost so much. A neighbour borrowed a book, and prepared a document with which the deceased expressed her entire approval, and she then put her mark to it in the presence of the witnesses, who, in her presence and in that of each other, then put their names to it. Mrs. Walker understood that no benefit was to accrue to her until after the death of Rhoda Slinn. After the document had been executed, the deceased said, "There is Edwin Carrington; I should like him to have something." Mrs. Walker asked whether she had fixed the amount. The deceased said she had not mentioned it in the paper, but she would leave it to Mrs. Walker and the two witnesses to see that he got £10 after her death. Mrs. Walker promised that the payment should be made. The deceased sealed up the document in an envelope, and gave it to Mrs. Walker to put in a certain tin box.

George Mackley, who drew the document from a form in a book which he borrowed for the purpose, added the words, "and in presence of each other," as he said he looked upon the document more in the light of a will, and he thought those words were usually inserted in wills.

Notice of the present application had been given to the Queen's Proctor, and advertisements were inserted in the newspapers calling upon any next of kin of the deceased to come in and accept or refuse administration. No next of kin appeared, and the Queen's Proctor intimated that he did not intend to take any steps in the matter. The deceased's property consisted of £200 in the savings bank and her wearing apparel.

HANNEN, P., was of opinion that the paper should be admitted to probate. It was clear that extrinsic evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing the intention with which an ambiguous paper had been executed. Besides the improbability that a person would denude herself of all her property during her life, there was in this case, as in some of the cases referred to, evidence of expressions wholly inconsistent with the idea of an out-and-out gift. The expression used by the deceased in Robertson v. Smith & Lawrance was very similar to that used in the present case in reference to Edwin Carrington. This document was, therefore, testamentary, and he granted administration to the applicant with the document annexed.

"THE AVON" AND "THE THOMAS JOLLIFFE." (a.)

Damage—Form of decree where tug and tow both to blame for collision—No contribution amongst tort feasors.

Where, in an action of damage against two vessels and their owners, defendants intervening, the court absolves the plaintiff's vessel from blame, and finds both the vessels proceeded against to blame for the collision, the proper practice is for the court, except in the case where one or both of the vessels are exonerated from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage or other defence of the like nature, to pronounce a decree in the action condemning the owners of each vessel and their bail in the damage proceeded for and in costs, and under this decree the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the whole of their damages and costs from the owners of either vessel or their bail, without regard to any question of contribution between the defendants.

This was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamship Alaska against the sailing ship Avon and the steam tug Thomas Jolliffe to recover for the damages sustained by The Alaska in a collision with The Thomas Jolliffe on the 25th of December, 1888, when The Avon, in tow of The Thomas Jolliffe, was proceeding to enter the Penarth Dock at the same time as The Alaska.

Appearances in the action were entered on behalf of the owners of The Avon and of the owners of The Thomas Jolliffe, and both these vessels were released on bail being put in.

The action was heard on the 6th of November, 1889, when the court came to the conclusion that no blame for the collision attached to The Alaska, but that the collision was solely caused by the negligence of The Avon and of The Thomas Jolliffe, and thereupon the following minute of the decree was entered in the registry:—"The judge . . . having heard counsel on all sides, pronounced the collision in question in this action to have been occasioned by the fault or default of the master and crew of the ship Avon and the fault or default of the master and crew of the steam tug Thomas Jolliffe, and for the plaintiff's claim for damages in consequence thereof, and he condemned the owners of the ship Avon and their bail and the owners of the steam tug Thomas Jolliffe and their bail in the said damages and costs, and referred the said damages to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to assess the amount thereof."

On the 1st of November in this year the solicitors for the defendants of the owners of The Thomas Jolliffe gave notice of motion that the judge in court would be moved on behalf of their clients to order "that the registrar be directed to amend the form of the above-mentioned decree dated the 6th of November, 1889, entered in this case by providing by the said decree that the owners of the ship Avon and of the steam tug Thomas Jolliffe and their respective bail be condemned severally each for one-half of the entire damage, and that any balance of such half which the plaintiffs shall not be able to enforce against either vessel shall be paid by the other vessel or her bail, or that such other amendment be made as in the circumstances is just."

Nov. 4.—Kennedy, Q.C., and Pyke, on behalf of the owners of The Thomas Jolliffe, moved the judge in court in the terms of the above notice of motion.—The plaintiffs admit that the decree in the action is entered in the form usually adopted in similar cases without objection, but they contend that the practice of the court on the point has been erroneous, and that the principles laid down in The Milan, Lush. 603, ought to be applied in ascertaining the liability of the defendants to the plaintiffs, and the decree be altered as set forth in the notice of motion, which does no more than formulate what is now, and has been for some time, the rule of the Supreme Court of the United States in cases like the present.

BUTT, J.—This decree has been, to my mind, drawn up in the proper form. It may be that the law, as administered either in the United States generally, or in some of them, directing the recovery of damages in the way pointed out by Mr. Kennedy, is calculated to work out, in the end, more equal justice than results from the application of the law of England as it exists, but I have no power to deal with the matter in the way suggested by the American decisions referred to, if, in so dealing, I contravene the law of this country.

I am very clearly of opinion that I should be so contravening the law of England if I directed this decree to be amended in the way suggested. It is the law of England that everyone who has sustained damage by the joint act of two individuals, and also sues those two individuals in tort, gets a judgment for the amount of the damages he has sustained, and that judgment he has a right to enforce by execution against one or the other, or both, of those defendants. That I conceive to be the right of a plaintiff in ordinary cases. I do not understand why the law should be different in an admiralty action of damage. I do not agree at all that we have anything to do Shipping—Collision—Consequential loss—Damages—Demurrage—Practice.

Where, as the result of a collision, a vessel was detained in port, while a substituted vessel, belonging to the same owners, was doing her work at the defendants' expense, claim for demurrage disallowed.

There must be actual loss, and reasonable proof thereof, to support a claim for indemnity for consequential loss.

The Black Prince, 1 Lush. 568, distinguished.

Where a reference was directed to ascertain the actual expenses incurred for the detained vessel, as distinguished from loss of profits,

Held, that it should, in the circumstances, be made to the Registrar of her Majesty in Ecclesiastical and Marine Appeals.

This was an appeal from an order of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Hong Kong, dated the 27th of March, 1888.

The facts are stated in their lordships' judgment, the main question at issue being the consequential damages of a collision, in respect to demurrage, while a substituted vessel belonging to the plaintiff company, was doing, at the defendants' expense, the work which should have been done by the injured vessel.

Dec. 14, 1889.—The judgment of their lordships (Lord HOBHOUSE, Lord MACNAGHTEN, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, and Sir RICHARD COUCH), was delivered by Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—This is an appeal from a decree or order of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Hong Kong of the 27th of March, 1888.

The point determined was the amount of damages which the respondents, the Compagnie des Messageries Maritimes, were entitled to recover in a suit instituted by them against the appellant, the steamship City of Peking, in respect of a collision which took place on the 29th of November, 1886, in the harbour of Hong Kong between the said steamship City of Peking and the steamship Saghalien, of which the company were the owners.

In that suit The City of Peking, having been found to have been alone to blame, was condemned in damages and costs by a decree (subsequently affirmed by this board), by which it was referred to the registrar of the court to be assisted by merchants to ascertain the amount of damages and to report thereon.

The company brought in their claim containing many items. One of the items is as follows:—"No. 50, demurrage for the steamship Saghalien from the 29th of November, 1886, to the 25th of January, 1887, being fifty-six days, £5,352 4s."

The Saghalien was a vessel of about 3,823 tons gross, and M. de Champeaux, the agent of the company at Hong Kong, stated that he claimed demurrage at 6d. a ton a day on the gross tonnage.

The assistant-registrar, on the 6th of February, 1888, after hearing both parties, reported that he allowed the amount, £5,352 4s., claimed for demurrage, and all the other items of the plaintiff's claim with some comparatively slight deductions, which are not material to be considered with reference to the present appeal. The total so allowed being 1,491 francs, 95 centimes, £5,819 0s. 9d., and 66,068dols. and 79 cents., with interest at eight per cent. until paid.

No objection was made to this report by the plaintiffs, but the defendant appellant, on the 21st of February, 1888, objected to the item allowed for demurrage. The appellant also objected to several other items, the objection to which has since been abandoned, and is, therefore, not now material. The objections were heard by the learned judge who delivered judgment thereon, and by an order dated the 9th of March, 1888, referred back the report to the registrar and merchants, with a direction to ascertain the number of days The Saghalien was prevented by the collision from taking up her position on her own day from Marseilles, referring, as will hereafter appear, to the 30th of January, 1887, a day on which The Saghalien, as one of a line of steamers belonging to the company, was appointed to commence a fresh voyage from Marseilles to Shanghai.

The deputy-registrar, assisted by the same merchants, having, in pursuance of the last-mentioned order, heard both parties, together with fresh evidence, including an affidavit of M. de Champeaux, again reported to the court on the 21st of March, 1888, that fifty-six days' demurrage be allowed, and also specified his reasons for such report. To that report the defendant, on the 24th of March, 1888, objected, and contended that it should be varied, and that no demurrage ought to be allowed.

The learned judge, having again heard the case on the 27th of March, 1888, without assigning any further reasons, pronounced (inter alia) that the sum of £5,819 0s. 9d. was due to the plaintiffs in respect of their claim, together with interest and costs. And he condemned the defendants and their bail in the said sums, interest, and costs. The sum of £5,819 0s. 9d. so held to be due to the company includes the sum of £5,352 4s. claimed by them and allowed by the first report for demurrage.

From that order or decree the present appeal has been preferred by the defendant upon the ground that no demurrage ought to have been allowed, or, in the alternative, that the demurrage allowed was for too many days at too high a rate, and also upon the ground that the rate of interest allowed was unreasonable. Their lordships, in the course of the argument, intimated their opinion that, no objection having been made in the lower court in respect of the interest allowed, the appellant could not now support the appeal against such allowance.

The only question now to be decided is whether the defendant ought to be held liable for the £5,352 4s. allowed for demurrage, or any part of that amount.

It was objected on behalf of the respondents on the argument of the appeal in support of the third reason of their case, that the objection to the demurrage taken in the court below was not to the rate or number of days, but that no demurrage at all was due, and that the rate and number of days were not objected to in the court below and were, therefore, not subject to appeal to her Majesty in Council; but their lordships are of opinion that that objection cannot be supported. The objection to the first report was that the report be varied, the following items (of which No. 50, "Demurrage for Saghalien £5,352 4s., was one) being objected to." In the objection to the second report the language was, no doubt, altered, the objection being "that the report be varied, and that no demurrage be allowed." Their lordships are disposed to think that even if the latter objection stood alone the appellant would have been at liberty to contend that part of the sum allowed for demurrage ought to be disallowed, even though it might fail in showing that no demurrage ought to be allowed; but reading the second objection, coupled with the first, they have no doubt that the appellant is at liberty to show that the whole or some part of the item of £5,352 4s. ought to be disallowed. In dealing with the case their lordships consider that the plaintiffs must be held to their claim for demurrage, from the 29th of November, 1886, to the 25th of January, 1887, or, in other words, during the detention of The Saghalien at Hong Kong, and that they are not at liberty to claim as demurrage any detention of the vessel at Marseilles after her arrival there on the 25th of February, 1888, the 6d. a day claimed and allowed being limited to the period of her detention at Hong Kong between the dates mentioned in item No. 50 of the claim.

There is no doubt as to the rule of law according to which compensation is to be assessed in cases of this nature, where a partial loss is sustained by collision. The rule is restitutio in integrum: The Black Prince, 1 Lush., at p. 573. The party injured is entitled to be put, as far as practicable, in the same condition as if the injury had not been suffered. It does not follow as a matter of necessity that anything is due for detention of a vessel whilst under repair. In order to entitle a party to be indemnified for what is termed in the Admiralty Court a consequential loss resulting from the detention of his vessel, two things are absolutely necessary—actual loss, and reasonable proof of the amount: The Clarence; The Argentino.

There is no dispute as to the principal facts as stated by the learned judge: "The Saghalien is one of the steamers of the company which run regularly every fortnight from Marseilles to Shanghai. These teamers are subsidized by the French Government to carry mails from France to China and the ports on that course, and to take return mails to France. The China terminus is Shanghai, and it is from there that they commence their return voyage homewards after staying for a time at Shanghai, something between a fortnight and three weeks it would seem from the evidence before the registrar. They also stop for a short time apparently at Marseilles after the completion of the round trip and before commencing a fresh voyage to China. On the 29th of November, 1886, The Saghalien was lying in the harbour of Hong Kong, having arrived from Shanghai two days before. She was homeward bound next day at noon. The City of Peking, arriving with the American mails, in coming up to her anchorage collided with and damaged The Saghalien so that she could not proceed on her journey to France, but had to be taken into dry dock. On the same day the steamship Melbourne, another of the company's steamers, arrived in Hong Kong from Europe with passengers, mails, and cargo, and in the ordinary course would have proceeded to Shanghai on the following day. The agent of the company, M. de Champeaux, at once decided to send on The Melbourne's cargo, mails, and passengers by outside steamers to Shanghai, and send The Melbourne back to Europe instead of The Saghalien. This decision was very promptly executed, and The Melbourne having discharged her northern cargo, had transferred to her The Saghalien's cargo, passengers, &c."

The outward voyage of The Saghalien from Marseilles commenced on the 26th of September, 1886. If the collision had not taken place she ought, in ordinary course, to have left Hong Kong on her homeward voyage on the 30th of November, 1886, and to have reached Marseilles about the 3rd of January, 1887, and, according to the arrangements of the company, would have remained there unemployed until the 30th of January in that year, when she was timed to take her turn and to start upon a fresh outward voyage to Shanghai. In consequence, however, of the collision she was detained at Hong Kong until the 25th of January, 1887, fifty-six days after the collision. She left on that day, arrived at Marseilles on the 25th of February in that year, and remained there unemployed until the 27th of March, when she again sailed for Shanghai.

The Melbourne left Hong Kong on the 2nd of December, 1886, two days after The Saghalien ought to have started; she arrived at Marseilles in due course early in January, 1887, and remained there unemployed until the 30th of that month, on which day she took the turn which, but for the collision, would have been taken by The Saghalien, and sailed on a fresh outward voyage for Shanghai.

The Melbourne having been substituted for The Saghalien on the homeward voyage, was necessarily prevented from continuing her outward voyage to Shanghai and back, and other arrangements had to be made for carrying on to that port the mails, passengers, and cargo of The Melbourne, and for her return voyage to Marseilles. These arrangements were attended with very considerable expense, in addition to the loss sustained by the withdrawal of certain passengers and freight, booked by The Melbourne from Hong Kong to Shanghai, but the whole of these expenses and losses were included in the plaintiff's claim, and have been allowed both by the assistant-registrar and by the judge, in addition to the claim of £5,352 4s. for demurrage.

As to the homeward voyage from Shanghai, which would have been made by The Melbourne if she had not been substituted, M. de Champeaux, in his affidavit of the 18th of March, 1888, says:—"The company's steamship Amazone, instead of remaining at Shanghai, according to the time tables of the company, until the 6th day of January, 1887, was despatched from Shanghai on the 23rd day of December, 1886, to supply the place of the steamship Melbourne, and the plaintiff company's steamship Yangtse, instead of remaining in Shanghai until the 20th day of January, 1887, was despatched from Shanghai on the 6th day of January, 1887, in the place of the said steamship Amazone.

"The company's steamship Volga was taken off the Hong Kong and Japan line, and was despatched from Shanghai on the 20th day of January, 1887, in place of the said steamship Yangtse, and she carried the mails, passengers, and cargo to Hong Kong, where they were transhipped into the said steamship Saghalien thus enabling that vessel to sail on the 25th of January, 1887, for Marseilles, otherwise the said steamship Saghalien would have had to proceed to Shanghai for the mails, passengers, and cargo, which would have caused her to leave Marseilles again two weeks later than the 27th day of March, 1887, the day she did leave.

"The company's steamers usually remain at Shanghai for about seventeen to twenty-one days, in order to thoroughly overhaul their engines and machinery, and in consequence of the earlier despatch of the said steamships, Amazone and Yangtse, as aforesaid, they were only at Shanghai about three or four days, and the usual overhaul of the engines and machinery could not be and was not effected.

"The company's steamers usually remain at Marseilles for about four weeks after their arrival before being again despatched to China."

M. de Champeaux, in his affidavit of the 9th of January, 1888, paragraph 15, also stated that, in consequence of the detention of the steamship Saghalien, she lost her turn in the line of mail steamers, and the company suffered great inconvenience, and incurred heavy loss, both pecuniarily and in reputation; but on cross-examination, at page 15, he says:—"I do not know if any loss has actually occurred. Loss might have occurred by the steamers not staying long enough at Shanghai to clean their engines. The service of the steamers was also made irregular. We were exposed to a claim from the French Government.

"If there had been no collision The Melbourne would have got to Shanghai about the 3rd of December, and would have stayed about fourteen days there, and ought to have left here, i.e., Hong Kong, on the 28th of December. The Yangtse probably left on the 28th of December. The next steamer to the north after The Melbourne was The Yangtse. These steamers were turned round at Shanghai. So far as profits were concerned the Compagnie lost nothing. The crew and officers are engaged for the voyage, and some of the crew are discharged at Marseilles. Taking The Volga off did not interfere with the service from Yokohama to Hong Kong. I cannot say what extra expense was caused by taking The Volga off her proper voyage. I do not know if any actual gains were lost to the company by the change of steamers, nor can I say what actual expenses were incurred."

There appears to be a slight mistake in the statement that The Yangtse was the next steamer north after The Melbourne, for it appears from a later affidavit, as already stated, that The Amazone was the next, and The Yangtse the next after The Amazone, and that The Amazone was the steamer which supplied the place of The Melbourne on the 23rd of December, but the mistake does not in the least degree alter the case.

M. de Champeaux again says:—"The Saghalien is three times as large as The Volga. If I had sent The Saghalien up to Shanghai instead of using The Volga the expense would have been more, as a fortnight would have been lost. If I had sent The Saghalien The Volga would not have come down to Hong Kong. Whilst in dock other steamers were earning the profits of The Saghalien. I did not hear of any cargo being shut out at Shanghai."

It seems clear that no damage was sustained by the company in consequence of The Melbourne's not having completed her outward voyage, and been at Shanghai for her return voyage. The profits of her homeward voyage, though earned by other steamers, were earned by other steamers of the company and for the company.

As to the sending of The Volga to Shanghai to carry the mails, passengers, and cargo from thence to Hong Kong to be reshipped on board The Saghalien, and carried by her to Marseilles on her voyage which commenced on the 25th of January, it seems clear that no damage has been sustained by the company, as all the expenses of The Volga were claimed by the company and have been allowed by the judge, the sums allowed being £433 4s. 4d. and 624 dols. and 77 cents. The learned judge, on allowing these amounts remarked: "The allowance for The Volga in connecting the Shanghai end of the line with Hong Kong is most moderate, and seems to me to have been the cheapest service that could have been rendered for The City of Peking."

The learned judge was mistaken in treating the case of The Black Prince as analogous to the present. The two cases are very different. In The Black Prince the vessels belonged to different sets of owners, so that the profits earned by one ship belonged to one set of owners, and the profits earned by a different ship to another set of owners, whereas in the present case the profits earned, whether by one ship or another, all belonged to the company.

Again, in the case of The Black Prince, the arrangement as to the turns fixed for the voyages to be made by several ships was made by the several owners, each set of owners having a distinct interest in having the arrangement adhered to so that their ship might be employed in its proper turn; no set of owners had the power to alter the turns allotted without the consent of all the others. In the present case the order in which the ships were appointed to leave Marseilles was one made for the company's own convenience and to preserve regularity in the departure of their own vessels. It could be changed or varied at any moment at the will of the company in the case of emergency, or if the interests of the company appeared to them to require it, and, in fact, it was very properly changed by M. de Champeaux in consequence of the inability of The Saghalien to proceed on her voyage.

It appears to their lordships that all the damages sustained by the company in consequence of the substitution of The Melbourne were included in the claim brought in before the registrar, allowed by him, and finally sanctioned by the court. The Melbourne and her crew having been substituted for The Saghalien and her crew on her homeward voyage, at what may now be termed the expense of the defendant, was very properly, and perhaps necessarily, allowed to take the turn of The Saghalien on the next outward voyage from Marseilles on the 30th of January, 1887.

The company lost nothing, so far as the use of the ships was concerned, by substituting The Melbourne, for if she had not been engaged on the homeward voyage she and her crew would have been occupied during the whole time in completing the voyage on which she was engaged at the time of the substitution.

It would be very unjust to charge the defendant £95 a day or anything for the loss of the use of The Saghalien during her detention at Hong Kong for the time during which The Melbourne and her crew were doing at the defendant's expense the work which The Saghalien and her crew ought to have done. This includes the period from the 2nd of December, 1886, to the day in January 1887, on which The Melbourne arrived at Marseilles. No loss was sustained by the company by the detention of The Melbourne from the day of her arrival at Marseilles and the day of her departure therefrom, for it was in consequence of the arrangements of the company that she remained unemployed during that period; so also no loss was sustained by the company in consequence of The Saghalien's not having been in Marseilles from the 3rd to the 30th of January, 1887, as but for the accident she ought to have been, for if she had been there she would have been lying unemployed and earning nothing in accordance with the company's own arrangements.

The learned judge was clearly in error in referring back the report by his first judgment to the registrar and merchants with a direction to ascertain the number of days The Saghalien was prevented by the collision from taking up her position on her own day, and to amend their report on the principles indicated, without directing them to ascertain whether the company sustained any loss in consequence. In giving that direction he was acting entirely upon the case of The Black Prince, without adverting to the difference between that case and the present. He said:—"It may turn out that there were fifty-six days' delay, but although The Araxes (referring to the injured ship in the case of The Black Prince) was thirty-eight days in dock she was only allowed twenty-eight days' demurrage, such being the number of days she was prevented from taking her place on the line—in other words, that she was not earning money for her owners."

The case went before the deputy registrar, Mr. Sangster, a different officer, and the same merchants, who reported that fifty-six days' demurrage be allowed. The report is not very clear; but reading the whole report together it seems to their lordships that the deputy registrar attributed the demurrage to the fifty-six days during which The Saghalien was in dock at Hong Kong, and not to any portion of the time during which she was unemployed at Marseilles.

Be this as it may, the learned judge, acting upon the report, without giving any further reasons than those in his first judgment, and apparently under the erroneous impression that this case was governed by the ruling in the case of The Black Prince, allowed the sum of £5,352 4s. claimed for demurrage, being at the rate of 6d. per ton upon the gross tonnage of The Saghalien, or about £95 a day for each of the said fifty-six days, and this without proof that any loss had been sustained by the company in consequence of that demurrage.

It has been shown that the company has claimed and been allowed all the damage sustained in consequence of the inability of The Saghalien to proceed on her homeward voyage on the 30th of November, 1886, so far as the loss by the company of the use of the vessel was concerned.

Mr. Champeaux very properly, and, as it appears to their lordships, correctly stated, "that, so far as profits were concerned, the company lost nothing," and also "that whilst in dock the other steamers were earning the profits of The Saghalien." The learned judge, however, remarked that that statement required some explanation, and added, "Should they have nothing for those services? I have stated why I think they ought to have," without adverting to the fact that he was allowing in other items of the claim all the expenses which had been incurred in consequence of the substitution of The Melbourne.

Their lordships are of opinion that the decree or order appealed against ought to be reversed so far as it allows the sum of £5,352 4s. claimed for demurrage, with interest thereon and costs. Mr. Champeaux stated in his affidavit of the 9th of January, 1888, that the portage bill of the steamship Saghalien, whilst lying at Hong Kong during the time she was being repaired, amounted to from £95 to £100 a day, and that it could not have been reduced. There seems, however, to be some mistake in that statement, unless the portage bill, the items of which are not before their lordships, included the 53,000dols. claimed and allowed for the repairs of the vessel. Their lordships are of opinion that the amount claimed and allowed for demurrage, so far as it includes any damage on account of the loss of the use of The Saghalien, ought to be disallowed. They cannot, however, say that the company may not have incurred some expenses in respect of The Saghalien, such, for instance, as the lodging, maintenance, and wages of the crew, and it may be other expenses incurred during the period of her detention which would not have been incurred if she had not been detained. These may have been included in No. 50, the item claimed for demurrage, and, if so, their lordships think that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover them under that item. (See The Inflexible.)

It would be very inconvenient and would be attended with considerable expense to the parties to send this case back to the registrar at Hong Kong. The head officer of the company is in France, and they will doubtless be able to supply the necessary information and affidavits as to the items of the portage bill, and as to the nature and extent of the necessary and reasonable expenses, if any, incurred at Hong Kong with reference to The Saghalien during her detention there.

Their lordships are not prepared to make any report to her Majesty before it shall have been ascertained whether any and what expenses of the nature above indicated were incurred by the company. They, therefore, refer it to the Registrar of her Majesty in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Appeals to ascertain and report whether, having regard to the above remarks, any and what expenses were properly incurred by the company with reference to the steamship Saghalien during her detention at Hong Kong between the 29th day of November, 1886, and the 25th of January, 1887, in addition to the several items included in the claim made by the company at Hong Kong exclusive of that for demurrage in No. 50, and if the registrar find that any such expenses were necessarily and properly incurred, then to report the amount and the several items thereof.

All further questions, including the question of costs, are reserved.

The plaintiffs must bring in their claims in writing before the Registrar of her Majesty in Ecclesiastical Maritime Appeals within the space of one month from the 14th day of December, 1889, or within such further time as the said registrar may allow.

July 12, 1890.—The final judgment of their lordships (Lord WATSON, Lord MACNAGHTEN, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—Upon the hearing of this appeal their lordships declared their opinion that the decree or order appealed against ought to be reversed, so far as it allowed the sum of £5,352 4s. claimed for demurrage, with interest thereon and costs, but they added that they could not say that the company might not have incurred some expense in respect of The Saghalien, such, for instance, as lodging, maintenance, and wages of the crew, and it might be, other expenses incurred during the period of her detention, which would not have been incurred if she had not been detained, and their lordships referred it to the Registrar of her Majesty in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Appeals to ascertain and report to this board in respect of those matters.

Their lordships having considered the report of the registrar, and the evidence adduced before him, are of opinion that the whole of the sum claimed for demurrage ought to be disallowed, and that the respondents have not shown that they are entitled to any sum in substitution thereof.

Under these circumstances, their lordships will humbly advise her Majesty that the decree or order appealed against ought to be reversed, so far as it allows the sum of £5,352 4s. claimed for demurrage, with interest thereon and costs, and that in other respects it ought to be affirmed. The respondents must pay the costs of this appeal, including the costs of the reference to the registrar, and of the motion to this board consequent upon his report.

App. Bankruptcy. Dec. 12.

Ex parte ARGENTINE GOLD FIELDS.
In re LOW. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—Power to include more than one judgment debt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 136, 137; Appendix, Part I., Forms 5, 6.

A bankruptcy notice cannot be issued in respect of more than one judgment debt.

Appeal from the refusal of Mr. Registrar Linklater to issue a bankruptcy notice.

The Argentine Gold Fields Co. obtained two judgments against the debtor, each for £30. The company being desirous of serving the debtor with a bankruptcy notice, applied to the registrar, asking that one bankruptcy notice might be issued in respect of the two judgments.

The registrar held that there was no power to issue a bankruptcy notice in respect of more than one judgment.

The company appealed.

Whinney, for the company.—The registrar thought that as sub-section 1 (g) of section 4, and the forms in the appendix to the rules (Forms 5, 6), speak all through of "judgment" in the singular, it was impossible to comprise two judgments in one notice. But this is a case in which the singular ought to be held to include the plural, in accordance with the general rule of construction of statutes. And rules 136 and 137, which prescribe Forms 5 and 6, each say, "with such variations as circumstances may require." In re Andrew, 24 W. R. 197, 1 Ch. D. 358, is an authority on the somewhat analogous procedure under the old practice. One notice in respect of one judgment, or two separate notices, will not serve our purpose, as each judgment is for less than £50, though both together amount to more than £50. If we were to serve the debtor with two notices, he might comply with one by payment, and then, though his non-compliance with the other would be an act of bankruptcy, the debt itself, being for less than £50, would not be sufficient to support a petition.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that we must read section 4, sub-section 1 (g), as it is written. As it is written, it applies, in every part of it, to one judgment, and one judgment only. I think we shall be construing the section according to its true meaning if we say that it does not contemplate the issuing of a bankruptcy notice in respect of more than one judgment. If we compare it with section 6, which deals with the question whether two creditors may join in the same petition, we find that where the Legislature mean that two may so join, they say so. I think the registrar was right in saying that he could not allow two judgment debts to be joined in the same notice. Another reason which leads me to the same conclusion is this: it was pointed out that if the bankruptcy notice is limited to one judgment, the debtor may pay it, and then the other judgment, though another notice might be issued in respect of it, would not be sufficient to support a petition, and so the appellants would not be able to make the debtor a bankrupt. As to that, I do not think it would be right to extend the meaning of the words so as to deprive the debtor of the opportunity of taking a course which is otherwise left open to him, and which may prevent bankruptcy proceedings being taken against him.

LOPES and KAY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Costs—Solicitor—County court—Amount claimed over £10—Amount recovered under £10—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 118, 119—County Court Rules, 1889, Appendix.

Where, in an action in a county court, the amount claimed is over £10, but less than £10 is recovered, there is a discretion to allow the taxation of costs, as between solicitor and client, on the higher scale.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 110) reversed.

Appeal by Messrs. Langlois & Biden, solicitors, from the decision of a divisional court (reported ante, p. 110).

Messrs. Langlois & Biden were instructed by a person named Wood to bring an action for him in the county court on a promissory note for £15 of which he was indorsee. At the trial Wood admitted in cross-examination that he had only given £5 for the note, and judgment was given for him for that sum with costs. The costs as between party and party were taxed at £2 13s. 6d. and paid by the defendant. Messrs. Langlois & Biden then sent in their bill of costs to Wood, which amounted to £9 14s. 6d., of which £5 2s. 6d. were actual expenses out of pocket. This sum was made up of counsel's fee, £2 4s. 6d., court fees, £2 8s., and witnesses, 10s.

Wood obtained an order for the taxation of this bill, and Master Wilberforce, before whom it came, while expressing his regret at the hardship inflicted on the solicitors, considered himself bound by the rules to tax the costs on the lower scale at £2 13s. 6d. On appeal Huddleston, B., at chambers, reversed this decision, but the Divisional Court restored the master's order.

The solicitors appealed.

By section 118 of the County Courts Act, 1888, "all costs and charges between solicitor and client shall, on the application either of the solicitor or client, but not otherwise, be taxed by the registrar of the court in which such costs and charges were incurred, but his taxation may be reviewed by the judge on the application of either party, and no costs or charges shall be allowed on such taxation which are not sanctioned by the scale then in force."

The scale in force at the time of the taxation is given in the Appendix to the County Court Rules, 1889, and in it the lower scale is headed: "Costs to be paid to solicitors in actions and matters, as well between party and party as between solicitor and client, where the amount recovered exceeds £2 and does not exceed £10." At the end of the scale is the following note: "N.B.—No other costs are to be allowed than the above where the amount claimed does not exceed £10, unless the judge certifies under section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888."

The higher scale is headed: "Costs to be paid to solicitors in actions and matters, as well as between party and party as between solicitor and client, where the subject-matter or the sum recovered exceeds £10."

Channell, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the appellants.

Crump, Q.C., and W. H. C. Payne, for the respondent.

The arguments used were the same as in the Divisional Court.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case I do not think it necessary now to decide whether the taxation of this bill of costs was exclusively a matter for the county court. Certainly, such bills of costs ought not to be brought before masters of the High Court, except under exceptional circumstances. If it were to become a practice that bills of costs incurred in proceedings before county courts should be brought for taxation before masters of the High Court, the judges would have to amend the rules in order to prevent such a thing from occurring. But assuming that the bill of costs was properly brought before the master, the question is, whether he has any power when the amount claimed exceeds £10, and the amount recovered is less than that limit, to direct in a taxation between solicitor and client that the solicitor shall receive any costs other than those given by the lower scale. The question really turns on the construction of section 118 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and of the rules made under that Act. Those rules were made by a committee of county court judges, and they are to have the same force and validity as an Act of Parliament. We must, therefore, look at the rules and the Act together, and construe them as if they were all one enactment. The lower scale is headed: "Costs to be paid to solicitors . . . as well between party and party as solicitor and client, where the amount recovered exceeds £2 and does not exceed £10." Then follows the scale of costs, and then comes this note: "N.B.—No other costs to be allowed than the above where the amount claimed does not exceed £10, unless the judge certifies under section 119." Therefore, even where the amount claimed and the amount recovered are under £10, the judge may, under section 119, certify under certain circumstances, which are specified in the section, for costs on the higher scale. But where, as in the present case, the amount claimed is over, and the amount recovered is under, the limit, the negative part of the note does not apply. It is, therefore, a question whether the note does not by necessary implication give a power in such a case to give more costs than are allowed by the lower scale. No doubt, as between party and party, the taxation must in such a case be on the lower scale. In my opinion, the effect of the note is to give the master in such cases a discretion to allow, as between solicitor and client, costs on the higher scale. Of course, he cannot give more costs than are allowed by the higher scale, but I think that he has a discretion where the amount claimed exceeds £10, and the amount recovered is less than £10, to give costs either on the higher or the lower scale.

I can see nothing in section 118 inconsistent with this view. Section 119, in my opinion, does not apply at all to disputes between solicitor and client. It has reference only to taxation as between party and party, and therefore I think it does not in any way limit section 118 on this point.

The note to the scale is equally a part of the enactment. We are bound to give a meaning, if possible, to every part of the enactment, and this, in my opinion, is the only meaning which this note is capable of bearing. The master, therefore, has a discretion which he must exercise on the circumstances of each case. He will have to consider whether he will, under the circumstances, allow costs on the lower or the higher scale. If a solicitor knew, or ought to have known by taking ordinary care and making ordinary inquiries, that his client, who alleged that he claimed a larger sum, would not possibly recover more than £10, then he ought not to allow him to claim more, and if, knowing this, he nevertheless claimed more, then, after judgment had been given for less than £10, when the bill of costs came for taxation, I should think that the master would exercise his discretion against the solicitor, and would bind him down to the lower scale. On the other hand, if the client, through reticence or wilfulness, misinformed the solicitor and misled him into believing that he had a fair chance of recovering a larger sum than £10, then if the solicitor refused to bring the action for that larger sum, he would be equally wrong; for a solicitor has no right to shut out his client from recovering the amount he believes to be due to him. In such a case it would be a great hardship on the solicitor if he were unable to recover against the client even the costs which, on the faith of the client's statement, he had paid out of his own pocket in furtherance of the action. In such a case I think that the master would exercise his discretion in the solicitor's favour, and would give him costs on the higher scale. Therefore, in the present case I think that the master had a discretion which he has not exercised, and that the matter must consequently be remitted to him with this expression of our opinion. It follows that we think that the Divisional Court was wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed. I wish to repeat that this decision is given on the assumption that the master had jurisdiction to tax the bill, as to which I say nothing.

KAY, L.J.—I agree. I confess that at first I was in some difficulty to reconcile the heading and the note to the lower scale of costs, but I think the suggestion of the Master of the Rolls completely solves the difficulty. No doubt, according to section 118, the costs in this case must be taxed on the lower scale, but that lower scale, by its note, allows the master a discretion in such a case as this to give more costs. That discretion is, I think, perfectly consistent with the section, and it alone makes the heading and the note reconcileable. On this point, therefore, we differ from the Divisional Court, and the master will have to exercise his discretion and say whether any and what part of the bill should be taxed on the higher scale. I am most anxious not to fetter that discretion, and I will only suggest, in addition to the illustrations given by the Master of the Rolls, that in my opinion the master might, if he thought fit, say that counsel's fee or some other outgoings ought not to be allowed on the higher scale, and might leave them on the lower scale while allowing other of the costs on the higher scale.

Master and servant—False imprisonment—Arrest by a servant—Liability of master.

The plaintiff, with a friend, went into a public-house, in which N., a servant of the defendant's, was barman and acted as manager of the bar. The plaintiff's friend gave to N., in payment of liquor supplied to him and the plaintiff, a German ten-mark piece in lieu of a half-sovereign. N. went for change, but, on discovering that the coin was a foreign one, brought it back and got an English half-sovereign in return. On the plaintiff and his friend leaving the public-house, N. followed them out and gave them both into custody for attempting to pass false coin. The charge was dismissed. Upon an action by the plaintiff against the defendant, as master of N., for false imprisonment, the only evidence of any authority in N. to give suspected persons into custody was the fact that he was manager of the bar.

Held, that there was no evidence of any liability in the defendant for the action of his servant.

Owston v. Bank of New South Wales (decided by the Privy Council), 4 App. Cas. 270, 27 W. R. Dig. 156, approved and adopted.

This was an action for false imprisonment, in which, at a trial before Wills, J., and a jury, a verdict and judgment had been entered for the plaintiff for £50.

The material facts were that the plaintiff had gone into a public-house of the defendant's, with a friend, who offered to the barman a ten-mark German piece in lieu of half-a-sovereign.

The barman, one Nunney, took the coin to get it changed, but, finding it to be a foreign coin, returned it to the plaintiff's friend, who thereupon gave the barman a half-sovereign in its place. Subsequently, when the plaintiff and his friend had left the public-house, the barman, Nunney, followed them into the treet, and gave them into custody for attempting to pass bad money.

At the police-station the inspector declined to take the charge.

The plaintiff brought the present action, and his friend had brought another, against the defendant as the proprietor of the public-house, and so responsible for its servants. The defendant did not reside upon the premises, but came round to inspect this amongst other houses, for which he held a licence. Nunney, the barman, acted as manager of the business at the bar. There was no other evidence, beyond this fact, that Nunney had any authority to give people into custody. Wills, J., allowed the case to go to the jury, on the ground that, there being evidence that Nunney was manager, it was for the jury to say whether a person acting as manager in that particular class of business would not be impliedly authorized to give suspected persons into custody.

The defendant now appealed, on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury of Nunney having any authority to take any such action.

Cock, Q.C., and R. Wallace, for the appellant.—There was no evidence of any implied authority in Nunney to take anyone into custody: Allen v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 19 W. R. 127, L. R. 6 Q. B. 65; Owston v. Bank of New South Wales, 4 App. Cas. 270, 27 W. R. Dig. 156; and Poulton v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 16 W. R. 309, L. R. 2 Q. B. 534. There was no evidence of any immediate necessity to arrest the respondent. The property of the master was not in danger. The common law right to arrest anyone suspected of being about to commit a felony does not apply here.

French, Q.C., and J. W. Gordon, for the respondent.—It was for a jury to say whether, upon the facts of this case, there could be authority, express or implied, in the manager of a public-house bar to take such steps as Nunney did. This is a question of fact which the jury have found in the respondent's favour: Ward v. General Omnibus Co., 21 W. R. 358; Goff v. Great Northern Railway Co., 3 El. & El. 672; and Seymour v. Greenwood, 6 H. & N. 359.

[It was mentioned that in the other action of Metcalfe v. Deakin, upon the same facts, Denman, J., had ruled that there was no evidence of authority by Deakin to go to the jury.]

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The whole of this case turns upon the action of Nunney, who clearly was a barman, whatever else people chose to call him. The only evidence of his authority is the fact that he acted as what is called manager in this public-house. He was not a general manager of the business; he did not act as manager in any other place than the bar and bar-room. That being his position, the only question is, Does that office give him the right and the implied authority to act as he did? That is, to follow two persons out into the street and to give them into custody for an alleged attempt, which in any case had failed, to commit a crime. In the absence of any express authority by his employer to take persons into custody on suspicion, it was for the plaintiff to show some general custom in the trade to give managers such authority. None was produced. The judge appears to have made some remarks on the dangers to which a publican is more particularly exposed from stray customers. I do not agree with that opinion, but, even if I did, that was no evidence as coming from the judge. It was merely an expression of opinion. Was there any evidence of authority being in Nunney upon which a jury could be entitled to act either as an inference or as implying authority? I am clearly of opinion that there was not. The case comes within the principles of Allen v. London and South-Western Railway Co. and Owston v. Bank of New South Wales. If an act is done by a servant on his own behalf or out of spite, the master is not liable for its consequences, even though the authority given be a general authority. The latter case was decided by the Privy Council, and though not binding upon us here, is of the greatest possible weight, and I adopt its judgment unhesitatingly.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree. The only question upon the evidence given is, What was the implied authority in a servant in charge of the management of a bar? There is no other evidence of authority here except the fact that Nunney was manager of the bar-room. Blackburn, J., in Allen v. London and South-Western Railway Co., lays down the right principle: "The principle which governs the present case has been laid down in the cases cited; there is an implied authority to do all those things that are necessary for the protection of the property intrusted to a person or for fulfilling the duty which a person has to perform." There is no implied authority in a servant to punish a customer for a supposed infringement of the law. How can an authority be presumed to exist empowering him, at a time when his master's property was admittedly safely secured, to go after and arrest a customer? Such a supposition is aimed at in Blackburn, J.'s words: "There is a marked distinction between an act done for the purpose of protecting the property by preventing a felony or recovering it back, and an act done for the purpose of punishing the offender for what has already been done." There can be no such authority of any sort or kind implied, nor could it be presumed from any evidence before the court in this case.

KAY, L J.—The question is, whether there was evidence to go to a jury on which they could reasonably find that there was an implied authority in the manager of a public-house bar to punish anyone for attempting to commit a crime? No evidence of custom in the trade was ever given. The sole evidence was the fact of the servant being the manager of the bar. There was no question of property having to be protected or as to the prevention of a felony. Can there be said to be, upon such evidence, any power in the servant to do such an illegal act as was admittedly done here in order to prevent other people from trying to commit the offence originally alleged to have been attempted? Suppose the case of a wrongful assault by a manager upon a customer at the bar, under the plea of keeping order, or of libellous letters inserted by him for some reason against a customer in a newspaper, could his master be held liable for such conduct? It would be as absurd to hold so as it would in this case.

North, J. } July 30, 1890.

In re BIGNOLD.
BIGNOLD v. BIGNOLD. (a.)

Will—Legacy—Interest on legacy—Date at which interest begins to run.

A testator directed his trustees to set apart and invest a certain sum (part of the proceeds of sale of his real and personal estate), and to permit his wife to receive the income during her widowhood, the provision to be accepted by her in lieu of dower and freebench. The widow elected to take the legacy.

Held, that she was entitled to interest on the legacy from the expiration of a year after the date of the testator's death, but not from the date of his death.

Further consideration.

William Atkins Bignold, by his will, after bequeathing to his wife his household furniture and provisions, and also a legacy of £1,000 to be paid within three months after his death, gave his freehold estates and residuary personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and devised his copyhold estates to such uses as his trustees should appoint for the purpose of completing any sale of them. And the testator directed his trustees to set aside out of the proceeds of sale of his real and residuary personal estate the sum of £2,000 upon trust to invest the same, and to permit his wife to receive the income thereof so long as she should continue his widow. And the will proceeded: "I declare that the provision hereinbefore made for my said wife shall be accepted by her in lieu of her claim to dower or freebench out of my said estates."

The testator died in 1884. His personal estate proved insufficient for the payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and the legacy of £1,000, so that the whole of the sum of £2,000 was payable out of the proceeds of the sale of his freehold and copyhold estates.

The widow elected to take the provision made for her in the will in lieu of dower and freebench.

This was the further consideration of an action for the administration of the testator's estate, and the question for decision was whether interest on the sum of £2,000 ran from the date of the testator's death or from the end of a year after that date.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C. and Lyttleton Chubb, for the plaintiff.—The interest on the £2,000 runs from the expiration of a year from the death of the testator. [They were stopped by the court.]

Everett, Q.C., and A. J. Chitty, for the widow.—The widow is entitled to interest on the £2,000 from the date of the testator's death, as her interest in the £2,000 is in satisfaction of dower and freebench, and a legacy in satisfaction of a debt carries interest from the death of the testator: Clark v. Sewell, 3 Atk. 96; Theobald on Wills, 3rd ed., 133. [Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., referred to Elton v. Montague, 1 L. J. Ch. (O. S.) 212.] That case differs from the present, as there the legacy was directed to be paid within three months from the testator's death. The fact that the legacy must be paid out of the proceeds of real estate does not affect the question: Turner v. Buck, 22 W. R. 748, L. R. 18 Eq. 301.

Hadley, Whinney, and Stokes, for other parties.

NORTH, J.—It is clear that the interest on the £2,000 runs from the end of the year after the testator's death. There is no personal estate of the testator to satisfy the £2,000, which must come entirely out of the proceeds of sale of his real estate. In an ordinary case a certain rule has to be adopted in the distribution of personalty—viz., legacies must be paid within a year from the date of the testator's death, from which time an unpaid legacy will carry interest. I think that the same rule ought to apply in this case, and that the interest ought to commence to run after the expiration of that year. This seems in accordance with the decision in Elton v. Montague, where a legacy of £5,000 was given to the testator's widow, to be paid her within three months after his death in lieu of jointure, and it was held that the widow, having elected to take the legacy, was not entitled to interest between the testator's death and the three months within which the legacy was directed to be paid. The Vice-Chancellor says: "The court intends that a testator means his widow to be provided for from the moment of his death, and therefore a legacy to her carries interest from that time. This, however, is a case, not of a simple legacy, but of election. The widow is provided for by her jointure; she is to make her election; and, in that election, the circumstance that the legacy is not payable till three months after the testator's death, is one of the ingredients to be taken into the account." That decision seems in point, and I must follow it. It may be remarked that the Vice-Chancellor took the view that in the case of an ordinary legacy the widow would have been entitled to interest from the testator's death—which has since been held to be wrong. The fact that he took that view makes the decision stronger.

Vendor and purchaser—Sale under order of court—Conditions as to possession—Conditions of tenancy—Non-payment of rent by outgoing tenant—Distress by receiver—Statute of 8 Anne, c. 18, s. 7.

P. was yearly tenant of a farm under a written agreement, which provided (inter alia) that, in the last year of his tenancy, he should consume on the farm all the hay, &c., produced thereon; that he should stack in the barns and rick yards all the corn, grain, and hay produced, and the hay, straw, &c., were to be consumed by cattle, and the dung, &c., to be left on the premises, for which purpose he was to have the use of the barns and yards necessary until the 25th of March next after the end of the tenancy; that the landlord or the incoming tenant should be at liberty to enter upon the lands and prepare them for seeds, &c.; that the tenant should also leave for the landlord or incoming tenant "all the hay, straw, and roots remaining unconsumed, being paid or allowed for the same"; and that, at the end of the tenancy, the landlord or the incoming tenant should allow to him for the manure and other things done, and "for the unconsumed hay, straw, and roots."

The farm was sold under the order of the court to A., subject to "such tenant right as the occupier might be entitled to on quitting"; and by one of the conditions the purchaser was to pay the balance of his purchase-money on or before the 29th of September, 1890; and upon payment he was to be entitled to possession of the farm as from the 29th of September, from which day he was to pay all outgoings.

P.'s tenancy expired at Michaelmas, 1890. A. paid his purchase-money into court on the 13th of October, 1890, and he was let into possession, but only on the terms of the above contract of tenancy, and no conveyance had been executed. The rent payable by P. at Michaelmas, 1890, had not been paid; and on the 24th of October a distress was put in by H., the receiver appointed in the action, and under it certain stacks of hay and straw produced during the last year of the tenancy were seized.

A. moved for an injunction to restrain the receiver from remaining in possession of, or from removing or selling any of, the distrained goods.

Held, that the legal reversioners were entitled to distrain on the goods of the tenant, but were in equity trustees for the purchaser, and could not exercise their rights so as to prevent his enjoying every benefit of his ownership.

Held, also, that the statute of 8 Anne, c. 18, did not apply to such a case.

Cur. adv. vult.

November 21.—STIRLING, J.—This is a motion on behalf of the defendant, Frederick Archdale, that Edward Hart, the receiver appointed in the action, and the bailiffs or agents employed by him, may be restrained from remaining in possession of the goods distrained by the said Edward Hart as receiver on the 24th of October, 1890, or from removing or selling any of the said goods. The applicant is a defendant, but he is also purchaser upon a sale by the court under conditions stating the property to be "in the occupation of Mr. Herbert Powers, whose tenancy expires at Michaelmas," 1890; and to be sold subject to "such tenant right as the occupier might be entitled to on quitting." By condition 14 the purchase-money was to be paid on or before the 29th of September last; and it is provided that the purchaser of each lot was, upon payment of his purchase-money, to be entitled to possession as from the 29th of September, from which day all outgoings were to be paid by the purchasers, and such rents, profits, and outgoings should, if necessary, be apportioned by the judge at chambers. The purchase-money was paid on the 13th of October, 1890; the purchaser was let into possession; and there is nothing to show that he was let in otherwise than under the terms of the contract. No conveyance has yet been executed, and the legal estate is vested in the plaintiffs.

Herbert Powers held under an agreement dated the 20th of December, 1884, by which it was first provided that the tenancy was to be from year to year, commencing on the 29th of September, 1884, determinable at the end of any year by a year's notice to quit by either party, at the yearly rent of £625, payable half-yearly on the 25th of March and the 29th of September in every year, the first payment to be made on the 25th of March, 1885.

The 9th condition of tenancy was that the tenant should in the last year of the tenancy spend and consume on the farm and lands all hay, straw, grain, crops, and fodder, dung, and manure, produced and made there, the dung and manure to be spread over the lands in a husband-like manner; except that he should be at liberty to remove hay and straw, if, for every ton of hay and straw so removed, he brought and consumed on the farm at last three tons of good rotten dung or other manure of equal goodness.

Condition 10 was that the tenant should stock in the barns and rick yards, in the last year of the tenancy, all the corn, grain, and hay produced on the premises, the corn and grain to be there threshed out, and all the hay, straw, chaff, stubble, and fodder to be there consumed by cattle, and the dung, manure, compost, or soil thereon arising to be left on of the debt. So far as it conveys the estate, the assignment is absolute and complete the moment it is made according to the forms of law. Undoubtedly it is not necessary to give notice to the mortgagor that the mortgage has been assigned in order to make it valid and effectual. The estate being absolute at law, the debtor has no means of redeeming it but by paying the money. Therefore, he who has the estate has, in effect, the debt, as the estate can never be taken from him except by payment of the debt. With regard to the mere bond or covenant, which perhaps may accompany the mortgage, it is said that all the ceremonies declared to be necessary as to debts in general ought to be observed. But it is difficult to say the mortgage passes and is well assigned to one person and yet the debt remains in another. It is impossible that it can be so divided. Therefore, by the assignment of the mortgage, the debt necessarily passes as incident to it, and it is clear that, to constitute a valid assignment, notice to the mortgagor is not necessary. In Walvyn v. The Assignees of Shepherd, 4 Ves. 119, the bankrupt had deposited a mortgage and bond; and Lord Alvanley decreed that the assignees should execute a valid assignment, yet the mortgagor had no notice whatever of the deposit. It would be strange to say a mere deposit should be effectual against the assignees, and a valid and complete assignment should not. These mortgage debts, therefore, passed by the assignment of the mortgages, and the plaintiffs are not entitled to any account of them." That was a clear decision that the title of the particular assignee prevailed as against the assignees in bankruptcy. That was followed in Ex parte Mackay, In re Wright, 1 Mont. D. & D. 550, and Ex parte Barnett, 1 De G. 194. Those were all bankruptcy cases, but the same principle was recognized by Lord Hatherley in In re Hughes' Trusts, 12 W. R. 1025, 2 H. & M. 89, where he takes notice of the difference between that case and the case of an equitable mortgage. He says, at the end of his judgment: "The case of an equitable mortgagee is quite different. Suppose it is one mortgage, it is quite plain that it is different, because one mortgagee, if he has an equitable estate in the land of which he is the cestui que trust, may at any time require his trustees to convey that equitable estate to him. If it should happen that there are several mortgagees, if a single mortgagee could require to have the estate conveyed to him, it follows that if all the mortgagees concur they are tenants in common of the mortgage, and, all of them concurring, could have it either conveyed to themselves, in order to secure their several mortgage debts, or conveyed to trustees for them, they joining as one individual in making that request. They have a distinct estate in equity in the land itself, which is a case entirely different from the position of persons merely having an interest in the money which is to be produced by sale or mortgage, as they had in Lee v. Howlett, 4 W. R. 406, 2 K. & J. 531, and as they had in Foster v. Cockerell, 3 Cl. & F. 456." So that from the time of Sir W. Grant down to that of Lord Hatherley the rule has prevailed that, as between the particular assignee and the assignee in bankruptcy, the title of the particular assignee prevails.

That being the state of the authorities, I hold in this case that the bank are not entitled to priority by reason of having given notice before the executors, and their claim, therefore, fails.

DURHAM COUNTY COUNCIL v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE CHESTER-LE-STREET POOR LAW UNION. (a.)

Poor rate — Rateability — Industrial schools — Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 3 (vii.).

An industrial school had been established (under the Industrial Schools Acts, 1866 and 1872) by the justices of a county, and had been transferred, under section 3 (vii.) of the Local Government Act, 1888, to the county council.

*Held, that it was not occupied on behalf of the Crown, and was liable to be rated for the relief of the poor.

Special case stated for the opinion of the court.

The material facts stated in the case were as follows:—

In the year 1881 the Court of Quarter Sessions of the County of Durham, professing to act as the prison authority for the county, resolved to establish a county industrial school under the Industrial Schools Acts, 1866 and 1872, and submitted to the Home Secretary the plans of a farm, partly freehold and partly copyhold of inheritance, at Earl's House, near the city of Durham (being the farm mentioned in the assessment), which they proposed to purchase for the purpose. The Home Secretary signified his approval of the intended purchase on the 17th of August, 1881, and by an indenture and surrender, both dated the 6th of July, 1883, the farm was conveyed to the Clerk of the Peace of the County of Durham, and his successors in office, upon trust for the purposes of the Industrial Schools Acts, 1866 and 1872. The indenture recited the purchase of the farm by quarter sessions as the prison authority, and the approval of the Home Secretary, as before stated.

The purchase-money of the farm, and the costs of the building and furniture, were paid out of moneys borrowed by the county justices under the Prisons Authorities Act, 1874, on security of the county rate.

On the 29th of June, 1885, the Home Secretary certified that the new school was fit for the reception of children under section 7 of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866. The school was opened on the 2nd of July, 1885, and has since subsisted as a certified industrial school within the meaning of the Acts above mentioned.

In addition to the officers' apartments, the school comprises accommodation for 150 boys, including a cottage-hospital and workshops, in which they are taught trades, such as shoemaking and carpentering, by schoolmasters who form part of the regular staff. There is also a hind-house, in which a farm bailiff resides, under whose direction the boys are employed in tilling the farm. The farm and the building above mentioned are of reasonable size, having regard to the purposes for which they are required, and afford no accommodation further than such as is essential for the proper employment and education of the boys. The revenue of the school consists—firstly, of the grants in aid paid by the Government under the Industrial Schools Acts; secondly, of payments made in respect of boys committed to the school, but not at the cost of the county; and, thirdly, of the proceeds of the boys' work, and of the sale of the surplus produce of the farm, the bulk of which produce, however, is consumed in the school. These sums together have not been in any year sufficient to defray the expenses of the school, and a considerable sum has been raised annually out of the county rates to meet the deficiency.

Until the 1st of April, 1889, the school was under the management of quarter sessions, but on that day the Local Government Act, 1888, came into operation, by section 3 (vii.) of which all business done by quarter sessions, or any of its committees, in respect of the establishment and maintenance of, and the contribution to, industrial schools," was transferred to the county council. Since the last-mentioned day it has been assumed, as between the quarter sessions and the county council, that the effect of the Act is to transfer the management also of the school to the county council, and the school has in fact been managed by the county council, but there has been no fresh appointment of superintendent, although some changes have been made among the minor officers. The usual deficiency was made up last year (as before) out of the county rate. The valuation list of the said union was duly made and approved by the assessment committee of the said union, and the county council gave notice of objection against the same, but failed to obtain relief. The rate now appealed against was made in conformity with such valuation list.

Walton, Q.C. (Simey with him), for the appellants (the County Council).—Prisons are not rateable: Gambier v. Overseers of Lydford, 2 W. R. 226, 3 E. & B. 346; and industrial schools ought to follow the same rule. These industrial schools are incapable of being rated, for there is no beneficial occupation of them: Mersey Docks v. Cameron, 13 W. R. 1069, 11 H. L. Cas. 443; Coomber v. The Justices of Berks, 32 W. R. 525, 9 App. Cas. 61. Moreover, these schools never could be beneficially occupied, they are property "struck with sterility," and therefore if rated, their value should be returned as nil—West Bromwich School Board v. Overseers of West Bromwich, 32 W. R. 866, 13 Q. B. D. 929. Two recent cases as to the rateability of reformatory schools bear out the case for the appellants: Reg. v. West Derby, L. R. 10 Q. B. 283, 23 W. R. Dig. 153, and Tunnicliffe v. Overseers of Birkdale, 36 W. R. 360, 20 Q. B. D. 450. Those were both cases of schools established by private persons and maintained by private funds, and the decisions that they were rateable turned upon the fact that they were private institutions. See per Lord Esher, M.R., in the latter case. In the present case the schools are public institutions, and do not fall within those decisions.

R. S. Wright (R. Cunningham Glen with him), for the respondents (the Union).—These schools are not incapable of beneficial occupation. The county council could at any time cease to carry on the school and let these premises at a rent. The case is similar to the case of a board school, which was considered capable of beneficial occupation in London School Board v. St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, 34 W. R. 583, 17 Q. B. D. 738, followed in Burton v. Burton Union, 38 W. R. 181, 24 Q. B. D. 197. This school is, therefore, not exempt as being "struck with sterility." Neither is it exempt as being Crown property, and to be classed as a prison. Neither in the hands of the justices nor when transferred to the county council can it be said to have been used for Crown purposes.

They also referred to The Justices of Lancashire v. Cheetham, 16 W. R. 124, L. R. 3 Q. B. 14, and Martin v. West Derby Union, 31 W. R. 489, 11 Q. B. D. 145.

Walton, Q.C., replied.

DAY, J.—The question arising upon this special case is whether a particular industrial school is or is not rateable. The history of the school is shortly this. It was established by the county justices and sanctioned by the Home Secretary. It was carried on and managed under the control of the justices until the Local Government Act, 1888, was passed; since then, together with other buildings formerly under the control of the justices, it was transferred to the county council. We have to say whether it is rateable.

Now primâ facie all property is rateable to the relief of the poor, but there are certain exceptions. Crown property is, of course, exempt; under that head fall post offices and other offices which are under the direct control of servants of the Crown. Another head of exemption comprises buildings which are occupied quasi for the Crown, such as assize courts, county courts, prisons, and other similar buildings; these also are exempt from rating. It was contended that industrial schools come under this head. But an industrial school is not a prison; it is true that persons who are sent there are obliged to remain there, but that does not constitute a prison. It was said that they exist solely for the benefit of the public; but that remark would apply to many classes of property, and it does not affect the question of rating. Neither does the fact of the school having been built with public money. Probably that is the case with all industrial schools in the first instance. It has been decided that industrial schools supported by private money are rateable, and I do not think that the fact of the school being controlled and managed by public officials affects its rateability. It is said that certain passages of the judgments relating to private schools show that had they been public the cases would have been differently decided. I do not agree with that argument Judges decide a particular case upon reasons which are satisfactory to them as to that case, and their reasoning cannot be applied to other states of fact.

It seems to me that this building was rateable when it was in the hands of the justices. It is now in the hands of the county council, and, whatever may be said about the justices, it certainly cannot be contended that the county council are servants of the Crown. Even when in the hands of the justices this building was not used by them as a court for them to sit in (in which case it would not have been rateable). It was rateable in the hands of the justices, and à fortiori it is rateable in the hands of the county council.

The other argument in favour of the appellants was that this school could not be beneficially occupied, that it was, in fact, "struck with sterility." But that is not so. The county council may give the school up at any moment; they might sell or let it. I can conceive of a tenant of these buildings. The existence of the school as an industrial school depends on the licence of the Home Secretary, and on its withdrawal the school would come to an end; so that its present condition is clearly not necessarily permanent. I think, therefore, that the argument addressed to us on behalf of the appellants fail, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am precisely of the same opinion. I think that this school is entirely in the same position as a reformatory school. The justices were not, as managers of the school, acting as servants of the Crown. They could have parted with the school at any moment.

Appeal dismissed.

In re COSTER & TACK. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Bankruptcy—Petition by debtor—Refusal of trustee to pay costs—Previous payments made by debtor to solicitor—Alleged fraudulent preference—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 125.

A trustee in bankruptcy cannot refuse to pay out of the estate the taxed costs of the solicitor appearing for the debtor on the filing of his own petition, by reason of the fact that certain payments have been made by the debtor to such solicitor shortly before the bankruptcy, which the trustee is of opinion amount to a fraudulent preference; but in such case the trustee must pay the taxed costs of the solicitor, and move the court to set aside the previous payments in the ordinary way.

Application by the solicitor acting for the debtor on the presentation of his own petition for an order directing the trustee in the bankruptcy to pay out of the estate the petitioning debtor's costs, which had been duly certified by the taxing master.

In June, 1890, the applicant was instructed to appear for the debtor on the filing of his petition, in respect of which he subsequently carried in his bill of costs for taxation. On July 31, 1890, these costs were duly certified by the taxing master at £44 16s., but application for payment of this sum out of the estate was refused by the trustee.

The reasons stated by the trustee for this refusal were that he had discovered that shortly before the filing of the petition two sums of £60 and £40 respectively had been received by the solicitor from the debtor, which the trustee alleged to amount to a fraudulent preference, and he claimed the right to set off the costs due against these sums.

Application was now made to the court to enforce payment.

Muir Mackenzie, for the solicitor.—The contention of the trustee is wholly inadmissible. The previous payments were made in respect of services rendered before the petition, and the solicitor has a perfect right to retain them. But if the trustee is of opinion that those payments constitute a fraudulent preference, his proper course is to proceed by motion in the ordinary way. He cannot claim a right of set-off in this way. The costs are payable under rule 125 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886.

Mellor (Herbert Reed with him), for the trustee.—The debtor's petition was filed by the solicitor on June 15, 1890. The trustee has found that on May 13 and May 27, 1890, the sums of £40 and £60 respectively were paid by the debtor to the solicitor. The trustee claims the right of set-off, as he says these payments were a fraudulent preference.

CAVE, J.—This contention of the trustee cannot be entertained. His proper course is not to take the step he has taken, but to move to set the payments aside as a fraudulent preference. The trustee must pay this amount, and if he thinks fit he can make his motion. The plan he has adopted is a most inconvenient one, and the application must be allowed, with costs.

Application allowed.

NUNNELEY v. NUNNELEY AND MARRIAN. (a.)

Divorce—Decree absolute—Variation of Scottish settlement—22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 5.

The court has power, under 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 52, after a dissolution of marriage, to vary a settlement made according to the Scottish law, in contemplation of the marriage of a Scottish woman to a domiciled Englishman.

Motion to confirm the registrar's report on a petition by the husband for variation of settlements after a decree absolute dissolving the marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery.

The petitioner was a domiciled Englishman, and the respondent's domicile of origin was Scotch. Two settlements were executed in contemplation of marriage, the first, relating to the petitioner's property, was in the English form, the second, dealing with the respondent's property, real estate in Scotland, and personalty invested in securities, was in the Scottish form. It was agreed before the registrar that the wife's interest under the first settlement should be extinguished as though she were dead; but the trustees of the second settlement objected to an arrangement agreed on between the parties on the ground that it was for the court in Scotland, before which the matter was pending, to decide what should be done, especially having regard to the interests of the children, inasmuch as the Scottish law would regard the wife as dead by reason of her having been proved guilty of adultery.

June 10.—Middleton, for the petitioner, asked for the confirmation of the report under the powers contained in section 5 of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61.

Barnard, for the respondent, consented.

Deane, for the trustees, asked this court not to make an order until the Court of Session in Scotland had made their order, otherwise the trustees would be liable to have two orders made against them, one in Scotland, to pay half to the children, and one here, to pay one-third. The law of Scotland treats the wife as physically dead, and the property included in the Scottish settlement must be bound by that law: Harvey v. Farquhar, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 192.

Middleton, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 24.—HANNEN, P.—The question in this case is a simple one. It is the case of a Scottish lady married in Scotland, and whose property was included in a Scottish settlement. Her husband was a domiciled Englishman, and his property was included in an English settlement. The simple question is whether I have power to deal with the property included in the Scottish settlement. The language of the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61 is very large. Section 5 provides that "the court, after a final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage, may inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents as to the court shall seem fit." I am clearly of opinion that that power extends to a settlement.

though made in another country according to the law of that country. It is clear that the wife here, by marrying an Englishman, acquired his domicile, and became subject to the law of England. I therefore see no reason to doubt that I have the power to make the order asked for to vary the settlement, and as it seems greatly to the advantage of the children. The petitioner's and trustee's costs to be paid out of the fund.

"THE CARRON PARK." (a.)

Shipping — Charter-party — Exemption — "Neglect or default" of crew during the voyage—Effect on claims for general average contribution of clause exempting shipowner from negligence.

The owners of a ship entered into a charter-party whereby they agreed that the ship should proceed to a specified loading port and there load a cargo, and, being so loaded, should therewith proceed to her port of discharge and there deliver the same, the act of God or any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, crew, or other servants of the shipowners during the said voyage always excepted. The ship duly arrived in a seaworthy condition at her loading port and commenced taking her cargo on board, but, before the loading was completed, a portion of it already shipped was, whilst the ship was lying at her mooring berth, damaged by water which accumulated in her hold, in consequence of one of her engineers having negligently left open a valve in her engine room. To recover for the damage so occasioned, the cargo owners brought an action for breach of contract against the shipowners, and the shipowners counter-claimed therein for expenses incurred by them in respect of discharging and warehousing the damaged cargo belonging to the plaintiffs and pumping the water out of the ship.

Held, that the damage proceeded for had arisen from the neglect or default of one of the crew during the said voyage within the meaning of the exemption contained in the charter-party, and that, consequently, the plaintiffs' claim must be dismissed.

Held, also, that the defendants were entitled to recover the amounts claimed by them in their counter-claim as general average on the cargo.

This was an action for breach of contract instituted on behalf of J. V. Drake & Co. against the Cathcart Steamship Co. (Limited), the owners of the steamship Carron Park, to recover the damages the plaintiffs had sustained by reason of a portion of a cargo of sugar belonging to them, and laden on board The Carron Park, having been damaged by water which had accumulated in The Carron Park owing to one of her engineers having negligently left open a valve in her engine room when she was lying moored at a loading berth, to which she had proceeded under the terms of a charter-party exempting the shipowners from liability for the act of God or any neglect or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, crew, or other servants of the shipowners "during the said voyage."

The defendants appeared, and denied liability, and claimed, by way of counter-claim, to recover certain expenses, incurred by them in saving, discharging, and warehousing the portion of cargo damaged as above mentioned, and in the common safety and preservation of ship and cargo, which were in danger by reason of The Carron Park making water on the occasion when such portion of cargo was so damaged.

March 25, 26.—On these days the action was heard before the President.

L. Batten, for the plaintiffs.—The exemption from liability for the negligence of the crew in this case only came into operation on the ship sailing from her loading port: Steel v. The State Line Steamship Co., 3 App. Cas. 72, 26 W. R. Dig. 216; Tattersall v. The National Steamship Co., 32 W. R. 567, 12 Q. B. D. 297; and, therefore, cannot exonerate the defendants from the consequence of their ship having been unseaworthy before leaving that port and at a time when "the voyage" referred to by the charter-party cannot be deemed to have commenced: Crow v. Falk, 8 Q. B. 467. The defendants are not entitled to the expenses claimed by them by way of counter-claim. Such expenses would not have been incurred but for the negligence of the crew of The Carron Park, and are, therefore, under the decision in Schloss v. Heriot, 11 W. R. 596, 14 C. B. N. S. 59, expenses to which the cargo owners are not required to contribute: Fawcus v. Sarsfield, 6 E. & B. 192, 4 W. R. C. L. Dig. 177. To hold otherwise would be to make the exemptions from negligenc, econtained in the charter-party, and intended only to modify the liability of the shipowner under his contract of carriage, alter the law of general average, the principles of which do not depend on contract: Burton v. English, 32 W. R. 655, 12 Q. B. D. 218; Crooks v. Allan, 28 W. R. 304, 5 Q. B. D. 38; Schmidt v. The Royal Mail Steamship Co., 45 L. J. Q. B. 646, 24 W. R. Dig. 263; Pirie v. The Middle Dock Co., 4 Asp. He also referred to the following authorities:—Kopitoff v. Wilson, 24 W. R. 706, 1 Q. B. D. 377; Cohn v. Davidson, 25 W. R. 369, 22 Q. B. D. 455; The Glenfruin, 33 W. R. 826, 10 P. Barnes, Q.C., and J. Walton, for the defendants, relied on Barker v. McAndrew, 13 W. R. 779, 18 C. B. N. S. 757; Bruce v. Nicopulo, 3 W. D. 187, as showing that the damage complained of by the plaintiffs had occurred "during the voyage" within the meaning of the charter-party, and that the exemptions in the charter-party must be taken into consideration in determining whether general average csntribution was due from the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

HANNEN, P. — The plaintiffs, Messrs. Drake & Co., sued the defendants, the owners of The Carron Park, for breach of charter-party, entered into on the 9th of October, 1889, by which it was agreed that The Carron Park, therein described as "now on passage Fraserburgh to Libau," being "now tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage," should proceed to New Fairwater and should there load a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to Greenock and there deliver the same," the act of God, or any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, crew, or other servants of the shipowners during the said voyage always excepted." The Carron Park arrived in New Fairwater in ballast on the 13th of October, being at the time tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted to receive and carry a cargo in accordance with the charter-party. On the 14th of October the loading of the cargo was commenced, and continued until the evening of the 15th of October, but it was not then completed. On the morning of the 16th of October it was discovered that three feet of water had found its way into the vessel through a valve in the engine room, which had been negligently left open by one of the engineers of the vessel during the night of the 15th. In all other respects the vessel was in good condition. In consequence of the water thus getting in the plaintiffs' cargo was damaged, and the plaintiffs have incurred expenses. Other expenses were incurred by the defendants in discharging and warehousing the cargo, and pumping the water out of the vessel. The plaintiffs claim damages for the injury sustained by their cargo in the above circumstances. The defendants deny their liability, alleging that the injury was caused by the neglect or default of the engineers of the said vessel during the said voyage, and that, therefore, it is within the excepted perils enumerated in the charter-party. The defendants also counter-claim for general average contribution for expenses incurred by them in saving, discharging, and warehousing the plaintiffs' goods, and otherwise for the common safety of the ship and cargo.

There can be no doubt that the defendants would, unless exempted by the last clause of the charter-party, be liable for the damage caused to the plaintiffs' cargo by the admission of water to the hold of the vessel. It arose from the direct negligence of the defendants' servants and was a breach of the obligation of the shipowner that his servants should not be negligent in and about the carrying of the goods. The question then arises, whether the shipowners have freed themselves from liability for this negligence by the terms of the charter-party, which stipulates that they shall not be responsible for any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of their servants "during the said voyage." It was contended for the plaintiffs that this only related to the voyage from New Fairwater to Greenock, and did not include the period of time during which the vessel was being loaded. For this contention the case of Crow v. Falk was cited. There the Court of Queen's Bench held, that "during the voyage" could only apply to the time after the voyage commenced, and that the voyage could not begin before the ship's loading had been completed. Willes, J., who was counsel for the successful party in Crow v. Falk, stated in his judgment in the case of Baker v. McAndrew that he did not concur in the judgment in Crow v. Falk. In Baker v. McAndrew it was decided that where a ship was described as then at N., being tight and staunch, and was to proceed to the usual place of loading at N., and there load and proceed to A. with the usual exceptions "during the voyage," that the voyage commenced from her starting from her then berth, and that the exception applied to the preliminary transit to the port of loading. In Bruce v. Nicopulo Pollock, B., stated that he could not subscribe to the case of Crow v. Falk, and held, with the other members of the court, that a preliminary voyage was to be considered part of the voyage contemplated by the contract.

These cases appear to me to be conclusive in the present case, and to lead to a result consistent with the intention of the parties, for I cannot doubt that the exemption was intended to apply, not only to the time after the vessel left the port of loading, but also to the whole time during which this vessel was engaged in performing the contract contained in the charter. It was further argued that the leaving open of the valve rendered the ship unseaworthy, and that thus the defendants were liable for breach of warranty. It is admitted that the vessel was, when the loading commenced, fit to receive and carry the cargo, and that it was during an interval in the loading that the water was by the negligence of the engineer allowed to enter the ship and damage the cargo already there. Holding, as I do, that the exemption extends to a period anterior to the vessel leaving New Fairwater, the negligent letting of the water into the vessel would be within the exemption. It did not render the vessel unseaworthy for the reception of this cargo, which had already been loaded on board the vessel when in good condition. It is, for the purposes now under consideration, as though during the passage from New Fairwater the valve had been negligently opened: that is, as Lord Blackburn said in the case of Steel v. The State Line Steamship Co., like leaving a port hole open at sea, negligence on the part of the crew, and not unseaworthiness of the ship.

With regard to the counter-claim for general average, I think the defendants are entitled to recover. The claim for contribution as general average cannot be maintained where it arises out of any negligence for which the shipowner is responsible; but negligence for which he is not responsible is as foreign to him as to the person who has suffered by it. The loss would not have fallen on the shipowner, and the expenditure or sacrifice made by him is not to avert loss from himself alone, but from the cargo owner.

This question was considered in the case of Strang, Steel, & Co. v. Scott & Co. That was a case of jettisoned cargo. Lord Watson, in delivering judgment, says: "The fault of the master being matter of admission, it seems clear upon authority that no contribution can be recovered by the owners of the ship unless the conditions ordinarily existing between parties standing in that relation have been varied by special contract between them and the shippers." Here it appears to me that the relation of the goods' owner to the shipowner has been altered by the contract that the shipowner shall not be responsible for the negligence of his servants in the events which have happened. I therefore give judgment for the defendants on the claim and counter-claim, with costs.

GOWER v. TOBITT. (a.)

Practice—Trial—Motion for new trial—Action tried before official referee—Court in which to move—Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), s. 1.

Where there has been a trial before an official referee, a motion for a new trial must be made in the Queen's Bench Division, and not in the Court of Appeal.

Application on behalf of the plaintiff that a motion for a new trial should be taken out of the new trial paper in the Court of Appeal and transferred for hearing to the Queen's Bench Division. The whole cause had been ordered to be tried before an official referee, and the referee having found in favour of the plaintiff, the defendant gave notice of motion for a new trial.

H. Newson, for the plaintiff.—The Judicature Act, 1890, only applies to actions tried with a jury. The present case was tried before an official referee, and so the motion must be set down for hearing in the Divisional Court.

R. A. Germaine, for the defendant.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case we think that, looking at the Judicature Act, 1890, the only applications which under that Act can be made for new trials to this court are in cases where there has been a trial with a jury. In this case there has not been a trial with a jury; the trial has been before an official referee. Therefore in our opinion the case does not come within the terms of the Act, and the application for a new trial should not be made to this court, but to the Divisional Court. I have communicated with Pollock, B., who is now presiding in the Divisional Court, and the motion for a new trial will be transferred to that court.

In re SANDBACH AND EDMONDSON'S CONTRACT. (b.)

Vendor and purchaser—Defective title—Misleading condition of sale—Condition requiring purchaser to assume facts believed to be true—Non-disclosure of dependence of title on facts to be assumed.

The title of persons, claiming under a trustee of real property, to the beneficial ownership (under the doctrine of Burgess v. Wheate, 1 Eden. 177) of the same property (the trusts affecting it having become exhausted in 1876) depended on the death intestate without heirs before 1870 of the original settlor, who was believed (though legal proof was wanting) to have so died in 1851; and no claim had in fact ever been made by anyone as his heir. The property was sold in 1890 under conditions of sale one of which required the purchaser to assume that the settlor did in fact die before 1870 intestate and without an heir; but the condition contained nothing to show that the title depended entirely on the facts which the purchaser was required to assume, or to explain how or why it so depended. A vendor and purchaser summons having been taken out, the vendor and his solicitor deposed to their belief that the facts were as the purchaser was required to assume.

Held (affirming the decision of Bristowe, V.C.), that, under the circumstances, the condition was not a misleading one, but was aptly and properly framed to prevent the purchaser from insisting on proof of what was then, and was still, believed to be the fact (though the vendor was not in a position to furnish legal proof of it), and that the condition was accordingly binding on the purchaser.

Appeal from Bristowe, V.C. (Lancaster Palatine Court of Chancery).

Four cottages in Bridge-street, Manchester, were put up for sale in February, 1890, by Joseph Sandbach, and purchased by one Booth, as agent for James Edmondson. The conditions of sale under which the cottages were sold incorporated the general conditions of sale of the Manchester Law Society, and also included the following special conditions (amongst others):—" 3. The title shall commence with an indenture of settlement dated the 10th day of June, 1848, and made between John Bouchier of the first part, Frederick Calvert and Michael Pease Calvert of the second part, Robert Broome of the third part, and Mary Whittaker of the fourth part. 4. The purchaser shall assume that the said John Bouchier died intestate and without an heir before the year 1870."

Robert Broome the elder, who was the person referred to in special condition 3, claimed to be absolutely entitled to the property, on the principle of Burgess v. Wheate, 1 Eden. 177, as a trustee of trust property the trusts of which were exhausted, and the settlor whereof had died intestate and without heirs prior to the coming into operation of the Intestates' Estates Act of 1884. It appeared that by an indenture of settlement of the 10th of June, 1848, which recited that John Bouchier was entitled in fee simple to the property about to be assigned, subject to the original rent therein mentioned, but that the legal estate was outstanding in the said F. Calvert and M. P. Calvert, the property was conveyed by Bouchier and the Calverts to Robert Broome (the elder), his heirs and assigns, upon trust to pay the rents and profits to Mary Whittaker (afterwards Mary Broome) for life for her separate use, and after her decease upon trust for the settlor, his heirs and assigns, and upon and for no other trusts, intent, or purpose whatsoever. It was supposed that John Bouchier, the settlor, had died in 1851 intestate and without an heir, and evidence as to their belief in this behalf was given by the vendor, Mr. Sandbach, and his solicitor, but there was no legal proof of the fact. Robert Broome the elder died in November, 1870, having by his will devised all his real estate to trustees upon trust for his nephew Robert Broome the younger and his assigns for his life without impeachment of waste. The testator had been in possession of the settled property and the title deeds down to the time of his death, but had paid over the income of the property (according to the trusts of the settlement) to Mary Broome, and after his death his trustees continued in possession, and paid over the income to Mary Broome until her death in 1876. After her death the trustees remained in possession until 1886, retaining the rents as part of their testator's estate. No claim had ever been made to the property by anyone claiming as the heir of John Bouchier.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the year 1886 Robert Broome the younger took possession of the rents and profits under an order of the court as devisee for life under the will of Robert Broome the elder, and he subsequently sold the property to the vendor under the powers of the Settled Land Act, 1882. From the death of Mary Broome, therefore, until that sale there had been uninterrupted possession of the property and the rents and profits thereof, successively, first, by the trustees of R. Broome the elder, and then by R. Broome the younger. On the sale to Mr. Edmondson, the present purchaser, the abstract of title was sent in due course, and in March, 1890, the purchaser sent in his objections and requisitions on title. The first objection was that it did not appear from the conditions what estate John Bouchier took, and that condition four did not sufficiently disclose the importance of the fact which the purchaser was required to assume, and that he was, therefore, not bound by it; and the purchaser accordingly demanded evidence of the death of John Bouchier intestate and without an heir. The vendor replied to this by stating his belief in the truth of the facts required to be assumed, and offered to search for proof at the purchaser's expense. Some correspondence having taken place, the vendor took out a summons in the Palatine Court under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, asking for a declaration that the requisition had been sufficiently answered, that the purchaser was precluded by the conditions of sale from making such a requisition, and that a good title had been shown in accordance with the particulars and conditions of sale.

Bristowe, V.C., held that the conditions of sale contained no suggestio falsi, no suppressio veri, no misrepresentation, and no ambiguity, and he made a declaration in the terms of the summons.

The purchaser, Mr. Edmondson, appealed.

Haldane, Q.C., and Ernest Radford, for the appellant.—The purchaser cannot get a marketable title. No mortgagee would lend money on the title the purchaser is asked to accept. [BOWEN, L.J.—Can you raise the point on a vendor and purchaser summons?] This is a small purchase, and the other side do not object to have the question decided in the cheapest way. It was allowed in In re Marsh and Earl Granville, 31 W. R. 239, 845, 24 Ch. D. 11. [Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—Why are you not bound by the fourth condition?] That condition was dishonest and misleading. The purchaser knew nothing of the real facts, but the vendor knew not only that he could not prove what the purchaser was required to assume, but also that a previous purchaser had thrown up his bargain on account of the defect. A vendor is bound to give a purchaser an opportunity of seeing what the defect is so as to enable him to decide whether he will buy with less than a marketable title. Here the entire title depends on this assumption. The use of a date so far back as 1870 is calculated to make a purchaser suppose he is getting a possessory title, and thus throw him off his guard. If a vendor is going to cut down the statutory title, he is bound to make a full disclosure of the real facts. It is dishonest to conceal a material fact which is within the knowledge of the vendor, and which, if disclosed, would deter the purchaser from purchasing. The vendor ought to have disclosed the fact that the title depended entirely on the facts required to be assumed. No one could have gathered from these conditions what the point was. Where a condition does not point directly to the defect, the purchaser is not precluded from objecting to it: Cruse v. Nowell, 4 W. R. 619, 2 Jur. N. S. 536; Seaton v. Mapp, 2 Coll. 562; Rhodes v. Ibbetson, 4 De G. M. & G. 787, at p. 792, 2 W. R. Ch. Dig. 99. "All the material facts must be known to both parties": Ellard v. Lord Llandaff, 1 Ball. & B. 241, at p. 251. [Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Rutherford, for the vendor, took the objection that the question could not be tried upon a vendor and purchaser summons if the purchaser was going to take the ground of fraud or dishonesty in the conditions.] It is too late to raise that objection. [Lord HALSBURY, L.C., pointed out that by section 9 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, the questions raiseable on these summonses were limited by the words "not being a question affecting the existence or validity of the contract," and that the whole scheme of the Act seemed inconsistent with trying such a question as that now raised on these summonses.] The Vice-Chancellor decided the case on the ground of construction, but there is jurisdiction to decide more than a mere question of construction: Marsh v. Earl Granville. A former purchaser who threw up his contract on account of this very defect in the title was asked by the vendor not to attend this sale. [Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—You cannot go into that on this summons. It is a question affecting the validity of the contract. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C.—There was no evidence on this point before the Vice-Chancellor.] At any rate, the order of the Vice-Chancellor goes too far in affirming the validity of the contract. The condition does not sufficiently disclose the importance of the assumption required. There is nothing to show the existence of the relationship of trustee and cestui que trust between Broome and Bouchier. The purchaser is entitled to the beneficial title, and not merely to the legal title, as the vendor appears to suppose. The purchaser, if he accepted this title, might be involved in a breach of trust. If such a condition were binding trustees could sell to themselves. The court will not encourage conditions which do not clearly disclose the blot: Heywood v. Mallalieu, 32 W. R. 538, 25 Ch. D. 357. A condition in general terms will not preclude a purchaser from taking a specific objection which is known to the vendor: Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 34 W. R. 405, 15 Q. B. D. 261, 16 Q. B. D. 778, at pp. 786, 789.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Rutherford, for the vendor.—[Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—We should like to hear you, Mr. Hardy, as to the point that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust subsisting between Broome and Bouchier was not, but ought to have been, disclosed. BOWEN, L.J.—If a vendor, knowing of a blot on his title, frames the conditions so that the blot may escape detection, will a court of equity enforce the contract?] Yes, in such a case as this, where the condition is made merely to preclude proof being required when no proof is available. There was quite enough in the condition to put the purchaser on his guard and enable him to infer the state of the title and the object of the condition. The condition is a perfectly proper and usual one, and cannot be fairly described as misleading. The purchaser was only required to assume that which the vendor believed, and still believes, to be true, though he was not in a position to prove it. It is not necessary for a vendor in such a case to point out the exact defect. It would be different if the purchaser were required to assume what the vendor knew to be untrue, or did not believe to be true. There is no case which requires a vendor to point out the defect in his title where the purchaser is merely required to make an assumption which the vendor believes to be true. If it were necessary to do so half the land in the country would be rendered unsaleable, for there is much as to which, though there may be no positive flaw, there is deficiency of evidence.

Haldane, Q.C., replied. Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 17.—Lord HALSBURY, C.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. There can be no doubt that in terms Mr. Edmondson is precluded by the fourth of the special conditions of sale from making or raising the requisition and objection upon which the question now arises, if that special condition can be insisted upon by the vendor. It is argued that it cannot be insisted upon, inasmuch as it comes within the general principle that a condition is bad if it be misleading. It is not suggested here that the vendor knew that the assumption required to be made was false. Indeed, it is not suggested even now that the facts required to be assumed are not true. I should quite agree that if there were any actual misstatement in the conditions or such an imperfect statement of the facts as in the result makes what is stated untrue, the conditions would be so tainted by falsehood that they could not be insisted on as against the purchaser misled by such taint of falsehood. But now that the facts are all known the condition appears to have been aptly and properly framed to prevent the purchaser from insisting on proof of what was then and is now believed to be the fact, although the vendor is not in a position to establish it by legal proof. It seems to me that, although the exact defect in the proof of the title is not specifically pointed out, it required very little foresight to conjecture that the death of John Bouchier intestate and without an heir was really material by reason of some such objection as that which is now in question. It seems to me that an opposite view would establish the principle that, apart from intentional misleading, and apart from any knowledge by the vendor that the facts required to be assumed were not true, a condition requiring assumptions as to the title could only be supported where the specific objection to the title was pointed out. For that proposition I can find no authority, and it certainly would make every title in which there was not only defect as a matter of fact, but absence of proof of soundness, absolutely unsaleable—a formidable proposition with reference to the known condition of titles to real property in this country. Possibly there could not be a better illustration of the effect of such a proposition than the present case. The vendor would have been compelled to state the exact objection, with the result that no one could deal with that estate in the future.

REG. v. BARNARDO.
JONES'S CASE. (a.)

*Practice—Appeal—Habeas corpus—Custody of infant—Right of mother of illegitimate child — Appointment of guardian.*

An appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from an order directing a writ of habeas corpus to issue where the liberty of the subject is not involved, and where the Court of Appeal has power to enforce its decision.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bell-Cox v. Hakes, ante, p. 145, 15 App. Cas. 506, explained.

The mother of an illegitimate child is entitled to its custody as a matter of right, unless she be proved to be unfit to have the control of it. By committing the child to the care of another person for the purpose of education, she does not lose her rights over the child, and the court will assist her to regain its custody. She has also the right to nominate a guardian for the child, whom the court will appoint if he be a fit and proper person.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.).

The mother of an illegitimate child—a boy aged eleven years—being in very poor circumstances, had in 1888 voluntarily placed the boy in Dr. Barnardo's home, and the child had remained there with her consent for eighteen months. The mother, who was now a Roman Catholic, subsequently became desirous to remove the child from Dr. Barnardo's custody, in order to place it in a Roman Catholic home, and with that view had nominated a Mr. Walsh, a Roman Catholic gentleman of unexceptional character and position, as guardian of the child.

Dr. Barnardo had refused to deliver up the child for reasons which are fully stated in the judgment of Lindley, L.J.

The Divisional Court, on the application of the mother, made two orders—one, directing a writ of habeas corpus to issue to Dr. Barnardo to produce the child to the court; and the other, appointing Mr. Walsh the guardian of the child.

From this judgment Dr. Barnardo appealed.

Murphy, Q.C., Joseph Walton, and Forbes Lankester, for the respondent, took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay in such a matter.

They cited Bell-Cox v. Hakes, ante, p. 145.

The COURT decided to hear the appeal on the merits.

The appellant in person.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 25.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The first question in this case is whether any appeal lies to this court from the decision of the Divisional Court on such a question as this. It has been argued that there is no appeal, and that that has been decided by the House of Lords in a recent case. This is a writ of habeas corpus to bring an infant child before the court in order that the court may determine whether the child should remain in the custody in which it now is, or whether it should be handed over to its mother or to persons whom she nominates. Is any appeal given to this court in such a case? The writ of habeas corpus is a writ of procedure for the purpose of the court making an order with regard to the person brought before it. It generally and originally had reference to persons whose liberty was affected, but the writ has always been used in the case of infant children to determine whether the person having charge of them as children is the right person to take charge of them. The question in such cases is one not of liberty, but of nurture and education. The House of Lords has determined that, with regard to one set of cases in which the writ of habeas corpus is in use, there is no appeal. It is said that they have gone further, and have said that for whatever purpose the writ is used there is no appeal. After carefully reading the judgments of the House of Lords in the case cited I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the House of Lords does not go so far. The House of Lords said that the words of the Judicature Act were sufficiently large to give an appeal in cases of habeas corpus, but that when a subject of the Queen has been deprived of his liberty there are great constitutional reasons why there should not be any appeal from a writ discharging him from custody. But those reasons do not apply in the present case, and, therefore, I think that the House of Lords did not take away the right of appeal in such a case as the present.

That brings me to deal with the case before us. I cannot deal with it on the merits without first of all reducing it to what, in my judgment, is the value and truth of the matter. It is said that this is the case of a sensitive mother anxious to have her child under her own care, and wounded by Dr. Barnardo's refusal to let her see it as often as she wished. I do not believe a word of this. Here is a perfectly well-known institution with distinct objects. Its primary object is to rescue, take care of, and educate neglected children taken from the streets, but there is a fundamental point which animates Dr. Barnardo and those who assist and support him—namely, that these children should be educated as Protestants. On the other side, we have a body of equally sincere and honest people who desire to bring up children as Roman Catholics. It is a dispute between two sets of earnest benevolent enthusiasts. The real dispute is whether this child is to be educated as a Protestant or a Roman Catholic. This was the child of a poor woman, and was practically on the streets. It was as poor as it could be. Its mother could not keep it properly clothed or properly fed, but it would be wrong to say that she starved it. Nevertheless, it is true that the child was not clothed, fed, or educated as one could wish. Under these circumstances the mother takes the child to Dr. Barnardo, in order that it may be properly fed, clothed, and looked after, and she does so of her own free will. It is absurd to say that she had, at that time, any religious earnestness; she had nothing of the kind. The mother deliberately gave the child to Dr. Barnardo, and left it there for eighteen months.

In Dr. Barnardo's institution children are fed, clothed, and brought under proper discipline, and they are educated religiously. Dr. Barnardo assures us that he does not educate them in the controversial points of difference between Roman Catholics and Protestants. I hope, indeed, in the case of such young children, that he does not. The child is perfectly happy where he is. Nobody suggests that any harm can come to it from remaining in Dr. Barnardo's care. The mother, however, has Roman Catholic relations. Her own religious views are about as indifferent as they well can be, but under persuasion —having apparently changed her views several times—she decides to be a Roman Catholic, and her relations persuade her that the child's soul is in danger if it is left to be brought up as a Protestant, and she, therefore, is persuaded that she wishes that it should be removed from this institution. If I thought that she was not persuaded at all, and that she was a mere catspaw and perfectly indifferent to the child's interests—if I found that she had received money for her consent to this application I should say that it was not bonâ fide. But, as it is, I think she really is persuaded that she wishes to remove the child. It is not to be handed over to its mother, but it is to be given up to the Roman Catholic institution.

Now, the child is an illegitimate child. No doubt that makes a difference as to the position of the mother, but it makes none in respect of her right and wish to have the custody of her own child. Her wishes as to that will be considered by the court. There is no difference whatever in this respect between the mother of an illegitimate child and the father of a legitimate child. It is an undoubted right by the law of England, recognizing the law of nature, that the mother of an illegitimate child shall have the company, the care, and the control of her own child unless for any reason the law of England is obliged to interfere with the law of nature. She has therefore the same right as the father of a legitimate child has to nominate someone to take care of the child for her. She may say to what school it is to be sent, and may choose its tutors and governesses.

Now, suppose the child is actually in the custody of a particular person by her consent, as in this case it is in the charge of Dr. Barnardo. She has bound herself by agreement not to take it away. The law is perfectly plain. A parent cannot bind himself by any such agreement. He cannot by agreement—as Dr. Barnardo has often been told—give up his natural right to the control of the child. This is exactly the same in the case of the mother of an illegitimate child. She cannot by agreement absolve herself from her duties and rights to her child. The agreement, therefore, that she made with Dr. Barnardo is absolutely null. Then comes the question as to which of the two persons it is to be given to. Unless there is some reason to the contrary, the court is bound to give effect to the wish of the mother. Is there in this case any reason to the contrary? The child is given up to Dr. Barnardo by its mother. She had no means of taking proper care of it. She did the right thing in giving it to him, in my opinion. Then, after Dr. Barnardo has had all the trouble and expense of keeping the child, she insists on having it back again, not that she may enjoy its society herself, but that it may be handed over to be brought up in a Roman Catholic institution. The court can take no notice of any preference of one religion over another. It was not unnatural that under the circumstances Dr. Barnardo should look closely into the application. His mind was at once filled with suspicion, and he therefore, not unnaturally, has this woman closely watched. I do not blame him for doing so, but I think he did not appreciate the danger of employing agents to watch her who knew perfectly well that he wanted to find out that she was disreputable. Accordingly they made reports which, if they are true, would show that she is now a disreputable woman. The reports, however, have been carefully investigated in the Divisional Court, and the judges have come to the conclusion that Dr. Barnardo's agents were either deceived or have exaggerated matters. Therefore, we must take it that she is not now a disreputable woman. The law, as Dr. Barnardo has been told before, puts him into this position—that, although he takes a child in at its parent's request, and by agreement with him, and expends care and money upon it, nevertheless, whenever the parent chooses to ask for the child, he has no course but to acquiesce, unless he can show some good reason to the contrary. There is in this case nothing to entitle the court to interfere with the mother's rights, and, therefore, Dr. Barnardo is bound to hand over the child as directed by the Divisional Court. I will only add that I do not agree with the strictures passed on Dr. Barnardo's conduct in the court below.

The following judgment was read by LINDLEY, L.J.—Two questions are raised by this appeal—(1) Does an appeal lie? (2) If it does, ought the orders appealed from to be confirmed or reversed? The orders appealed from are two—(1) an order that a writ of habeas corpus do issue directing Dr. Barnardo to bring up an infant named Jones or Roddy; (2) an order appointing a Mr. Walsh guardian of the infant. There is not yet any order for the delivery of the infant to him, but if this appeal fails such an order will forthwith be made as a matter of course. That an appeal lies against the second of these orders is too clear for serious controversy. Such orders were always made in Chancery before the passing of the Judicature Acts, and they were always appealable. The appeal section of the Judicature Act, 1873—viz., section 19—plainly includes orders of this description. Whether in form the appeal should be brought by Dr. Barnardo, as it in fact is, or whether it should be brought by the infant by a next friend, who might be Dr. Barnardo, is a matter of no real importance. The latter form is, I think, the more correct; but as the order has been served on Dr. Barnardo, and is a preliminary step towards removing the child from his custody, and as, moreover, the order directs him to pay the costs of the application, I am not prepared to say that his appeal is technically wrong in point of form. Even if it were the court would not hesitate to allow it to be amended, and I pass from this subject without further comment. But then it is said that no appeal lies from the order directing a writ of habeas corpus to issue, and reliance was placed on the recent decision of the House of Lords in Bell-Cox's case. That decision, however, appears to me to have no application to such a case as this. The question whether a person in prison ought to be set at liberty or not is entirely different from the question which of several persons ought to have the custody of a child. It is true that proceedings by habeas corpus may be had recourse to for the purpose of settling both questions; but the proper custody of an infant is by no means finally settled by habeas corpus.

The Court of Chancery has asserted its powers to restrain a father from applying for a habeas corpus in order to recover possession of a child from a properly appointed guardian (McPherson on Infants, 149); and in Andrews v. Salt, 21 W. R. 616, L. R. 8 Ch. 622, the court restrained a testamentary guardian who had applied for a habeas corpus to obtain possession of an infant, in the custody of her mother, from interfering with the custody or education of the infant. The jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery to control legal rights of custody enforceable at law by habeas corpus was never disputed, so far as I am aware. On the other hand, the court had no jurisdiction to restrain a person from seeking to obtain his freedom by that well-known writ. The Judicature Acts have put an end to injunctions to restrain legal proceedings, and as regards infants it is expressly enacted by section 25 (10) of the Judicature Act, 1873, that "in questions relating to the custody and education of infants the rules of equity shall prevail." It certainly would be a strange state of things if, since the Judicature Acts, there should be an appeal from an order as to the custody of an infant if made on summons, and no appeal from a similar order if made on habeas corpus, even although the two orders were wholly inconsistent with each other. It is true that there was no appeal from an order on habeas corpus before the Judicature Acts, but section 19 of the Act of 1873 gives such an appeal, so far as words are concerned, and I can discover no reason for cutting them down in a case of this sort. These reasons, as well as a careful study of the judgments of the House of Lords in Bell-Cox's case, lead me to the conclusion that it is competent for this court to entertain the appeal from the order on habeas corpus as well as from the order on the summons, which is the more important of the two.

I pass now to the merits of the case. The child is illegitimate. The consequence is that he has no guardian: In re Ullee, 53 L. T. N. S. 711. In other words, there is no person who has all the rights of a guardian over either him or his property. But, although this is true, it is now settled, after some fluctuation of opinion, that the mother of an illegitimate child has a primâ facie right to the custody of the child up to the age of fourteen in preference either to the reputed father or to any other person: Reg. v. Nash, 31 W. R. 420, 10 Q. B. D. 454. This right is based on the relationship which exists between a mother and her child, and on the absence of all superior right on the part of the reputed father or of anyone else. This right of the mother is, no doubt, subject to control by the High Court, and if in any case it be proved that a mother is unfit to have the custody of her own illegitimate child, the court clearly has jurisdiction to remove the child from her control.

The power of the Court of Chancery to deprive a father of the custody of his own legitimate child in a proper case is undoubted; and the power of the High Court over the mother of an illegitimate child is certainly no less extensive. The power of the court to control the mother is, in truth, indisputable and not disputed. But the court will not interfere with her arbitrarily, and will support her and give effect to her views and wishes unless it becomes the duty of the court towards the child to refuse so to do. Taking this view of the mother's rights and of the duty of the court, I see no reason why a mother should not from time to time change her mind as to where, how, or by whom her child shall be brought up, nor why the court should interfere with her or refuse to support her, unless circumstances be proved which satisfy the court that its duty to the infant requires it to act contrary to her wishes. The circumstances relied upon by the appellant to show that the mother's wishes ought not to prevail are as follows:—(1) The mother's immoral and dissolute character. The worst charges against her were, however, disproved in the opinion of the Divisional Court, and must be taken as not established. The fact that she lived with a man without being married to him is not of itself sufficient to deprive her of her rights. (2) The want of bona fides on the part of the mother, who is alleged to be a mere instrument in the hands of others. There can be no doubt that she is supported in this controversy by Roman Catholic priests, but the evidence is strong that she went to them for help, and that they did not first go to her; and, although it would be ridiculous to suppose that she is not under priestly influence, I cannot come to the conclusion that she does not really desire to have her child removed from his present custodians. (3) The abandonment by her of her right to the child. That even the father of a legitimate child may abandon his right to educate his child as he thinks proper is established by Andrews v. Salt, but it is extremely difficult to define the conduct which amounts to such an abandonment. A mere agreement with a stranger that he shall have the child for a definite time will not, although acted upon, necessarily amount to such an abandonment. But if it can be shown that it would be an injury to the child not to abide by such an agreement, this additional circumstance may turn the scale. It is necessary to consider this point—viz. (4) the injury which would accrue to this child if it were removed to a Roman Catholic school. Dr. Barnardo has educated the child as a Protestant. But, considering the age of the child and the short time he has had any religious instruction, I cannot think that he has yet arrived at that stage in his religious education at which a change of education will be injurious to him. So far as I can judge, no injury will be done to him whether he remains where he is or whether he is removed to some Roman Catholic institution. He will be as well cared for in the one place as in the other, and his wishes are not strongly one way or the other. Nor is it the duty of the court to insist that he shall be brought up in the Protestant rather than in the Roman Catholic religion against the wishes of the mother.

I have now passed in review the various grounds relied upon by the appellant for leaving the child with him, and I have given my reasons for holding them to be insufficient. Being insufficient, I am of opinion that the law requires that the mother's wishes must prevail. I will only add that I am not surprised that Dr. Barnardo should feel annoyed at finding his efforts thwarted, as they occasionally are, by persons who do not awake to their own duties to their children until he has rescued them from degradation and ruin. But the duty of this court is to ascertain and maintain rights and to administer the law with absolute indifference to every other consideration; and whilst I regret that such a contest as this should ever have arisen, yet, having arisen, it is my duty to say that the law is on the side of the mother, and that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment:—It was contended that no appeal would lie in this case, and reliance was placed upon the case of Bell-Cox v. Hakes, in the House of Lords. That case establishes that there is no appeal under section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, from an order of the High Court discharging a prisoner from custody under a writ of habeas corpus. It is said that the decision is not confined to discharges from custody, but is applicable to all illegal detentions, and includes a case like the present, where no question of the personal freedom of the infant arises, but a change of custody is sought from one who has the custody to another who claims to be entitled to it. To determine this it is necessary carefully to consider the judgments in the Bell-Cox case, and the reasoning upon which those judgments are founded. I feel that it is somewhat anomalous to hold that one order made under a writ of habeas corpus is an order within the meaning of the word "order" used in section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and that another order is not. The words of the statute are:—"The Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order of her Majesty's High Court of Justice, or any judges or judge thereof." Lord Bramwell says that he has a misgiving whether, in awarding or disposing of a writ of habeas corpus, a judge of the High Court, in the High Court itself, is acting as a court or a judge of a court of judicature. The ground, however, of the judgments in the Bell-Cox case is that, there being no power to re-capture or re-arrest, an appeal after an order of discharge from custody would be useless; consequently that the right way of dealing with the word "order" in section 19 is to limit its meaning to cases where the Court of Appeal, or the court appealed from, can execute the order or judgment of the court if required. The passages I am about to read from Lord Bramwell's and Lord Herschell's judgments make this clear. Lord Bramwell says:—"If an order of discharge is a judgment or order of judicature, and so within the very words of section 19, a limitation must be put upon them, excluding such appeals as would be futile." Lord Herschell says:—"I am driven then to the conclusion that where a prisoner has been discharged by the High Court under a writ of habeas corpus, the Court of Appeal has no power effectually to interfere with the action of the court below. The judgment of the higher court cannot in any way affect the discharge or restore to custody the person liberated. It is incompetent to give effect to its judgment, and cannot undo what it holds to have been wrongly done by the order appealed from. I think it is impossible to read the section to be construed without seeing that the power to hear and determine an appeal, and the power to enforce the judgment of the Court of Appeal in case it should differ from the court below, were intended to be co-extensive."

It is clear, therefore, that what the House of Lords decided was that in the case of a discharge from custody under a writ of habeas corpus there is no appeal, because the court cannot give effect to its order. This reasoning is inapplicable to the case now under consideration. There has been no discharge of the infant. The infant is within the control of the court, and the court can make what order it thinks fit with regard to his custody, and can give full effect to its order or judgment. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that there is an appeal in this case, and that this case is not governed by the Bell-Cox case. Indeed, it seems to me that the appeal is sanctioned by the reasoning in that case.

With regard to the merits of the case, I cannot help saying that I doubt much if the mother of the child would have wished to remove him if she had not been influenced by others. I believe the desire to remove the child emanates from others, and not from herself. She placed the child in Dr. Barnardo's institution in the first instance of her own free will. She entered voluntarily into an agreement, by which the child was to be left there for several years, and she, in fact, left the child there without any interference for more than a year. The child, it is to be observed, was happy and desirous to be left with Dr. Barnardo. The child's reputed father had the same desire. I doubt if the contemplated change into a different atmosphere, with new and different surroundings, will be for the welfare of the child. It is, however, a matter of discretion. The court below has seen and examined the witnesses and carefully considered the case. In such circumstances the exercise of the discretion is not lightly to be set aside, and for this reason, and this reason only, I do not dissent from the judgment delivered. On Dr. Barnardo severe strictures have been passed in the court below. I do not entirely agree with what has been said. Doubtless he is over-zealous, often misguided, and too prone to resist the law; but, at any rate, I believe his motives are benevolent and philanthropic.

Motion.

This was a motion for leave to issue a writ of attachment against a solicitor for default in the payment of a sum of money under an order made on the 27th of October, 1890, against him in his character of an officer of the court.

The motion was founded on the 4th exception to section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869. The notice of motion was given in and for November last, but by arrangement the hearing had been postponed from time to time with a view to negotiations for a settlement.

On the 11th of December, 1890, the defendant was adjudicated a bankrupt on his own petition.

Leonard Field, for the motion.—The bankruptcy is no bar to this application, which is of a punitive character: Marris v. Ingram, 28 W. R. 434, 13 Ch. D. 338; In re Wray, 36 W. R. 67, 36 Ch. D. 138; In re Gent, 37 W. R. 151, 40 Ch. D. 190; In re Dudley, 32 W. R. 264, 12 Q. B. D. 44; Mitchell v. Simpson, 37 W. R. 798, 23 Q. B. D. 373, at p. 379.

Johnston Watson, for the respondent.—The application is barred by the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 9, and the court has no jurisdiction: In re Simes, 38 W. R. 570.

CHITTY, J., stated the facts, and proceeded:—Now this bankruptcy is set up by the solicitor as a complete answer to the motion, and reliance is placed on section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and it is said that the bankrupt is ipso facto exempted from all liability under the Debtors Act, 1869.

The point came before North, J., in In re Wray, in which case the learned judge held that such a defence could not be maintained, and in an elaborate judgment he founded himself mainly on the reason that the proceeding was not merely civil, but was of a punitive or disciplinary nature, and, therefore, the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act had not taken away the jurisdiction. The grounds upon which the Legislature proceeded in framing the Debtors Acts are stated in Marris v. Ingram. In the case of In re Wray the learned judge, for reasons appearing to his mind sufficient, declined in his discretion to allow the writ to issue. On appeal the Lords Justices did not interfere with the learned judge's discretion, leaving untouched that part of his judgment which referred to the question of jurisdiction.

In re Wray was cited to the Divisional Court in Mitchell v. Simpson, and Charles, J., after referring to the decision of North, J., expressed his approval of it. A case, however, relating to a trustee, but involving the same question of jurisdiction, subsequently came before Kekewich, J., in which he decided that he had no jurisdiction. This was the case of In re Simes, on which the respondent relies. In that case, however, neither In re Wray nor Mitchell v. Simpson were cited, and I cannot but think that had the learned judge been aware of these decisions he would have followed them.

On the question of jurisdiction I must follow the judgment of North, J., which I think well founded.

I have, therefore, jurisdiction to make the order.

His lordship then reviewed the facts, and in the exercise of his discretion made the order, directing it to lie in the office for a fortnight.

CURTIS v. KESTEVEN COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government — Main road — Roadside wastes — County council—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 11, sub-sections 1, 6.

Strips of waste land adjoining a main road are "roadside wastes" within the meaning of sub-section 1 of section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888, and are not, like the main road, vested in the county council by sub-section 6 of that section; and, consequently, the county council have no right to the herbage of such strips of waste land.

Motion.

The question for determination was whether strips of waste land lying on the side of the metalled portion of a main road are, by virtue of section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888, vested in the county council in which the main road is vested.

Under the will of Thomas Curtis, to whom the strips of waste land adjoining that part, which was in the parish of Sinderby, of the main road from Newark to Lincoln, were conveyed in the year 1876, C. C. Curtis was entitled for his life to those strips of waste land, and let to inhabitants of the parish the right of grazing cattle thereon.

The width of the metalled part of the main road from Newark to Lincoln was 22 feet, but the total width of the road from hedge to hedge varied from 65 feet to 95 feet, and the area of the strips of waste land was about 13 acres.

By virtue of section 11, sub-section 6, of the Local Government Act, 1888, the part which was in the parish of Sinderby of the main road from Newark to Lincoln was vested in the Kesteven County Council, who purported to sell the herbage growing on the strips of waste land adjoining that part of the main road to a purchaser for a year.

The action was brought by C. C. Curtis and two inhabitants, to whom he had let the herbage of the strips of waste land, against the Kesteven County Council and the purchaser from them of the herbage of the strips, claiming a declaration that the plaintiff Curtis was entitled to the strips of waste land and an injunction to restrain the defendants from wrongfully cutting or removing the trees and herbage growing thereon.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants from wrongfully cutting or removing the herbage. By consent of the parties it was treated as the trial of the action.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the motion.—The strips of waste land adjoining the main road are "roadside wastes" within the meaning of sub-section 1 of section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which gives the county council the same powers as a highway authority over roadside wastes; and this is inconsistent with a construction of sub-section 6 which would vest roadside wastes in the county council in the same way as a main road is vested in them by that sub-section. The words "a main road" in sub-section 6 do not include everything from hedge to hedge, for otherwise there would have been no necessity for mentioning the materials and drains belonging thereto. Only so much of the soil of the road as is necessary for the purposes of the county council as a road authority is vested in the county council: Coverdale v. Charlton, 27 W. R. 258, 4

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q. B. D. 104. But the public have a right of way over the roadside wastes as well as over the main road.

R. S. Wright and Vernon R. Smith, for the county council.—Sub-section 6 of section 11 vests in the county council the whole width of the road from hedge to hedge over which the public have a right of way: Elwood v. Bullock, 6 Q. B. 383; Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Co., 10 W. R. 538; In re Warminster Local Board, 38 W. R. 670, 25 Q. B. D. 450. The county council have a right to the herbage of the strips of waste land adjoining the main road: Coverdale v. Charlton; Wandsworth Board of Works v. United Telephone Co., 32 W. R. 776, 13 Q. B. D. 904; Rolls v. Vestry of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, 28 W. R. 867, 14 Ch. D. 785, and they can remove trees which obstruct the public right of way over the strips of waste land, although they have not a right of ownership in the trees: Turner v. Ringwood Highway Board, 18 W. R. 424, L. R. 9 Eq. 418. [NORTH, J.—What do you say is the meaning of the words "roadside wastes" in sub-section 1 of section 11?] They may apply to village greens and other waste land over which the public have rights, but which are not part of a highway.

NORTH, J.—This case turns on the construction of the Local Government Act, 1888. The question is whether an area of ground, about thirteen acres in extent, is vested by this Act in the county council, and whether a person, who admittedly was the owner of the land until it was vested, if so vested, is to be deprived of it without compensation. I do not think this comes within section 11 of the Act, which section provides, by sub-section 1, "Every road in a county which is for the time being a main road within the meaning of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, inclusive of every bridge carrying such road, if repairable by the highway authority, shall, after the appointed day, be wholly maintained and repaired by the council of the county in which the road is situate," and certain powers are given for the purpose. Then it provides: "The county council shall have the same powers as a highway board for preventing and removing obstructions and for asserting the right of the public to the use and enjoyment of the roadside wastes." The other material clause of that section is sub-section 6, which deals with the vesting, and says: "A main road and the materials thereof, and all drains belonging thereto, shall, except where the urban authority retain the powers and duties of maintaining and repairing such road, vest in the county council, and where any sewer or other drain is used for any purpose in connection with the drainage of any main road the county council shall continue to have the right of using such sewer or drain for such purpose."

These two sub-sections seem to me to draw a clear distinction between what the Act calls a "road" and what the Act calls "roadside wastes." It is suggested that "roadside wastes" have some meaning which the counsel for the county council confesses he does not know, and suggests that it may apply to village greens. I think that "roadside wastes" is an intelligible phrase, and what the county council have given to them by the Act is a power of asserting the right of the public to the use and enjoyment of these "roadside wastes." That in itself seems inconsistent with the idea that the roadside wastes were the property of the board; because, to say that the absolute owners are to have power to assert the right of the public to the use and enjoyment of their property seems to require an explanation that has not been given. I do not think the roadside wastes are vested by this Act in the county council. In re Warminster Local Board is a decision upon this very section, and if I thought it governed this case I should follow it. But I do not think it governs the case at all, because the question there was who was to keep up the footways, and it was held, as I should have held, if it had been a new case, that the footways were part of the road—i.e., that the part of the road most convenient for foot passengers was as much part of the road as the other part which can be used by horses and carriages. I should have thought it clear that the footways were part of the road. But it does not go any further, excepting that there is an observation by Charles, J., where he says that, "under the Local Government Act the whole of the expenses of the maintenance of main roads—that is to say, main roads from hedge to hedge, including the footways—is thrown on the county council." The sole question before the court was as to a footway forming part of a street within the control of an urban authority, and although, no doubt, Charles, J., uses that phrase "road from hedge to hedge," he could not have had in his mind what I have to deal with now—a large area of ground outside the footpath.

Under these circumstances I come to the conclusion that these roadside wastes—as I hold them to be—are not vested in the county council, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief they ask for.

An injunction was granted restraining the county council from cutting and removing grass, timber, and other growths by the side of the main road, "without prejudice to the rights of the county council under the Local Government Act."

Where debenture-holders have, in an action to realize their security, obtained the appointment of a receiver, that receiver will not be displaced by the official liquidator of the company if the debentures include practically the whole of the company's property; but the debenture-holders will be allowed to continue their action and to control the realization of the assets.

Where a receiver of the company's property has been appointed in a debenture-holder's action, the plaintiffs ought, on a subsequent application to appoint an official liquidator, to apply to have their receiver appointed liquidator.

Summons and motion.

The summons asked for leave to proceed with a debenture-holder's action notwithstanding the winding up; the motion was by the official liquidator to discharge an order made in the action appointing a receiver and to appoint himself receiver for the debenture-holders in his place.

The company, in 1886, issued debentures to William Abbott, one of the vendors and managing director, in payment of the balance of his purchase-money. These debentures constituted a charge on the whole of the company's undertaking and property, including uncalled capital, but not including freeholds and leaseholds. The freeholds were also mortgaged to Abbott, and the leaseholds were mortgaged to other persons. Abbott's debentures, amounting to £6,000, and his mortgage were transferred to Barney as trustee for the plaintiffs, the Birmingham District Bank, to secure the account of the company.

On the 30th of September, 1890, a winding-up petition was presented against the company. The debentures thereupon became immediately payable, and the bank, on the 2nd of October, commenced proceedings as debenture-holders to enforce their securities in respect of the overdraft of the company's account, amounting to more than £4,000.

On the same day an order was made by consent appointing a receiver.

On the 15th of October a winding-up order was made and an official receiver appointed. The bank were present as creditors when the order was made, but neither supported nor opposed it. The liquidator gave security to the amount of £10,000, but the receiver had given none.

It was stated that there would probably be surplus assets after satisfaction of the claim of the bank.

The summons and motion came on together.

Warmington, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the bank, opened the summons, and asked that their action should be allowed to proceed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Ashton Cross, for the motion.—There is no reason why the action should go on. We admit the plaintiffs' rights, and offer them all the relief they are entitled to. We submit that the usual practice should be followed—i.e., that the receiver be discharged and the official liquidator appointed receiver in his place: Campbell v. Compagnie Générale de Bellegarde, 24 W. R. 573, 2 Ch. D. 181; In re David Lloyd & Co., 25 W. R. 872, 6 Ch. D. 339; In re Henry Pound, Son, & Hutchins, 38 W. R. 18, 42 Ch. D. 402. The bank did not oppose the appointment of the official liquidator.

Warmington, Q.C., and R. J. Parker.—Both questions are within the discretion of the court. The action ought to go on, as the accounts must be taken in the presence of Abbott. The company's property is of very doubtful value, and the object of the liquidator is to get his costs made a first charge on the assets. He ought not to be allowed to come before us. We did not oppose the appointment of the liquidator nor give security because we could do nothing till a liquidator was appointed. We only appeared as creditors. There is no rule which makes it incumbent on the court to appoint the liquidator receiver. It is only done when his powers will be useful in realizing the security: Bartlett v. Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co., 53 L. T. N. S. 611, 34 W. R. Dig. 36. Those powers are not wanted here. If the liquidator were also receiver for us there would be a conflict of interest.

Renshaw, Q.C., in reply.—The liquidator's costs will in any case come after those of the mortgagees. A conflict of interest is of no consequence: Tottenham v. Swansea Zinc Ore Co., 32 W. R. 716.

KEKEWICH, J.—I will deal with these applications separately.

The first is the summons by the plaintiffs in the action of Barney and others against Joshua Stubbs (Limited) and William Abbott for leave to continue their action, notwithstanding the winding-up order. The action for the moment is dead, and any application they can possibly make in it—not strictly an application in the action, but in the winding up—must be for leave to continue. I see no reason why it should not continue, and several reasons why it should. If the company, through their official liquidator, are willing to give the plaintiffs at once (that is to say, as soon as the forms of the court will allow) all that they are entitled to in the action, of course there would be no further cause for litigation, the account might be taken up, and there would be no reason for an action and judgment or any other form of proceedings; but the company have not absolute control of the proceedings in that way, because Mr. Abbott is a co-defendant, and the plaintiffs' security was constituted by a transfer, either to the plaintiffs or to a trustee for them by the debenture-holder of the debentures which had in the first instance been issued to Mr. Abbott. It is quite possible that when the action is alive something of that kind may be done; that is, if Abbott is willing and other parties will be bound, an order of that kind may be made at once, but I do not see that that is possible until the action is alive, and though I should certainly deprecate, so far as I can, and prevent any useless costs, still I think the action must be put on its legs, to use the common expression, in order that justice may be done between the parties. It does not seem to me by any means to be a common case of an action by a secured creditor against the company to realize his security. There is that difference between the parties. So I think that that action must go on.

Now a very much more important and difficult question is raised by the motion of the official liquidator. He seeks to discharge the receiver appointed in the action of the debenture-holders and to substitute himself, and Mr. Renshaw says, with perfect accuracy, that though there is no rule, there is a uniform practice on the subject. What is that uniform practice? That there shall be one representative of the company in general and of the secured creditors in particular, but, inasmuch as either the same, or at any rate very similar, accounts must be taken in both proceedings—the proceedings for the liquidation of the company and the proceedings for the ascertainment and payment of the debenture-holders—those accounts shall be taken—watched over—by the same person, being an officer of the court. So far I have no doubt that there has been a uniform practice, and it is a uniform practice founded on convenience, not, of course, to be extended to cases where its extension would do injustice, but found by experience seldom, if ever, to do injustice. If it is desired to go further and say that the uniform practice has been to appoint the liquidator receiver of the debenture-holders' securities, then I do not myself think that the practice has gone so far. Certainly, within my own experience, the appointment has been the other way—that a receiver for the debenture-holders has been appointed liquidator—and it is very important to notice the difference.

I have recently had a case before me which has given me considerable trouble in ascertaining how the liquidator was to be paid. The liquidator had done good work, and it was everybody's wish that he should be fairly treated, but the whole of the property was swallowed up by the debenture-holders, or nearly the whole, and it was extremely difficult to find anything out of which his fair charges and remuneration as liquidator could be paid. As often happens in those cases, there was no ill-feeling. The debenture-holders were aware that the liquidator had done good work, and there was some property applicable to that, and he was in the end paid. But there is considerable difficulty in some of these cases in doing that, and it is needless to say that there is a temptation —an almost irresistible temptation—on the part of the liquidator to find something out of which to pay his charges and to take care that in the character of liquidator he is properly remunerated. That danger the court must look into and face. Also in regarding the cases which have laid down the rule, or, at any rate, have settled the uniform practice, one must not forget that the form of debentures has changed very much of late years, and that now, owing very much to the industry and ingenuity of a learned member of the profession, the debentures are made in such a form that there is nothing really left outside, and that the company (not strictly in technical language) really is mortgaged to the debenture-holders. Now I find that is so in this very case. It may be possible to get something. I am told it is possible to get something outside the charge, but the charge in the debenture which is before me is on "the undertaking and all its property, whatsoever and wheresoever, both real and personal, and present and future, not including freehold and leasehold property comprised in the indenture mentioned in the second condition indorsed hereon" (that may or may not be valuable) "but including the uncalled capital for the time being." Therefore, unless the security is sufficient to pay principal, interest, and costs, one sees that there is really nothing for the general creditors, and still less for the shareholders of the company.

Now why should I, under those circumstances, not leave the mortgagee in possession of his rights? Why should he not control the realization of his security and the ascertainment of the persons to whom the money is to be paid, and the proportions in which it is to be paid, and so forth? In the case cited by Mr. Renshaw in reply there was a question whether some particular property was included in the mortgage or not. Here, unless something can be made out of the words to which I have called attention, and which I have read, there is nothing really substantial at all, and therefore it seems to me it would be wrong to prevent the mortgagees from controlling the realization of the property, notwithstanding the uniform practice which has been mentioned and which is to be found in the case of In re David Lloyd & Co., and the subsequent cases to which my attention has been called, and, as has been said, the numerous other cases, reported and unreported.

I was a little startled by one circumstance, which was this. It is distinctly sworn, and I do not say improperly, by Mr. Harris, who is the solicitor for the petitioning creditor, that on the appointment of the official liquidator who was of course proposed by the petitioning creditor, there attended before the chief clerk the solicitors to the Birmingham Bank, one of the plaintiffs in the action, and William Abbott and other creditors, and that they supported the appointment of Mr. Hill, the present official liquidator. If that had been really accurately true, exactly as the language of the affidavit says, I certainly should have been disposed to have acceded to the liquidator's application. I think the debenture-holders, who of course knew of the petition, for their action was founded upon it, who of course knew of the appointment of the official liquidator, and who really were there in one sense, and the banking company, which is one of the plaintiffs attending by a solicitor, ought to have at once come forward and said: "We oppose this appointment, we insist upon our man, our nominee, having the control at once; there ought to be one liquidator and one receiver, and that one man ought to be the nominee of the debenture-holders." They did not do that, and I think they were remiss in not doing it, but they did not. Now that I have had an opportunity of seeing the chief clerk and hearing all that can be said about it, I understand that the bank did not go so far as to support the appointment of Mr. Hill. No doubt it was desirable to appoint a liquidator as soon as possible. The plaintiffs were not there as plaintiffs in the action. I do not know how they could have been. They could only have been there as creditors, and I do not rely on Thomas Barney's absence. But they seem to have not opposed; they do not seem to have taken any part, and the utmost that can be said against them is that they assented. That being so, they may find it extremely difficult to displace the official liquidator, but I do not think their conduct goes so far as to preclude them from insisting upon their own receiver in their own action.

Therefore, I must refuse the application of the official liquidator and leave him in possession, at any rate for the nonce, of what he can get as official liquidator and leave the receiver in possession in the action. The plaintiffs' costs will be costs in the action, and the official liquidator's costs will be allowed in the winding up.

Ex parte CASTIONI. (a.)

Extradition—"Offence of a political character"— Habeas corpus —Jurisdiction of magistrate—Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), s. 3.

An offence of "a political character," for which a fugitive criminal is not to be surrendered under any treaty incorporating the provisions of the Extradition Act, 1870, s. 3 (1), is any criminal act, as specified within the section "incidental to and forming part of a political disturbance."

Upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus, the court before whom the application is made has power to review the whole evidence brought before it, whether such evidence was brought before the magistrate who committed the fugitive criminal or not.

Motion for a rule for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of one Castioni, committed to prison by Mr. Lushington, as stipendiary magistrate sitting at Bow-street, London, upon an application of the Swiss Federal Government with a view to Castioni's extradition to take his trial on a charge of murder.

Under the provisions of the Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), a treaty of extradition was concluded between Great Britain and Switzerland, by article 11 of which it was agreed, following the terms of section 3 (1) of the Act, that "a fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered if the offence is one of a political character, or if he proves that the requisition for his surrender has in fact been made with a view to try and punish him for an offence of a political character."

The following are the material circumstances relating to the charge:—

The Cantons of Switzerland were federated together under a central authority, the headquarters of which were at Berne. But each of the Cantons had a local or home Government of its own, and, according to a constitution of its own, it appeared that in the State of Ticino the Conservative or, as it was more frequently called, the Ultramontane party had been in power for some fifteen years, and by the opposing or Liberal party complaints had been made that the Government in power had acted contrary to the Constitution, and that justice was not fairly administered. It was also complained that the elections had been unduly influenced, that there had been manipulation of the voting lists, and also peculation. Under the Constitution of Ticino there was a provision that if a certain number of people entitled to exercise the franchise, that number being fixed at 9,000, should address a petition to the Government demanding the revision of the Constitution the Government of the day should yield to them, and take the popular will according to the existing franchise as to whether that revision of the Constitution ought or ought not to take place. In the case of Ticino, on the 9th of August, 1890, that demand was constitutionally made and was signed by more than the requisite number of people. One month was allowed by the Constitution of Ticino to act upon that demand, which month expired on the 10th of September. The Government however took no steps, and their organs in the press declared that they would not. The matter was brought before the Federal Council by certain persons who were prominent in what was called the Liberal party, and the Federal Council were warned early in September, and again upon the eve of the insurrection, that unless steps were taken to tranquilize the public mind, and to show that it was the intention of the Government to act according to the Constitution, the consequences would be serious. The Federal Council, so far as it rested with them, communicated with the local Government of Ticino, but still nothing was done. Finally, a great shooting match was announced to take place on the 11th of September at Lugano, and danger was supposed to be imminent if in the meanwhile nothing were done. On the 11th of September the insurrection actually came to a head. Bruni, a leading lawyer, practising in the State of Ticino, was at the head of the insurgents. The rising in which he took part was in Bellinzona. On that day a body of people obtained arms and went to the arsenal, where they disarmed the guard and furnished themselves with a further supply of weapons, and marched to the Municipal Palace. There seemed to have been two sets of gates to the building, which were both shut when they arrived there. Bruni, as the mouthpiece of the insurrectionary party, demanded admittance. Castioni was one of those in the attacking party. Rossi, who appeared to have been a young man who had but lately joined the Government, was seen upon the steps leading to the Government House, and inside the gates were about eighty guards. Rossi from the steps parleyed with the armed body of men who, in the name of the people, demanded entrance. Rossi refused to give them entrance, warning them of the consequences of the illegal acts in which they were engaged. Several shots were fired, some from within the building and some from without; and then it appeared that a man in the crowd came forward with a hammer and broke the gates open. The populace rushed in, and there was evidence that would justify the magistrate in coming to the conclusion that Castioni did, after or about the time that the gates were broken open, fire a revolver, and that a shot struck Rossi, from the effects of which he subsequently died. The insurrectionary party had meanwhile seized and put in confinement several of the members of the existing Government. After the successful seizure of the arsenal and the Government House, other persons were also taken into custody and put in prison. A provisional Government was then formed, the two principal members of it appearing to be Bruni and Simon.

The Federal Government subsequently sent a special commissioner named Kuntsli to report on the whole proceeding. His report was objected to as evidence of any facts, but was allowed to be read as material to show what was the existing state of political affairs in Bellinzona at the time. In that report it was alleged that someone reported Castioni to have shouted out words to the effect that the blood of his brother called for vengeance. His brother had been killed or assassinated ten years before in the province. Bruni, in his evidence at the police court, stated that the death of Rossi "was not necessary for the success of the revolution," and "was an accident."

The magistrate found to the following effect:—"That he was satisfied that there was a political rising at the time when the alleged offence was committed, but that it did not follow that any offence committed during the rising was necessarily a political offence. He thought that the accused had failed to establish the fact that the murder of Rossi was a political offence, and that there was some evidence, though it was slender, of a personal motive—such as the evidence that Castioni exclaimed to a comrade, 'You are a victim! I, too, am a victim'; his words on seeing Rossi fall—'He is down'; and the expression reported in the commissioner's statement, though not strictly evidence—viz., 'The blood of my brother calls for vengeance.' On the whole he considered that those expressions were not those of a man committing a political offence," and he committed him to prison with a view to his being surrendered to the Swiss Government.

Further depositions were put in upon the present application by Castioni denying the shooting of Rossi, but stating that if the killing of Rossi was done by him or his friends it was an act done in the course of a political disturbance; and also alleging that he went to Italy for some marble upon a sculptor's commission, and that he never knew or saw or heard of Rossi until this occurrence.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., Grain, and Elridge, for the applicant.—This is an original motion, and not a review of the magistrate's decision. The court can decide upon the facts as brought before it, and is not bound by the magistrate's finding. Even if it is bound by the findings of fact by the magistrate, the court can review his decision either on the ground of want of evidence to warrant his evidence, or of fresh evidence being brought before them which was not before the magistrate. The magistrate is bound to intimate to a fugitive criminal if committed that he has a right to apply for a writ of habeas corpus within fifteen days (Extradition Act, 1870, s. 11). This implies a statutory right of appeal: Ex parte Huguet, 29 L. T. (N. S.) 40; Reg. v. Maurer, 31 W. R. 609, 10 Q. B. D. 513; and Clarke upon Extradition, 3rd ed., p. 170. The question for the court is one of mixed law and fact—viz., whether the evidence shows the offence to be one of "a political character"? The phrase was first introduced into the Extradition Act, 1870, s. 3 (1). It has never been the subject of judicial decision, and can only be interpreted with the aid of text-books. The following definitions have been offered:—Clarke on Extradition, 3rd ed., Appendix, p. cclvii., Notes on Political Offences: "The killing of a man in civil war, the seizure of property by the leaders of an armed rebellion, are examples of true political crime"; and vide speech of Lord Stanley in House of Commons, August 3, 1866, there cited; also John Stuart Mill's definition, ibid.: "Any offence committed in the course of or furthering of civil war, insurrection, or political commotions."

Stephen's History of the Criminal Law, vol. II., pp. 69—71, 1st ed.: "The general rule as to extradition is qualified by three exceptions, first, no person is to be surrendered if the offence in respect of which his surrender is required is one of a political character or if he proves . . . that the requisition for his surrender has in fact been made with a view to try or to punish him for an offence of a political character. . . . There are three senses which might be given to this expression standing alone. The first and most obvious sense is an offence consisting in an attack upon the political order of things established in the country where it is committed (e.g., high treason, political riots, seditious conspiracies, &c.). The second sense is any offence committed in order to obtain any political object. The exception would cover all crimes committed under the orders of any secret society (e.g., assassination, arson, &c.). It is monstrous to suppose that this interpretation can be the true one. The third meaning which may be given to the words, and which I take to be the true one, is somewhat more complicated. . . . I think the expression in the Extradition Act ought to be interpreted to mean that fugitive criminals ought not to be surrendered for extradition crimes if those crimes are incidental to and formed part of political disturbances." See also Report of Royal Commission on Extradition, 1877, Parl. Papers, 1878, c. 2039, s. III.: "Generally speaking, we would decline to recognize, therefore, the suggestion of a political motive as a ground on which a magistrate . . . should refuse a demand for surrender . . . unless the act, to which a political character was sought to be ascribed, occurred during a time of civil war or open insurrection." The application here can be based on Sir James Stephen's definition of the third meaning of the words. The offence charged is an extraditable offence, but one "incidental to and forming part of a series of political disturbances." The burden of proof that the offence was non-political is on the other side. The court cannot adjudicate upon the necessity or non-necessity of the act if it is shown to have been of a political character.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., and R. S. Wright, for the magistrate.—The definition given by John Stuart Mill is too wide—"any act by any person done in the course of a successful revolution." There should be a distinction between "things done in the course of a political agitation" and "things necessary to and having for their object a particular political movement." The court must consider whether a thing done merely in the course of a political agitation does or does not amount to a thing necessary to and having for its object a political end. The evidence of Bruni, Castioni's witness, shows that he considered the death of Rossi to be "a misfortune and not necessary to nor the object of the political revolution." There was no evidence of several shots being fired by either party, nor of any determined resistance by the Government party. The shot which killed Rossi was fired after the gates had been broken down, and after the Government had intimated that if the gates were forced they would surrender to force. The shot was not necessary for the forcing of the gates. There was some evidence that personal motive might have been the cause of Castioni's firing at Rossi. He had not been personally affected by the political grievances, because he had lived in England for many years. There was evidence that he had only come to Ticino the day of the outbreak, and that he left after he saw Rossi fall. This was a question of fact for the magistrate. If there was some evidence for his finding to be based on, the court could not review his finding of fact. The court had only to consider whether there was general evidence that this particular offence was of such a political character that the magistrate was prevented, by the terms of the statute of 1870, from committing the prisoner with a view to his surrender. The magistrate has found that it was an act not "in furtherance of," or "necessary to," or "an overt act in" a political movement.

They cited Billôt Traitées d'Extradition, p. 102; Phillimore's International Law, 3rd ed., vol. I., pp. 551-2.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., for the Swiss Federal Government.—Under article 9 of the Berne Treaty, 1880, the Swiss Government are entitled to be represented by the law officers of the Crown in cases where it may be thought necessary. The court could not question the magistrate's decision were it based solely on evidence of the fact that Castioni fired the shot. They might do so where there was overwhelming fresh evidence on the subject, but not otherwise. The real question before the court is whether, upon the facts as brought before them, the accused came within the treaty as a matter of law? The commissioner's report was not evidence except as showing the condition of things in this little community. It was admitted that there was a political tumult, but only this one death took place, and that death was declared by one of the leaders of the tumult to have been "accidental." There was no evidence of any serious resistance or of any shots being fired by the Government party. Rossi was unarmed. The evidence went to show that this was not a natural incident in the particular political disturbance. If the offence charged was an isolated act, unnecessary to the success of a revolution, and not called for by any violence, or reasonable fear of violence, that was not an offence within the privilege of the Act as "an offence of a political character."

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., replied.

The following sections of the Extradition Act, 1870, were cited:—

"2. Where an arrangement has been made with any foreign State with respect to the surrender to such State of any fugitive criminals, her Majesty may, by Order in Council, direct that this Act shall apply in the case of such foreign State."

"3. The following restrictions shall be observed with respect to the surrender of fugitive criminals:—

"(1) A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered if the offence in respect of which his surrender is demanded is one of a political character, or if he prove to the satisfaction of the police magistrate of the court before whom he is brought on habeas corpus, or to the Secretary of State, that the requisition for his surrender has, in fact, been made with a view to try or punish him for an offence of a political character.

"(2) A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered to a foreign State unless provision is made by the law of that State, or by arrangement, that the fugitive criminal shall not, until he has been restored or had an opportunity of returning to her Majesty's dominions, be detained or tried in that foreign State for any offence committed prior to his surrender other than the extradition crime proved by the facts on which the surrender is grounded."

"(7) A requisition for the surrender of a fugitive criminal of any foreign State who is in, or suspected of being in, the United Kingdom shall be made to a Secretary of State by some person recognized by the Secretary of State as a diplomatic representative of that foreign State. A Secretary of State may, by order under his hand and seal, signify to a police magistrate that such requisition has been made, and require him to issue his warrant for the apprehension of the fugitive criminal."

"If the Secretary of State is of opinion that the offence is of a political character, he may, if he think fit, refuse to send any such order, and may also at any time order a fugitive criminal accused or convicted of such offence to be discharged from custody."

"(10) In a case of a fugitive criminal accused of an extradition crime, if the foreign warrant authorizing the arrest of such criminal is duly authenticated, and such evidence is produced as (subject to the provisions of this Act) would, according to the law of England, justify the committal for trial of the prisoner if the crime of which he is accused had been committed in England, the police magistrate shall commit him to prison, but otherwise shall order him to be discharged."

"(11) If a police magistrate commits a fugitive criminal to prison he shall inform such criminal that he shall not be surrendered until after the expiration of fifteen days, and that he has a right to apply for a writ of habeas corpus."

DENMAN, J.—This case is of such considerable importance that if I had the slightest doubt on the subject I should be disposed to reserve my judgment, not so much for the purpose of considering what judgment to give, but in order to give it in the best shape. But other considerations apply here. The man is in custody, and there should be no greater delay than necessary if our decision is to be for his discharge. After the very able and exhaustive discussion we have had before us I have no doubt whatever that this case is one in which we ought to order his discharge. There has been no legal decision to guide us on the meaning of the section in the Extradition Act, 1870, on which this case mainly depends. Many suggestions for its interpretation have been offered, and much light has been thrown on the language used by text-books and by great political authorities, and by a very learned philosopher—John Stuart Mill. Though not strictly legal authority, the interpretations offered have rightly been cited as very useful to our present decision, and especially the comments of my brother Stephen in his very valuable History of the Criminal Law; but I do not think it necessary or desirable for us to attempt to lay down a definition which would embrace every state of things which might bring particular cases within the description of "offences of a political character." It is no good to try and draw up an exact and exhaustive definition never to be departed from, and to be cited in future courts of law to meet cases which must vary in their circumstances.

It is necessary, however, first to express my view on one matter on which I hold a very strong opinion. If the description given by Mill of offences of a political character were to be construed as embracing "any act done in the course of a political rising" without reference to the object and intention of the political rising, that would be a wrong definition, and not one legally applicable. It was suggested that the sentence should be read in the following way: "any act done in the cause of, and in furtherance of, the political rising," substituting "and" for "or," and that the first phrase is only an alias for the second. At any rate, I agree with the Solicitor-General that the words taken in any other sense than that would give a wrong definition. To bring the case within the exception in the Act, and to avoid extradition for an act of murder, it must be at least shown that the act was done in furtherance of, or with the intention of assisting, or was an overt act in the course of active proceedings in a political matter, whether in the form of an actual rising, or in a dispute between two acknowledged political parties. There must be something of that sort shown to bring a case within the terms of the Act. Another point raised I must deal with. It was argued that it was for the parties claiming extradition to bear the onus of proving that the action was not of a political character, and on the other hand it was said that if the offence was shown to be extraditable, it was for the accused to prove the political character of his action. I do not think it is possible to decide the true meaning of the statute by any such test as to onus.

It was not intended that upon a scrap of a primâ facie case the rights of either one or the other party should have to depend upon the chance of the one throwing any particular onus or proof on the other. The words of the Act are against any such intention. The section runs, "A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered if the offence in respect of which his surrender is demanded is one of a political character, or if he prove, to the satisfaction of the police magistrate, or to the Secretary of State, or the court before whom he is brought on habeas corpus, that the requisition for his surrender has, in fact, been made with a view to try or punish him for an offence of a political character." Then come certain other restrictions in regard to his extradition, one, finally, that he "shall not be surrendered until the expiration of fifteen days from the date of his committal." In none of the sections is anything said as to the onus probandi being on the prisoner to prove that he comes within any of the restrictions or exceptions. There was also a contention advanced that we could not review in any way any decision of fact found by the magistrate. What the Solicitor-General seemed to say at first was that, when once the magistrate has made up his mind in a case on any question of fact we had no jurisdiction to review or hear the evidence, or even fresh evidence, on any fact so found. I think that such a contention cannot be maintained in the face of the Act, and the Solicitor-General rightly abandoned such a sweeping contention. The accused is, by the Act, to be expressly informed by the magistrate of his right to apply for a writ of habeas corpus within a given time. If he is so entitled to apply, it follows that the Queen's Bench or any court to which the application is properly made must have power to go into the evidence on the matter, and in some cases, if fresh and cogent evidence is produced before such court other than that produced before the magistrate, that court could not be crippled in their jurisdiction by the fact that the magistrate had, upon other evidence or in some cases even upon the same evidence, come to a different conclusion than that which might appear correct to the court.

With these observations, and after the admissions made, and rightly made, in the course of the arguments, this question comes to be one of mixed law and fact, and, in reality, one mainly of fact. We have to decide really whether the facts produced before this court bring the case within the third restriction, and show the offence to be one of a political character. It is not now disputed that a state of things existed in Ticino which went to show more than a mere small rising of a few people. It has been clearly made out that something serious, amounting, at the moment, to civil war, existed there on the occasion of this act being committed. An armed body of men, with arms seized from a Government arsenal, rushed to the municipal house, where the members of the Government were assembled. There was some firing. The gate is broken down. It is perfectly plain that Castioni had taken part in the movement at an earlier part of the day. He had taken a share in binding certain captured members of the Government. He was seen with a pistol in his hand before the attack on the municipal house. He joins a multitude of men all armed. All this goes to show that he was taking an active part in the revolt from the first, and it seems to me quite immaterial that he had previous to this occasion lived for some time in England. A very small part of all the evidence produced in this case really affects the question we have to decide. The message of Commissioner Kuntsli we only allowed to be read, not in any sense as evidence of facts, but only as tending to show the character of the rising. It was never intended to be used by us for any other purpose. The question for us is simply whether the act done is to be adjudged, from the depositions and affidavits before us, an act done, not only in the course of, but as actually part of, a political rising.

I quite agree with Sir Charles Russell's observation, that we cannot decide this question by inquiring whether the act was a good or wise one for the furtherance of the political object in view. Such a consideration would not be consistent with the words of the statute. Nor would it be right to limit such action to any test of its necessity—for instance, by dwelling upon the fact that one witness for the accused admitted that the shooting of Rossi was unnecessary for the success of the revolution. The question is simply whether the act was, one of many, undertaken for a political object. There is only a very shadowy suggestion that the act was committed for any private object. The alleged allusion by the accused to the assassination of his brother is only asserted in the commissioner's message, and we cannot take that as evidence of the fact of such an exclamation. There is not a scrap of evidence before us to show that Rossi was in any way connected with the death of this brother of Castioni, which took place ten years ago. There is really very little dispute as to what actually took place in the attack on the municipal hall. I could go through the evidence if necessary and could point out that there is nothing to displace the view that at the moment when Castioni fired (assuming that he was sufficiently identified as the man who fired the particular shot) the reasonable presumption is that he, knowing nothing of Rossi personally and without any private spite against him, fired under the impression that his death or disablement would advance and be in furtherance of the very object of the rising—namely, to get rid of the existing Government and under the reasonable supposition that until the place was actually captured resistance of some sort was being made. That, I think, is the fair and reasonable presumption to be deduced from all the evidence before us. It is not necessary to demonstrate what was actually the position of affairs at the exact moment when the shot was fired. There was undoubtedly confusion and tumult, in which Castioni was actually involved, and I agree that we cannot measure the exact state of mind of men engaged under such circumstances by the standard of calm deliberation which might be calculated on under other circumstances. I think that this warrant for a habeas corpus ought to issue, and that it would be contrary to the spirit and to the meaning of the Act if we held otherwise.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question for the magistrate to decide was whether there was primâ facie evidence of the shot which killed Rossi being fired by Castioni. No doubt there was a sufficient primâ facie case made out to that effect. But it is said the accused ought not to be given up unless the offence was proved to be in itself an extraditable offence, and by the statute the offence is not extraditable—that is to say, the accused is not to be surrendered where the offence is proved to be one of a political character. The magistrate here held that there was a primâ facie case made out upon which the accused might have been put on his trial in England for murder, and that the offence charged was not of a political character. We must ask ourselves whether, having regard to the whole circumstances of the case as shown upon the depositions before us, the offence charged was of a political character. Now it is impossible to say that, if a man has a right to move the High Court (or any other court) for a writ of habeas corpus for his own release, we might not go into all the matters brought before us. The court can in no way be precluded from adjudicating upon the facts of the case as presented to them. The magistrate only states his opinion that a primâ facie case has been made out for extradition of the accused. I have no doubt in my own mind that the magistrate has no right or jurisdiction to find finally as against the accused, who is expressly given this right of claiming a writ of habeas corpus, that the offence was one of a political character. It has been argued also that upon the person seeking his discharge lies the onus of proving the offence to be one of a political character. Upon the first point sections 9 and 11 of the Extradition Act, 1873, throw light. By these the magistrate is bound to receive any evidence tendered to show that the crime charged is an offence of a political character, and if, notwithstanding such evidence, he commits the accused he is bound to inform him that he will not be surrendered until after the expiration of fifteen days, and that he has a right to apply for a writ of habeas corpus. Then, again, there is a power under section 7 given to the Secretary of State to discharge a fugitive criminal from custody, even after his committal, if he is of opinion that the offence is one of a political character. These provisions are sufficient to show that the magistrate's decision is by no means binding in law or fact, and that this court must consider the whole case as it is placed before them, whether on new or old evidence, to see whether the offence be one of a political character or not.

Assuming, then, that cogent evidence has been shown of murder, ought a fugitive criminal to be surrendered? If the murder be an offence of a political character, the accused is exempted by the Act from being surrendered. Now I entirely dissent from the proposition that any act done in the course of a political rising must be said to be of a political character. If, notwithstanding the fact of a political rising being proved, an act which takes place in the course of it is shown to be done for purposes of revenge, or if it were shown that the accused had deliberately shot an unoffending man in such a manner that he might be reasonably presumed to have been guilty of murder, such an act could have no relation to political crime, and must be universally punished. What is, then, a crime of a political character? Is there any definition? I think there is none so satisfactory and complete as that given by my brother Stephen in his learned and valuable History of the Criminal Law, vol. ii., p. 71, and I adopt that definition absolutely as the best capable of being given. I refer to the sentence, "I think the expression in the Extradition Act ought to be interpreted to mean that fugitive criminals ought not to be surrendered for extradition crimes, if those crimes are incidental to and form part of a political disturbance." Were, then, these acts here of a political character? There was a rising, a levying war on the existing Government, the parties engaged in the rising anticipated violent resistance. Five men, members of the Government, were caught, bound, and placed at the head of the revolutionists for the very purpose of protecting themselves against the resistance and probable firing anticipated. They then proceed to attack the Government building.

It seems to me utterly immaterial whether the gate was broken down or not. The sole question is, Was this act of shooting Rossi done by the accused in his character of political insurgent at the time? His former or usual residence is immaterial. He was treated as a citizen of the place, and he is not to be deprived of the privilege given by the statute because, even after the place had been successfully broken into, he made use of a revolver in his political capacity as an insurgent. There is no evidence to satisfy a court that his object in going to the palace or in joining the revolt was to take Rossi's life from any private grievance or purpose of revenge for any act done by Rossi. It is not proved that Rossi was even known to him. Many actions done at such a time may be without or against all reason. We must not look too closely on the actions of men hot in a tumult of political excitement. Things may be done contrary to all reason, yet in furtherance of a political object, even though the action taken and the deeds done may be deplored, and however cruel and irrational they may seem afterwards under calm reflection. This rule must be made absolute.

STEPHEN, J.—So much has been said as to the definition which I attempted to draw in my book as to the meaning of the words "political offence" that I will only add that I adhere to the definition I have there laid down. As to the facts of this case, it is obvious that the act of shooting took place in a scene of great confusion and excitement. However wrong that act may have been, or however unnecessary, is not for us to consider. It was clearly an incident of the insurrection, and as such comes within the definition of a "political offence" before cited.

Criminal law—Larceny—Fraudulent misappropriation —"Broker, attorney, or other agent"—"Security for the payment of money"—Bill of exchange without drawer's name—Larceny Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 75—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 18.

A document which is complete as a bill of exchange, except that it is not signed by the drawer, is "a security for the payment of money" within section 75 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. It is a question for the jury whether a person who had some interest in a bill-discounting transaction beyond that of a broker or agent only, was intrusted with the bill "as a broker or agent."

Case stated by the Recorder of the City of London.

The prisoner had been tried at the Central Criminal Court upon an indictment under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 75, which enacts as follows:—"Whosoever having been intrusted, either solely or jointly with any other person, as a banker, merchant, broker, attorney, or other agent, with any money or security for the payment of money with any direction in writing to apply, pay, or deliver such money or security or any part thereof respectively, or the proceeds or any part of the proceeds of such security, for any purpose or to any person specified in such direction, shall, in violation of good faith and contrary to the terms of such direction, in anywise convert to his own use or benefit, . . . such money, security, or proceeds, or any part thereof, respectively, . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

The prisoner was convicted, and the question for the court was whether he was properly convicted upon the following facts which were proved at the trial.

Messrs. Tebbitt Bros. being in need of additional capital, inserted an advertisement in the newspapers that they required from £10,000 to £15,000. To that advertisement the prisoner replied by sending by post his visiting card, "Mr. Bowerman, Belmont House, Peckham Rye, S.E.," with a memorandum on the back that, should personal services not be essential, he would be glad of particulars of the advertisement.

Shortly afterwards Mr. A. P. Tebbitt called upon the prisoner at his residence, and the prisoner then represented to him that he was a bill broker or money lender and a bill discounter, and that he had large facilities for advancing the capital required. At a subsequent interview it was arranged that the prisoner was to draw bills upon Messrs. Tebbitt Bros. to the extent of £5,000, and endeavour to get them discounted at a moderate rate of interest; a document was drawn up and signed by Mr. Tebbitt, setting out the terms of the arrangement, and this was the direction in writing referred to in the indictment. This document was as follows:—

"Mr. Bowerman.

"Dear Sir,—In accordance with our interview with you, we agree to enter into an arrangement with you in connection with bills of exchange by drawing upon us at four months, gradually, to the amount of £5,000, and endeavour to discount the same at a moderate rate of interest, but in no event is the rate to exceed 7½ per cent. on the 80 per cent. (to be paid us on the proceeds of the bills), or 2 per cent. over the Bank of England rate to be charged us, and half stamps as usual. The bills to be kept renewed for a period of three years, and when eventually paid off by us we undertake to provide the 80 per cent. proportion.—Yours truly, "TEBBITT BROTHERS.

"P.S.—We have accepted for you five bills—total amount £1,886 14s. 2d.—T. BROS."

And a similar document was signed by the prisoner and handed to Mr. Tebbitt. The prisoner then produced five stamped bill forms and drew five bills of exchange addressed to Messrs. Tebbitt Bros. for sums amounting altogether to £1,886 14s. 2d., and including among them the two bills referred to in the indictment. He handed them to the Messrs. Tebbitt for acceptance, and they accepted them, and handed them back to the prisoner, who signed a memorandum (at the foot of the document above referred to as having been handed to Mr. Tebbitt) that he had received those acceptances on account in pursuance of the arrangement, and also a memorandum as follows:—"In the event of my not discounting the said bills I agree to return them to you cancelled within three days.—F. B."

At the time these bills were handed to the prisoner the drawer's name was left blank, but the bills were in all other respects complete. The prisoner afterwards handed the two bills referred to in the indictment to Mr. L. Berg, and requested him to discount them. When they were handed to him no drawer's name was upon them, and the prisoner requested Mr. Berg to sign as drawer, which he did. Mr. Berg then got the bills discounted and handed the prisoner the amount of the discount less his commission, and the prisoner, in violation of good faith, converted that sum to his own use.

The bills were described in the different counts of the indictment both as bills of exchange and as acceptances.

Poland, Q.C. (Metcalfe with him), for the prisoner. —The instruments which were handed over to the prisoner were inchoate only—bills of exchange without any drawer's name upon them. Such instruments are not securities for the payment of money within the section: Reg. v. Harper, 29 W. R. 743, 7 Q. B. D. 78; Reg. v. Hart, 6 C. & P. 106; Stoessiger v. The South-Eastern Railway Co., 2 W. R. 375, 3 E. & B. 549; McCall v. Taylor, 13 W. R. 840. The transactions between the prisoner and the prosecutor amounted to a partnership, and the prisoner was, therefore, not a "broker or other agent": Reg. v. Portugal, 34 W. R. 42, 16 Q. B. D. 487.

Horace Avory, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

DENMAN, J.—The first point that was argued before us was whether this document is a valuable security for the payment of money properly described as a bill of exchange or an acceptance. We think that there was very good ground for finding it to be so. It was said that in order to support the conviction it must have been such at the time when it was intrusted to the prisoner. Now what was the condition of this document at the time when it came to the prisoner's hands? At that time the amount had been inserted, it had been accepted by the persons to whom it was addressed, it was properly stamped, and all that was wanted to make it complete was the name of the drawer.

It appears to me that the case is covered by section 18 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which enacts that "a bill may be accepted before it has been signed by the drawer or while otherwise incomplete." It is thus laid down that a bill accepted before it is drawn may be considered to be an acceptance. Nothing remained but to add the name of the drawer and the instrument became available, as it was, in fact, made available in this case for purposes of fraud.

Several cases have been cited on behalf of the prisoner's contention, but they are all distinguishable from this case. In Reg. v. Harper an indorsement was required to make the instrument a valuable security, and no valid indorsement was ever made; the case is not in pari materia with the present. In Reg. v. Hart there was a very good ground upon which all the judges relied—viz., that the document was not a security for anything; no sum was filled in, and when people speak of a document being a security for money they do not mean a security for any sum which may be filled in, but a security for a certain sum. That case is an authority only to that extent. As to Stoessiger v. South-Eastern Railway Co., there the document had never reached the hands of the drawer at all, and that is fatal to that case as an authority in the present. In McCall v. Taylor the document was not dated, and as the sum was not payable on demand there was no security for the payment of money at any time.

As to the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, Mr. Poland has contended that, according to the definition of a bill of exchange, this document was not a bill of exchange; but I think that section 18 disposes of that argument. "A bill may be accepted"; that means there may be a valid acceptance, and that was so here. Immediately this document got into the hands of a person he could make it available at any moment; it is a valuable security. The prisoner took this valuable security and improperly converted it to his own use.

As to the point whether the prisoner was a broker or other agent, the only question for us to consider is, was there evidence to go to the jury on the point? But the prisoner himself described himself as a bill broker; as a bill broker he took this document for the purpose of getting it discounted, and fraudulently appropriated the proceeds, which were, to a considerable extent at all events, the property of the prosecutor. On this point also, I think the verdict was warranted, and the conviction must be sustained.

POLLOCK, B.—I was not without some doubt upon these points, but I have arrived at the same conclusion as my brother Denman. The question is not, Is this a bill of exchange? but, Is it a security for the payment of money? I am clear that it is such a security as a business man or a banker would take as a security for the payment of money. That disposes of the first point. As to the second, it was said that the prisoner had an interest in this transaction beyond that of a broker or agent. If that were so it does not follow that he was not a broker or agent within the meaning of the statute, and I entirely concur with my learned brother in thinking that the jury were justified in their finding.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that it would be very dangerous to hold that this was not a security for money. The arrangement was that the prisoner should draw the bills; in pursuance of the arragement he got the bill stamps, drew the bills addressed to Messrs. Tebbitt, and handed them to Messrs. Tebbitt for acceptance; they accepted them and handed them back to the prisoner, who was to get them discounted. If under these circumstances they were not valuable securities my notion of valuable securities is altogether astray. Take the unindorsed cheque of a solvent person with money in his bank, it is deposited with some other person by the man in whose favour it was drawn; is it to be said that that is not a valuable security? undoubtedly it is a valuable security, and yet the indorsement was not on it when it left the drawer's hands. On the second question I entertain even less doubt. The prisoner introduced himself to the prosecutors in answer to an advertisement, and described himself as a bill broker. Apart from his being a bill broker he was an agent in every sense for the purpose of getting these bills discounted on the understanding that he should hand over the proceeds. I think there was evidence of his being both broker and agent, and as these documents were securities for the payment of money I think the conviction was right and must stand.

STEPHEN, J.—My opinion and the reasons for it have been so fully expressed by my brother Hawkins that I do not desire to add anything.

CHARLES, J.—I concur.

By deed of settlement made in 1872 certain lands stood limited upon trusts for persons by way of succession, and the settlement gave the trustees power to sell. Other lands were subsequently devised by will to the trustees for the time being of the settlement of 1872 upon the same trusts as were declared in the settlement of 1872 concerning the lands therein comprised; and by the same will the testator bequeathed his residuary personal estate to his three executors (one of whom was also a trustee of the settlement of 1872) *upon trust to convert and invest in the purchase of lands to be settled upon the trusts in the will declared concerning the lands therein devised. Held, by North, J., that, in the case of settled land consisting of a mining property, the erection of a new pumping engine and of new pumps for the purpose of carrying out an effective system of drainage were "improvements" authorized under section 25, sub-sections (xix.), (xx.), of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Appeal from North, J.

Certain lands in Derbyshire called the Shipley Estate were, by a deed of settlement dated the 2nd of November, 1872, conveyed by A. M. Mundy and his eldest son, A. E. M. Mundy, to the use of the father and son successively for life, with remainder to trustees (Sir H. Wilmot and Francis Smith) for a term of years upon certain trusts, with remainder to the first and other sons of the son successively in tail male, with remainders over in strict settlement; and the trustees were thereby empowered, with the consent of the tenant for life for the time being, to sell the premises thereby granted, and were directed to invest the moneys payable on such sale in the purchase of other lands to be settled to the same uses.

The father (A. M. Mundy) died in 1877, having by his will devised other lands not comprised in the settlement of 1872, to the trustees for the time being of that settlement, to the uses and upon the trusts and subject to the powers in the settlement of 1872 declared concerning the lands comprised therein; and he bequeathed his residuary personal estate to his executors (the said Sir H. Wilmot, Edward Hall, and the said A. E. M. Mundy) and directed his executors to invest the same in the purchase of lands, and to settle the lands so purchased to the uses and upon the trusts declared in the will concerning the testator's other lands therein devised.

The Shipley Estate was a large mining property, and a scheme for the effective drainage of the mines thereon had been prepared, which would require the erection of a new pumping engine and new pumps, the existing engine and pumps being worn out and insufficient. The trustees of the settlement of 1872 had no capital money under that settlement in their hands, but a large sum (£170,000) representing part of the testator's residuary personal estate was in the hands of the testator's executors, and it was desired to apply that sum in paying the cost of the execution of the works proposed by the scheme.

A summons was accordingly taken out by A. E. M. Mundy, the present tenant for life, to have it determined whether such an application of the money in question was authorized by the Settled Land Act, 1882.

North, J., held that the proposed works were "improvements" under section 25, sub-section (xx.), of the Settled Land Act, 1882, but he also held that the trustees were not authorized in applying the money in question, representing the testator's residuary personal estate remaining uninvested in the hands of the executors, in paying the costs of these improvements; his lordship referred to the cases and expressed doubts, first, as to whether the settlement of 1872 and the will could be considered as constituting one settlement, so that capital money arising under the will might also be deemed capital money under the settlement of 1872; and, secondly, whether the money in question, while remaining as money uninvested in the hands of the executors could be treated as "capital money" even under the will, without first going through the process of investing it in land and then selling the land and applying the proceeds.

From the latter part of this decision the applicant (the tenant for life) appealed.

The material sections of the Settled Land Act, 1882, are section 2, sub-section (1), which enacts that "any deed, will, . . . or other instrument or any number of instruments . . . under or by virtue of which instrument or instuments any land, or any estate or interest in land, stands, for the time being, limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession, creates or is for the purpose of this Act a settlement, and is in this Act referred to as a settlement, or as the settlement, as the case requires."

Section 33, "Where under a settlement money is in the hands of trustees and is liable to be laid out in the purchase of land to be made subject to the settlement, then, in addition to such powers of dealing therewith as the trustees have independently of this Act, they may, at the option of the tenant for life, invest or apply the same as capital money arising under this Act."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Dibdin, for the appellant. —The settlement of 1872 and the settlement under the will really constitute only one settlement, because the settlement under the will expressly incorporates the terms of the settlement of 1872. The limitations and the devolution of the estates are identical in both, and it is not material that the trustees of the settlement of 1872 and those of the will are not exactly the same persons; the two settlements, therefore, constitute one settlement: In re Lord Stamford's Settled Estates, 38 W. R. 317, 43 Ch. D. 84. Secondly, section 2, sub-section (1), and section 33 taken together show that the money in question is "capital money" under the Settled Land Act, 1882, and can, therefore, be applied as such in paying the costs of the proposed improvements. The cases of In re Mackenzie's Trust, 31 W. R. 948, 23 Ch. D. 750, and In re Tennant, 37 W. R. 542, 40 Ch. D. 594 (which were referred to but doubted by North, J.), show that it is not necessary in order to treat the money in question as "capital money" to first go through the process of investing it in land and then selling that land.

Sydney Williams, for the trustees of the settlement, did not oppose the appeal.

LINDLEY, L.J.—[The Lord Justice stated shortly the facts of the case and the nature of the appeal, and proceeded:—] The money in question, and out of which it is sought to have the costs of these improvements paid, is a sum of £170,000 in the hands of the trustees of the will (one of whom is also a trustee of the settlement of 1872), and that sum represents, either wholly or in part, the residuary personal estate of the testator A. M. Mundy, and the trusts on which that sum of £170,000 is held are the trusts of the settlement of 1872. That is so by the express terms of the will. [The Lord Justice read the clauses above mentioned of the will, and continued:—] Therefore we have it that this £170,000 is, by the express terms of the will, to be laid out in lands, which are to be settled to the same uses and upon the same trusts and purposes as the lands comprised in the settlement of 1872, and there is no possible distinction, either present or future, between the persons who are interested in the settled lands—i.e., the lands comprised in the settlement of 1872—and the persons who would be interested in the lands bought, if any are bought, with the £170,000. The limitations are the same, and the persons beneficially interested must be the same now and hereafter.

Under these circumstances, is there any real difficulty in doing that which the court is asked to do in this case? That turns upon an examination of section 2 (1) and section 33 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. [The Lord Justice read section 2, clause (1), and continued:—] Looking at those words, what is required to be found in order to constitute a settlement seems to be some instrument or instruments under which some estate or interest in land stands, for the time being, limited in trust for persons by way of succession. If you look at that language in a microscopic or narrow way, you may raise this difficulty and say, "Here is money to be laid out in land, but before it has been laid out in land at all, can it be said that there is any land which stands, for the time being, limited to the trusts of the settlement?" That is a hypercritical interpretation, which would lead to the inference that it cannot; but even if we were disposed to put such a narrow construction on those words, section 33 shows that that would be a mistake. [The Lord Justice read section 33, and continued:—] Now, taking that section in connection with section 2, sub-section (1), it seems to me that the Legislature has taken the trouble to say that that hypercritical interpretation ought not to prevail, and that where you have a direction that moneys shall be laid out in the purchase of lands to be settled upon persons by way of succession then those moneys are "capital moneys" within this Act.

That is the construction which has been placed upon this section by Chitty, J., in In re Mackenzie's Trusts, and which was followed by North, J., in In re Tennant, and it is also the view adopted, as I understand it, by Stirling, J., in In re Lord Stamford's Settled Estates, which was a more difficult case than either of the two preceding ones. If we look at the object of the Act it seems to me that we are perfectly safe in going thus far—that where you have two instruments, by one of which lands are settled, and by the other of which (referring, as here, to the former instrument) money is directed to be laid out in land to be settled to the same uses, then that money is capital money for the purposes of both, or of either. How the case would be if we had to deal with two distinct instruments with distinct limitations under them we need not consider. We are dealing with a case in which the will refers to the settlement and in which the limitations are the same, and it appears to me that there is no difficulty in this case when one bears in mind and construes this Act of Parliament for the purpose of carrying out the plain and clear object which the Legislature had in contemplation.

I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to succeed, and that the order made by North, J., should be varied by striking out the word "not" before the word "authorized."

LOPES, L.J.—The trusts of the fund in question and of the settlement of 1872 are identical. The devolution is also the same. It appears to me that this case is within section 2, sub-section (1), and section 33, and this conclusion is, to my mind, in accordance with the language of the Act and also in accordance with its spirit. I should be very sorry to be obliged to come to any other conclusion than that at which we have arrived.

I entirely agree with what has been said, and that this appeal should be allowed.

KAY, L.J.—I quite appreciate the difficulty which North, J., felt in this case. At present it seems to me that the case is a very arguable one on either of the points which he raised. The learned judge thought that there were difficulties in two respects; the one, whether this money could be considered "capital money" under the Act, because it had never been invested in land at all; and the other, whether the improvements which it was desirous to make were improvements on lands within the settlement by which the money was settled.

Now the facts are shortly these. There was a settlement of land to legal limitations by way of uses, by deed in 1872, and among the trusts of that settlement there was a trust by which the trustees had power to sell that land. Then there was a will under which the money in question is derived, and this will dealt also with land, but of course with other land—i.e., lands not comprised in the settlement of 1872—and dealt with that land by directing it to go according to the uses and trusts of that settlement exactly and without any difference. Then the will also dealt with the money now in question, and directed that it should be invested in lands to be settled on the same uses and trusts, and in accordance with the powers contained in that settlement. There was this difference between the two instruments, that although one of the trustees of the will was also trustee of the settlement of 1872, yet the trustees of the will were not altogether the same as the trustees of the settlement, and of course, when the settlement under the will came to be made, it could not be made in the names only of the trustees of the settlement without their consent; it seems to me probable, therefore, that the power of selling the lands comprised in the will and the lands which ought to be bought under the trusts of the will, might be vested in persons different to those in whom was vested the power of selling the lands comprised in the settlement of 1872. In one sense, therefore, and in the strictest possible sense of the word, there were two settlements, one by the deed of 1872, and the other by the will, which was a separate settlement settling other lands, and moneys to be invested in lands, on trusts which were declared by reference to the settlement of 1872, but the trusts were identical. There was the same tenant for life of the two, and if the money dealt with by the will had been invested in lands the same person would have been tenant for life of those lands, and after his life estate had determined, all the lands, both under the will and under the settlement would go by the same series of limitations which are explicitly set forth in the settlement.

Now, although the limitations are the same, yet, nevertheless, in one sense, those are two settlements. In the strictest sense of the word, they are separate settlements. But are they two separate settlements for the purpose and intention of this Act? No doubt a slight ambiguity arises on the terms of the section which has been referred to. Assuming that there is an ambiguity, what is the proper mode of construing an Act of this kind? The proper mode is to ascertain what the scope and intention of the Act is. Is it within the scope and purport of the Act that, where land and money are settled on identically the same trusts, the money should be applicable to the improvement of that land? It seems to me that, unless it were so, there would be a clear casus omissus in the Act, and I do not think that the language of the section can be read so hypercritically as to oblige us to come to any conclusion other than the conclusion we have come to.

In this particular case I have come to the conclusion (although I appreciate thoroughly the difficulties of the learned judge in the court below) that this money is capital money both for the purposes of the trusts of the will and of the trusts of the settlement of 1872; and having come to that conclusion, it then seems to me to follow that it is capital money which may be applied in making the improvements sought, on the lands comprised in the settlement of 1872. The will includes money as well as settled lands, and therefore the money is made "capital money" under the will; and it seems to me, on the second point—viz., whether it is applicable to the purposes of improvement of lands under the settlement of 1872—that the proper construction of the Act is to hold that the true scope and object of the Act is to make it so applicable.

I therefore agree with the rest of the court.

Practice—Security for costs—Motion for new trial—Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44)—Ord. 58, r. 15.

As a general rule, the Court of Appeal will not order a party moving for a new trial, under the Judicature Act, 1890, of an action tried with a jury to give security for the costs of the motion.

Application by the defendants for security for the costs occasioned by the plaintiff's application for a new trial.

The action had been tried by a judge with a jury, and the motion for a new trial was entered in the Court of Appeal in accordance with the provisions of the Judicature Act, 1890, and the rule made under that Act.

J. G. Witt, for the defendants.—The court has jurisdiction in this case to order security for costs. The effect of the Judicature Act, 1890, is to bring the case within ord. 58, r. 15, as the motion for a new trial is now an "appeal" within the meaning of this rule.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., Raven, and Baines, for the plaintiff, were not called upon to argue.

The COURT refused the application on the ground that the defendants' affidavits did not show with sufficient clearness that the plaintiff, if unsuccessful, would be unable to pay the costs, but they reserved their opinion on the question of jurisdiction.

Dec. 19.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case an application for security for costs was made on the ground that the party moving for a new trial would not be able, if unsuccessful, to pay his opponents' costs. We took time to consider whether we ought to require security for costs to be given by a party moving in this court for a new trial under the Judicature Act, 1890. We have come to the conclusion that we ought to deal with these cases as nearly as possible in the same way as they were dealt with by the Divisional Court when the application for a new trial was made before them in the first instance. As a general rule no security was required to be given by a party moving for a new trial in the Divisional Court, and we think that we ought not to alter the practice in that respect now that they come in the first instance before us.

Practice—Counter-claim—Default of defence thereto—Mode of obtaining judgment—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 23, r. 4; ord. 27, rr. 2, 11.

Where a plaintiff makes default in delivering a defence to a counter-claim, the defendant cannot sign judgment upon default, but must move for judgment under ord. 27, r. 11.

Higgins v. Scott, 21 Q. B. D. 10, 36 W. R. Dig. 155, followed.

The plaintiff having brought an action for £1,024, the price of goods sold and delivered, the defendant delivered a defence, and counter-claimed for £100 for medical attendance. The plaintiff not having delivered a defence to the counter-claim, the defendant applied at the Central Office to enter judgment on the counter-claim, but it was refused. The defendant thereupon applied ex parte at chambers for leave to enter judgment on the counter-claim. The judge at chambers held, upon the authority of Higgins v. Scott, 21 Q. B. D. 10, 36 W. R. Dig. 155, that judgment could only be signed upon a motion for judgment under ord. 27, r. 11, and dismissed the application. The Divisional Court affirmed this decision.

Cluer, for the defendant, moved ex parte by way of appeal from this decision.—The case is not expressly provided for by the rules. By ord. 23, r. 4, a reply to a counter-claim is to be subject to the rules applicable to statements of defence. In order 27 the word "plaintiff" must be construed as including a plaintiff by counter-claim. Hence ord. 27, r. 2, which provides that if the plaintiffs' claim be only for a liquidated demand, and the defendant does not deliver a defence, the plaintiff may enter final judgment for the amount claimed. The present counter-claim is for a liquidated demand, and therefore the defendant can enter judgment upon it. Ord. 27, r. 11, which provides for a motion for judgment, applies to all other actions than those in the preceding rules of that order. In Higgins v. Scott, the counter-claim was for unliquidated damages. In Burkhardt v. Im Thurm, noted in the Annual Practice for 1890-91, p. 496, the counter-claim was for a liquidated demand, but that case ought not to be followed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case there was a claim and a counter-claim, and no defence to the counter-claim has been delivered. The question is whether the defendant can sign judgment upon such default, or whether a motion for judgment is necessary. The question is simply one of practice. I can see nothing in the rules that is contrary to the practice laid down in Burkhardt v. Im Thurm. I think the practice there laid down, that a motion for judgment is necessary, is a good practice. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The decision of the court below seems to me to be in accordance with the rules. The question depends upon orders 23 and 27. The case seems to me to be within ord. 27, r. 11, which says that in all other actions than those in the preceding rules of this order, if the defendant makes default in delivering a defence, the plaintiff may set down the action on motion for judgment. In my opinion ord. 23, r. 4, which has been relied upon, has no application here. It is important to notice the headings of the different orders. The heading to order 23 is, "Reply and Subsequent Pleadings." That order applies to an action proceeding with pleadings in the usual course. Order 27 is headed "Default of Pleading," and rule 11 seems to me to apply to a default in pleading to a counter-claim, and it provides that a motion for judgment is necessary. That appears to me to be the plain reading of the rules. I therefore think that the decision in Higgins v. Scott is right. Moreover, there is a good reason for this. Suppose an action was brought for £500, and the defendant counter-claimed for £100, and no defence to the counter-claim was delivered. If the defendant was entitled to sign judgment he could issue execution for £100 while the claim against him for £500 would be pending. This rule was framed with the view of preventing that, and to enable the court to keep its control over the action. The defendant, therefore, must come to the court upon motion for judgment.

KAY, L.J.—I entirely agree. The practice has been established by the case of Higgins v. Scott, and it is entirely consistent with the rules. It would be extremely inconvenient to allow a defendant to sign judgment and issue execution upon his counter-claim while the claim was still pending.

Appeal dismissed.

REDFERN v. REDFERN. (a.)

Divorce—Practice—Discovery—Affidavit of documents—Doctrine that "no one is bound to criminate himself," whether applicable where adultery is the charge—Jurisdiction—Infant—Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 68), s. 3—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 68, r. 1 (d).

Although section 3 of the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869, does not relate to discovery at all, but merely to evidence given at the trial of divorce suits, yet it recognizes and is based on the existence of the doctrine that a person questioned as to the fact of his or her adultery is not bound to answer. A party cannot be compelled to discover that which, if discovered, may tend to subject him to any punishment, penalty, forfeiture, or ecclesiastical censure, and, though the fear of ecclesiastical censure is now practically obsolete, it is only natural that the doctrine that no one is bound to criminate himself should be applicable to a charge of such gravity as adultery, notwithstanding that it is not a criminal, but only an ecclesiastical offence.

Although, as a general rule, it is not a sufficient ground for refusing an order for discovery, or for an affidavit of documents, that it may tend to criminate the party against whom it is sought, or that he may thereby be rendered liable to a penalty or ecclesiastical censure, the proper course being to raise that objection, not on the summons for discovery, but in the affidavit made in answer thereto, and with respect to the particular interrogatories or documents as to which the objection applies; yet, if it is evident that the discovery or affidavit of documents is wanted solely for the purpose of proving adultery against the party against whom it is sought, the order ought not to be made.

The court, however, has power to order discovery or an affidavit of documents, even in divorce suits, upon issues other than adultery, subject to the doctrine that no one is bound to criminate himself and to the ordinary rules as to privilege.

Semble (per Lindley, L.J.), that the rule prevailing in the Chancery and Queen's Bench Divisions, not to grant discovery against an infant, never extended to the ecclesiastical courts, and does not now extend to proceedings in divorce, the invariable practice in which is inconsistent with that rule.

Mayor v. Collins, 38 W. R. 349, 24 Q. B. D. 361, distinguished.

Decision of Butt, J., affirmed, but on different grounds.

Appeal from Butt, J.

This was a suit by the husband for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery. The wife was an infant.

The petitioner having taken out a summons asking that the respondent might be ordered to make an affidavit of documents, the objection was raised that, the respondent being an infant, no discovery could be granted against her, and that, the sole object of the order asked for, being to obtain the production or admission of criminating documents, she could not, even irrespective of the question of infancy, be compelled to make the affidavit.

The registrar refused to make an order for an affidavit of documents; and Butt, J., held that he was bound by the case (in the Queen's Bench Division) of Mayor v. Collins, 38 W. R. 349, 24 Q. B. D. 361, to refuse the application on the ground of the respondent's infancy, and he accordingly affirmed the registrar's refusal to order the respondent to make such an affidavit.

The husband appealed.

Section 3 of the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 68), enacts as follows: "The parties to any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, and the husbands and wives of such parties, shall be competent to give evidence in such proceeding: Provided that no witness in any proceeding, whether a party to the suit or not, shall be liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery, unless such witness shall have already given evidence in the same proceeding in disproof of his or her alleged adultery."

Inderwick, Q.C., and Searle, for the appellant.—It was no doubt the practice in chancery to refuse to compel an infant to answer interrogatories, but there is a distinction between that and making an affidavit of documents. [They referred to the Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), ss. 22, 48, and 52.] There is no general order or rule extending the common law practice or the practice in equity to divorce proceedings; but in Winscom v. Winscom, 12 W. R. 535, 3 Sw. & Tr. 380, at p. 384, it appears that the Divorce Court assumed authority to require discovery, and that practice has since been followed. The decision in Mayor v. Collins, by which the learned judge below thought he was bound, is not applicable, because it is based on the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, and those rules do not apply to divorce proceedings: ord. 68, r. 1 (d). [They referred also to Southwark, &c., Water Co. v. Quick, 26 W. R. 328, 341, 3 Q. B. D. 315, 321; Dyke v. Stephens, 33 W. R. 932, 30 Ch. D. 189; and to an unreported case of Novelli v. Novelli.] We shall rely, if necessary, upon the large inherent powers which the ecclesiastical courts formerly possessed. They had inherent power to grant discovery: Dun v. Coates, 1 Atk. 288; Boxley v. Stubbington, 2 Lee, 501. Section 3 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68 will be relied on for the respondent, but it has no application to a case like the present. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Does that section apply to discovery at all?] No, it is not addressed to preliminary proceedings at all, it only applies to the actual trial, as is evident from the preamble to the Act. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Ranger v. Great Western Railway Co., 7 W. R. 426, 4 De G. & J. 74.] The next friend of infant plaintiffs has been ordered to make an affidavit of documents: Crowe v. Governor and Company of Bank of Ireland, 19 W. R. 910. That decision is based on Ranger v. Great Western Railway Co. [Finlay, Q.C., referred to Harvey v. Lovekin, 33 W. R. 188, 10 P. D. 122]. The procedure in divorce is not a criminal procedure: Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe, 23 W. R. 12, L. R. 2 Sc. & D. 374, 387. [BOWEN, L.J.—Is adultery a criminal offence within the meaning of the rule that no person is bound to criminate himself?] Clearly not. The jurisdiction which the Court of Chancery exercises over infants is confined to infants who are wards of court: Hyde v. Hyde, 36 W. R. 708, 13 P. D. 166, where the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that the jurisdiction which the Chancery Division exercised over wards of court was very peculiar, and ought not to be extended to the other divisions. The Evidence Amendment Act, 1869, s. 3, makes parties to the suit competent to give evidence. The literal effect is to make a person charged with adultery a competent witness to disprove, but not to prove, the charge, but in practice it is never treated as making them incompetent witnesses even to that extent. They are called, and do prove adultery every day: Hebblethwaite v. Hebblethwaite, 2 P. & D. 29, 18 W. R. Prob. Dig. 7. The Act was intended to enlarge, not to restrict, the capacity to give evidence.

Finlay, Q.C., and Rufus Isaacs, for the respondent.—The broad, general ground on which the practice of the Queen's Bench Division as to infants rests appears in Morgan v. Thorne, 7 M. & W. 400, 408. There is no good ground for contending that the same practice is not applicable in divorce. In Harvey v. Lovekin it was held that a party interrogated may decline to answer interrogatories tending to criminate him. The rule that no one is compelled to answer questions tending to make him liable to penalties extends to forfeitures and to ecclesiastical censures as well as to penalties. All that Hebblethwaite v. Hebblethwaite decides is, that if a willing witness is called, the Act does not prevent his giving evidence. The rule should, at any rate, be maintained in the case of infants. The old practice in divorce as to ordering discovery appears in the case of Shaw v. Shaw, 2 Sw. & Tr. 642, 10 W. R. Div. Dig. 23; and Pollard v. Pollard, 3 Sw. & Tr. 613, 13 W. R. Div. Dig. 14. There was no greater power in the Divorce Court to give discovery against infants than in the equity or common law courts: Fuller v. Ingram, 7 W. R. 302; Dodd and Brooks' Probate Practice, ed. 1865, pp. 907, 911, note (z). The onus is on the appellant to show that such a practice exists in divorce, and he has been unable to produce a single case to that effect. The rule is, that a case against an infant must be made out without his own assistance, and a next friend or guardian ad litem is not a party, and discovery, therefore, cannot be ordered against him. In re Corsellis, Lawton v. Elwes, 31 W. R. 414; Ingram v. Little, 31 W. R. 858, 11 Q. B. D. 251. The R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 13, which provides that allegations of fact in pleadings, if not denied, shall be taken to be admitted, expressly excepts infants from its operation.

Inderwick, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 16.—LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal is, whether an infant respondent in a suit for dissolution of her marriage, on the ground of her adultery, ought to be required to make an affidavit of documents. Butt, J., has decided that she ought not, and he so decided in supposed conformity with a decision of the Queen's Bench Division in Mayor v. Collins, which is to the effect that an infant is not bound to make such an affidavit in an action in the Queen's Bench Division. That case, however, turned upon the Rules of the Supreme Court—viz., ord. 31, r. 12—and upon the practice of the Court of Chancery before, and of the Chancery Division of the High Court since 1875—when the Judicature Acts came came into operation (see Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 11; R. S. C., 1883, ord. 1, r. 2, and ord. 72, r. 2). But, by ord. 68, r. 1 (d), the Rules of the Supreme Court do not apply to proceedings for divorce, or other matrimonial causes, except when expressly made applicable to such proceedings. There is no rule of the Supreme Court expressly relating to discovery in such proceedings; and the question raised by this appeal must be decided on grounds other than those on which Butt, J., decided it.

When we turn to the Divorce Acts and the rules made under them, no express provision can be found relating directly to the subject in question. There is neither statutory enactment, nor rule, relating directly to discovery or affidavits of documents. The Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), enacts (section 22) that in all suits and proceedings other than proceedings to dissolve any marriage, the court shall proceed on the principles and rules which prevailed in the ecclesiastical courts, but subject to the provisions of the Act, and to the rules and orders made under it; and, by section 53, the court is directed to make such rules and orders concerning the practice and procedure under the Act as it may consider expedient, with power to revoke or alter the same. Now, although no rules have been made relating to discovery or affidavits of documents, yet it is plain that the ecclesiastical courts had, and exercised, the power of compelling suitors in those courts to make discovery; and that this practice has been continued, and discovery, by interrogatories and by affidavit of documents, has been adopted in proceedings for dissolution of marriage, which were beyond the power of the ecclesiastical courts. It is obviously inexpedient to have two sets of rules applicable to discovery in the same court—viz., one set for those matrimonial causes over which the ecclesiastical courts had jurisdiction, and another for those matrimonial causes over which those courts had no jurisdiction; and it is desirable that the practice and procedure should, as far as possible, be the same in both classes of causes.

This view has, I believe, been adopted by the successive judges of the Divorce Court, and a practice has been established, based partly on the old ecclesiastical practice and partly on the rules which prevailed at common law and in equity, and which now prevail in in other branches of the High Court. The power of the ecclesiastical courts to require discovery has been long established and recognized (see 3 Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, 298, and Harvey v. Lovekin, and the cases there referred to). This power, has, in fact, been constantly exercised by the Divorce Court in divorce cases; see Euston v. Smith, 32 W. R. 596, 9 P. D. 57, and Harvey v. Lovekin, in which latter case the practice in this respect was held by the Court of Appeal to be legal, although not founded on any express rule. The practice of requiring affidavits of documents in divorce proceedings seems to have been introduced, or at least settled, in 1864, in Winscom v. Winscom and Pollard v. Pollard, and it has prevailed ever since; and, although not introduced or sanctioned by any express order or rule of the Divorce Court, the decision in Harvey v. Lovekin is an authority for upholding the practice. It was contended that a suit for divorce for adultery was a criminal proceeding, or, at all events, that adultery exposed the adulterer to punishment, or to some kind of penalty —i.e., penance or fine. It was, however, decided by the House of Lords in Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe, 374 that a suit for divorce for adultery was a purely civil, and in no sense a criminal, proceeding. The cases there cited show clearly that no indictment lies at common law for adultery (see 2 Salk. 552); neither is there any statute making it punishable. But adultery, like other forms of fornication and lewdness, expose the guilty party to ecclesiastical censure and punishment (2 Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, 403), and discovery may be resisted on this ground. It is true that ecclesiastical punishment for such offences is practically obsolete, but I cannot say that the jurisdiction of the courts in this respect has ceased. Indeed, the enactment to which I am about to refer is based on the theory that adultery is punishable, and that no person, therefore, is bound to answer any question tending to prove himself or herself guilty of it.

The practice of requiring discovery in divorce cases is not opposed to the statute 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, s. 3, which relates to the examination of parties to divorce suits as witnesses, but that statute clearly recognizes the doctrine that a person asked about his or her adultery is not bound to answer. By that statute parties to proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery are competent witnesses in such proceedings, "provided that no witness in any proceeding, whether party to the suit or not, shall be liable to be asked, or bound to answer, any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery, unless such witness shall have already given evidence in the same proceeding in disproof of his or her alleged adultery." Discovery was enforced, both in the ecclesiastical courts and in the Court of Chancery, long before parties to suits in those courts were competent witnesses in such suits, and the statute in question does not, in truth, relate to discovery at all. A very little reflection will show that, in suits for dissolution of marriage, discovery, whether by interrogatories or affidavit of documents, may be perfectly consistent with the provisions of that Act. In every such suit the marriage of the parties has to be proved; discovery addressed to that subject may be wanted, and, if wanted, is clearly permissible. Again, in a wife's suit for dissolution on the ground of adultery and cruelty or desertion, discovery as to these last matters is equally permissible. On the other hand, adultery being an ecclesiastical offence, and the recognition of this state of the law by the Legislature being obvious from the prohibitory words in the statute, it would be wrong to compel discovery by means of interrogatories the object of which is to obtain answers tending to show that the person interrogated has been guilty of adultery. So, with regard to an affidavit of documents, if there is reason to believe that a party has documents relating to matters in question in the cause, other than his or her adultery, it would be quite right to require an affidavit as to such documents; but, if there is reason to believe that the affidavit is required only for the purpose of discovering documents tending to prove adultery by the person required to make the affidavit, no order for such an affidavit ought to be made. The objection, however, that a person's affidavit of documents, or answer to an interrogatory, may tend to criminate him, is an objection which, as a rule, ought to be raised to the production of a document, or to answering an interrogatory. Exposure to punishment, or to a penalty, does not, as a rule, afford a ground for refusing an order for discovery, or for an affidavit of documents. But if discovery, or an affidavit of documents, is wanted solely for the purpose of proving adultery, no order for discovery or for an affidavit ought to be made. Such an order would be oppressive and unjust.

The next and last point for consideration, and the one mainly relied upon by the appellant, is that an infant cannot be compelled to make any affidavit of documents or other discovery. It has certainly been the long-established rule in Chancery not to require an infant to make discovery, and the same rule was followed in the Queen's Bench Division in Mayor v. Collins. If this matter were open to discussion, I should think the Chancery rule too rigid. Be this as it may, I can find no trace of any such rule in the ecclesiastical courts, and the invariable practice in the Divorce Court has, I am informed, been inconsistent with any such rule. I see no reason why this practice should be declared wrong. The point, however, does not require decision in this case, and I say no more about it. Having made the above observations, I ask myself what useful purpose can possibly be attained by compelling the respondent in this suit to make an affidavit of documents? The only possible purpose must be to extract from her an admission that she has or had documents which tend to prove her own adultery. The pleadings allude to other matters, which are, however, wholly immaterial; but the sole question in the cause is whether she has committed adultery or not. Guided by the principles explained above, I think she ought not to be required to make any affidavit of documents, not because she is an infant, for I should come to the same conclusion if she were adult. She cannot be compelled to produce the letters which the plaintiff desires to see; she cannot be asked any question tending to show that she has been guilty of adultery, and that being the case, to order her to make an affidavit of documents would, in my opinion, be wrong. The appeal, therefore, will be dismissed, with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—It is one of the inveterate principles of English law that a party cannot be compelled to discover that which, if answered, would tend to subject him to any punishment, penalty, forfeiture, or ecclesiastical censure. In these days, when the thunders of the Church have become less formidable, the rule, so far as it relates to ecclesiastical censure, seems to wear an archaic form; but adultery is a charge of such gravity as to render it not unnatural that we should find that the doctrine that "no one is bound to criminate himself" should be applicable to it. Based upon the traditions of a law belonging to an earlier age, and a fear of ecclesiastical monitions, which are now technical and obsolete, the privilege in such a case has never been abrogated. The principle has been recognized as governing similar subject-matter by common law and equity alike (see Finch v. Finch, 2 Ves. sen., at p. 493; Chetwynd v. Lindon, 2 Ves. sen. 450). The ecclesiastical courts have dealt with the question in a like manner. In King v. King, 2 Rob. Ecc. 153, Dr. Lushington held (in a cause of divorce by reason of adultery) that a party in her personal answers to a libel was not bound to answer upon oath to articles which, though not on the face of them criminatory, might by possibility furnish a link in the evidence against herself (see also Swift v. Swift, 4 Hagg. 139, at p. 154).

Such was the law at the date of the passing of the Divorce Act, at which time, it must be remembered, the parties to a suit were incapable in the superior courts of giving evidence themselves on oath in their own case. The statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, which rendered parties to a suit or action competent and compellable to give evidence, provided by section 4 as follows:—"Nothing herein contained shall apply to any action, suit, proceeding, or bill in any court of common law, or in any ecclesiastical court, or in either House of Parliament, instituted in consequence of adultery." And in section 2 of the Evidence Amendment Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 83), there was included a similar provision. Such was the law at the time when the present Divorce Court was instituted, and it remains to be seen whether the Legislature has anywhere justified a practice, hitherto unknown, of compelling a party to a divorce proceeding to make answer upon oath of any matter which might tend to prove him or her guilty of adultery. By section 43 of the Act of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85 (the Divorce Act, 1857), the court was empowered to order the attendance of the petitioner, and to examine, or permit him or her to be examined or cross-examined, on oath on the hearing of any petition; but the section provided that no petitioner should be bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she had been guilty of adultery; and, by section 48, the rules of evidence observed in the superior courts of common law were made applicable to, and were to be observed in, the trial of all questions of fact in the court (see Deane v. Deane, 1 Sw. & Tr., at p. 90). An important change in the law was no doubt effected by the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, being "an Act for the further amendment of the law of evidence." [The Lord Justice read section 3 of that Act, and continued:—] It seems to result from the history of the subject already set forth that no power existed down to the Divorce Act, and that no power has since been given by the Legislature, to compel a witness to make any answer on oath which would tend to show that he or she was guilty of adultery.

On the principles of law hitherto recognized as applicable to such cases, no interrogatories, moreover, addressed directly or indirectly to the sole proof of adultery, ought to be permitted, and, on similar grounds, the court cannot properly compel discovery on oath of documents which can only be material so far as they may tend to establish that issue, although in ordinary cases such an objection would naturally be raised, not on the summons for discovery, but in the affidavit made in answer thereto. I do not doubt for a moment that the court has the power of allowing interrogatories and discovery both in ordinary cases, and even in divorce suits, upon issues which are not directed to the proof of adultery; subject always to the ordinary principles of the law of privilege, and to the same doctrine (wherever applicable) that no one is bound to criminate himself.

In Euston v. Smith, which was a suit of nullity, Sir James Hannen stated that he found it to be in accordance with the practice in the Divorce Division to allow interrogatories, a view which was subsequently adopted in the Court of Appeal in Harvey v. Lovekin. The Ecclesiastical Court in like manner had, in former times, and still has, the power of compelling the discovery of documents (see Dunn v. Coates). But it is contrary to the principles of law recognized alike in the common law courts, the Chancery Division, and the ecclesiastical courts, that a wife or husband should be compelled to answer on oath as to matters tending to show adultery, whether in the shape of discovery of documents or of any other fact, and the legislation affecting the Divorce Court has done nothing to disturb, but much to recognize this, to my mind, salutary principle. It is true that the House of Lords, in the case of Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe, adopted the conclusion that a divorce suit is not a criminal or penal proceeding, but their judgment in no way conflicts with the view which I have above expressed. The question as to the liability of infants to orders for discovery of documents in the Divorce Court does not, therefore, arise in the present case, which is to be decided on a still broader ground. Whether in matrimonial causes infants are compellable to make discovery, or to answer interrogatories, as to matters other than adultery, is a question I prefer myself to leave open till the point arises with reference to some specific issue, the character of which may possibly be material to the inquiry which will have then to be pursued. It is, perhaps, questionable whether infants have any special protection in the Divorce Court, but I express no final opinion on the subject. If the opinion at which I have arrived as to the issue of adultery had been in conflict with the practice of the learned judges in the Divorce Court, I should feel much hesitation in disturbing what, upon that hypothesis, would have been the settled course of the court, but there seems no reason to think that interrogatories addressed solely to the issue of adultery have ever, otherwise than per incuriam, been allowed, or that, when the only issue was adultery, the practice of discovery of documents has been deliberately adopted by the judges of that court. So far as any laxity of practice may have crept in, it has, I think, been due to the fact that other issues, besides that of adultery, are often necessarily ventilated in a divorce suit. On the ground above mentioned I think the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

FRY, L.J.—I have had the benefit of reading the judgments delivered by my brethren, and I cannot usefully add anything to what they have said. I agree with them, and for the reasons which they have given—that discovery ought not to be required from the litigants in a divorce suit for the purpose of proving adultery. The appeal must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Trade-mark—Old mark—User of part—Amendment of application — Disclaimer — User in British port—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 69, 71, 72, 74, sub-section (2).

An applicant seeking to register a trade-mark as an "old mark" must prove that the entire mark proposed (with the exception of immaterial differences) was used as a whole before the 13*th of August,* 1875. Proof that some part of such mark was used before that date will not entitle him to register that part as an old mark.

In re Palmer's Trade-Mark, 32 W. R. 306, 24 Ch. D. 504, discussed.

The court has no power judicially to amend an application, but can merely determine whether or not the comptroller shall proceed with such application as it stands.

Orr-Ewing v. The Registrar of Trade-Marks, 28 W. R. 17, 4 App. Cas. 479, explained.

Section 74, sub-section (2), of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, must be strictly construed, so that disclaimer of part of the mark proposed can only be made in the application, and only of devices, words, &c., that are common to the trade.

Semble, user of a distinctive mark on goods lying in the holds of ships which are merely touching at British ports is not sufficient user to acquire a trade-mark here.

Summons.

This was a summons under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, asking that the Comptroller-General might be directed to proceed with the registration of the applicant's mark, notwithstanding the opposition of Messrs. Blankenheijm & Nolet.

The applicants, Louis Meeus & Co., carried on the business of distillers of a spirit known as "Geneva" at Antwerp, and proposed to register as an old mark —i.e., as a trade-mark used before the 13th of August, 1875—a label for bottles consisting of a key ornamented with ears of corn, with the signature "Louis Meeus" written across it, and the word "Antwerp" printed underneath, the whole being enclosed by a circular band, on which was printed "Geneva 'Key' Brand Louis Meeus." A considerable quantity of the applicants' "Geneva" had been imported since 1874 to the United Kingdom, and ordered by merchants and agents here under the name of "Key Brand Geneva," but the greater part of such imported "Geneva" was at once transhipped and re-exported.

The summons was opposed by Messrs. Blankenheijm & Nolet, distillers of Geneva at Rotterdam, in Holland, whose Geneva, for at least twenty years before the application, had been known in the British market as "Key Brand Geneva" or "Key Geneva."

Romer, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the applicants.—Importation to a British port of goods marked with our mark is sufficient user in England, although the goods are never taken out of the hold, or only transhipped and re-exported. We have at least had a concurrent user with the respondents. Section 74 of the Patents Act, 1883, as explained by section 16 of the Patents Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), clearly contemplates a distinction between essential and unessential features, so that In re Palmer's Trade-Mark, 32 W. R. 306, 24 Ch. D. 504, does not affect us. The essential part of our mark is the distinctive device of the key and the corn, and if we have proved our claim to these we are entitled to register with the other unimportant additions: Orr-Ewing v. Registrar of Trade-Marks, 28 W. R. 17, 4 App. Cas. 479. They must prove absolute fraud to prevent us registering: In re Heaton's Trade-Mark, 32 W. R. 951, 27 Ch. D. 570.

Byrne, Q.C., and A. J. Walter, for Blankenheijm & Nolet.—Orr-Ewing's case only decided that the marks therein proposed were legitimate subjects of trade-marks. The decision was simply against the registrar, not the public. See also Perry Davis v. Harbord, 7 Pat. Cas. 336, 15 App. Cas. 316. Again, the "user" must be open to many persons: In re Münch, 50 L. T. N. S. 12, 32 W. R. Dig. 212; McAndrew v. Bassett, 12 W. R. 777, 4 De G. J. & S. 380; In re Hodson's Trade-Mark, 34 W. R. 616; Jackson v. Napper, 35 W. R. 228, 35 Ch. D. 162, 4 Pat. Cas. 45, at p. 56; In re The Australian Wine Importers (Limited), 37 W. R. 578, 41 Ch. D. 278, at p. 283; In re Rivière's Trade-Mark, 32 W. R. 390, 26 Ch. D. 48; Eno v. Dunn, ante, p. 161, 15 App. Cas. 252, at p. 262. The public know our Geneva as "Key Brand Geneva," and in their interests the applicants ought not to register. [CHITTY, J., referred to In re Arbenz's Application, 35 W. R. 527, 35 Ch. D. 248.]

Chadwyck Healey, in reply.—The key is a device, and not within the proviso of the 64th section of the Act of 1883, or the 10th section of the Act of 1875. It is within the "three marks rule" in Jelley's case, 51 L. J. Ch. 639, 30 W. R. Dig. 209. Palmer's case and Leonard v. Ellis, 32 W. R. 530, 26 Ch. D. 288, turned on words, and came within the proviso of the section. Our device, a key, was used before the 13th of August, 1875, and we have added the maker's name and address, and the title "Geneva Key Brand" as the name of the article, and we do not claim exclusive use of these immaterial additions. As to user see In re Wragg's Trade-Mark, 29 Ch. D. 551, 33 W. R. Dig. 218. If necessary, we can disclaim now: Sebastian on Trade-Marks, 3rd ed., p. 384, where all the authorities are reviewed; and our proposed trade-mark can be registered with the disclaimer of all but the key and corn, as In re Burland's Trade-Mark, 38 W. R. 89, 42 Ch. D. 274. The rule against deceiving the public does not apply to a conflict of old marks. All the cases against us are between an old and a new mark, such as the Australian Wine case. As to the cases cited by the other side, Münch's case only decided that the mark was not within the three marks rule; Rivière's case expressly left the point undecided: see 26 Ch. D., at p. 54. It was, I think, an old mark. The "user" observations in Jackson v. Napper are not contained in the authorized reports. Goods are vendible on the market, though never offered for sale or seen by vendor or purchaser. It is all done by a piece of paper in the City. Again, mere discontinuance of user without evidence of distinct intention to abandon does not bar our right: Mouson v. Boehm, 32 W. R. 612, 26 Ch. D. 398.

CHITTY, J., after stating the facts, proceeded:—Now the summons to proceed was taken out under the 29th rule of the Patent Rules of 1883, and is in the proper form—viz., that the comptroller may be directed to proceed with the application of Louis Meeus, notwithstanding the opposition of Blankenheijm & Nolet. The procedure under the 69th section of the Act of 1883 is this: The application is made to the comptroller, he directs advertisements of the marks brought in as old marks, those advertisements give notice to the trade or persons interested that they may come forward and oppose. The opponents deliver a written notice of opposition, stating their grounds, and then there is a reply on the part of the applicant, and, in the language of sub-section 4, the case is thereupon deemed to stand for the determination of the court. In passing, I observe that the 3rd and 4th sub-sections, under which the application was made, have been since repealed by the Act of 1888.

Now what is the case, according to the language of the enactment, which stands for determination? It is the question of the registration of the particular mark brought in, and where it is asserted that it is an old mark, as in the case before me, the application is, as a whole, to register the entire mark as brought in, as an old mark. The court then has to determine whether in the case before it the application has to proceed or not. I need scarcely observe that if another or different mark were brought in it would have to be re-advertised, and other opponents who might not think fit to come forward and oppose the registration of the particular mark which they have seen, might for good reasons come forward and oppose an application to register, say, a part of the whole mark brought in. Conceivably it might be much more injurious to certain traders that a part of the whole thing proposed should be registered than that the whole should be registered.

I come then to consider the question of the user of the proposed mark. [His lordship here reviewed the evidence, and after holding, in the result, that the applicant had failed to prove any user of the mark proposed as a whole in the United Kingdom, or, in fact, elsewhere, before the 13th of August, 1875, proceeded:—] It becomes, then, to my mind, not necessary to consider the evidence of user of part of the mark—viz., the key with or without the ears of corn—which has been adduced on the part of the applicants as having taken place before this statutory date. That evidence consists mainly of two importations into ports in this country merely for the purpose of transhipment to the Havannah, and on the evidence it would seem there were two cases, with a mark possibly of the key outside, in the ship's hold, and that there was only a nominal transhipment—i.e., there was no distinct evidence of any kind to show that the goods were taken out of the ship, but it is quite open on the evidence to conclude that the ship was touching only at the ports named, and that the goods, without the cases being seen, were passed on in the same ship to the Havannah. But it is not necessary to consider this user, which, at the utmost, is user of a part of the mark only, because the question I have to consider is the user of the mark as a whole. If and so far as it should be necessary to consider the evidence of partial user in detail, I state my opinion that the result of it is adverse to the applicants.

Of the many authorities cited at the bar I need only mention two. The first is In re Palmer's Trade-Mark, which has been followed in many subsequent cases. There Palmer proposed for registration three words, "Braided Fixed Stars," and the Court of Appeal having found, as a fact, that these words had not been used separately as a trade-mark before the 13th of August, 1875, held that Palmer could not register that part of the entire mark which he had, in fact, used before the statutory date. That case, therefore, decided that where the mark proposed to be registered was less than the whole mark used before the date in question, registration could not be permitted, and it seems to follow that the applicant who comes forward and alleges that the mark which he proposes for registration has been used before the statutory date has to show that it has been used just as he proposes it should be registered—i.e., the whole combination, except immaterial differences. In the case before me the words "Geneva Key Brand" form a very important and material part of the trade-mark.

The other authority is one that was cited by the applicant's counsel with the view of inducing the court to give a direction to the comptroller to proceed, not with this application, but with some other application—viz., an application to register the key, with the ears of corn—and reliance was placed upon the order of the House of Lords, in which a direction was given to the registrar to proceed with Orr-Ewing's application to register as trade-marks the distinctive devices of animals on the labels with the name and address of Orr-Ewing's firm. The labels contained something more than the devices of animals, but it is important to see how that case came before the House of Lords. As is well known, the business of forming the first Register of Trade-Marks was found to be so serious and so large, as regards textile goods, that a committee of experts was appointed in regard to goods of this class for the purpose of sifting the various trade-marks used in that trade. The committee were appointed under general orders which had a statutory effect, and it was their duty to divide the marks that were brought before them into two classes, one class, the first class, being those which they considered fit and proper to be registered, and the other, the second class, being those that they thought were not proper to be registered, and it was part of the orders, which had, as I say, a statutory effect, that it should not be lawful for the registrar—that was then the title of the officer who had the control of the register—to register any person as proprietor of any cotton mark in the second class of the list except in pursuance of an order of court. An application for such an order was made to Hall, V.C., and he directed the registrar to proceed, but the Court of Appeal were of a different opinion, and held that a committee of experts was a tribunal in the nature of a tribunal of commerce, and that in dealing with their decision the court ought not to interfere unless satisfied they had proceeded upon some wrong principle or in some improper manner. The House of Lords, however, overruled that decision, and looked into the marks of Orr-Ewing themselves, and, after examining them, thought that they had shown a primâ facie case for being allowed to proceed with an application for registration of the distinctive devices that I have already referred to.

The result, therefore, of that decision was simply to remove what was a statutory impediment, or quasi-statutory impediment, or bar, that had been placed against the registrar even entertaining the question of the application. The House of Lords did not decide that Messrs. Orr-Ewing were entitled to register the device, as is explained in the speeches of Lord Cairns and others of the noble lords; they left the question entirely open, so that they merely removed that initial difficulty which stood in Orr-Ewings' way by reason of the decision which the committee of experts had come to. Mr. Orr-Ewing, after he had obtained the order of the House of Lords, had to start before the registrar, and his marks had to be advertised, and any opposition that persons interested thought fit to make could have been brought forward. That case, therefore, is no authority for the proposition on which the applicants' counsel rely. It is difficult exactly to ascertain the nature of the proposition that they put forward, but it seems as if they were asking me now judicially to amend the application that has been made before the comptroller, and which application stands for my decision at present. Obviously the decision of the House of Lords does not affirm that proposition. Here, as I have said, I have to determine in my judgment, aye or no, whether the comptroller is to proceed with this application.

Then an ingenious suggestion was made, I rather think by Mr. Chadwyck Healey, for the first time, in his reply, as to disclaimer, and the suggestion appeared to be in some way or other that Louis Meeus was entitled, here in court, to disclaim some part of the trade-mark proposed for registration. After some little discussion, as I understood the proposition, the proposal was now to disclaim the whole of the trade-mark that has been brought in for registration except the key and the signature. Now on this suggestion or argument reference was made to the 74th section of the Act of 1883, which is to the effect that nothing in the Act is to be construed to prevent the comptroller entering on the register, as an addition to any trade-mark in the case of a mark in force before the 13th of August, 1875, "any distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, ticket, letter, word, or figure, or combination of letters, words, or figures, though the same is common to the trade in the goods with respect to which the application is made." And by the 2nd sub-section of that section "the applicant for entry of any such common particular or particulars must disclaim in his application any right to the exclusive use of the same, and a copy of the disclaimer is to be entered on the register." In passing, again, I merely mention that that sub-section has been repealed by the Act of 1888, and other provisions have been substituted for it. The disclaimer, therefore, according to the section, must be in the application. The words are express. Nothing is said about the disclaimer at the bar in the course of the determination of the matters which I have to determine under the 69th section. And, further, the disclaimer that is required here is a disclaimer of any such common particular or particulars. Such common particular or particulars, means words and so forth which are common to the trade. There is no pretence for saying that the important words "Geneva Key Brand" are common to the trade. That is not the case for the applicant that is presented to the court. There are but two traders in this country who are entitled to use that term—that is, the applicants and the respondents. The evidence which I have briefly referred to at the commencement of this judgment shows that "Geneva Key Brand" or "Key Brand Geneva" is a term which for twenty years and upwards has been the designation in the market by which the respondents' goods have been known. The result is that there is no room for the suggestion that the disclaimer could be made in such a case as this, because it is hardly necessary for me to point out again that I am dealing with these special statutory enactments, and there is no room, therefore, for any disclaimer at the bar. The disclaimer is too late, and the proposed disclaimer is not within the enactment. There is another point upon which the respondents have relied—viz., that to allow this mark to go on the register would be to place on the register, or to allow that there should be placed on the register, a mark calculated to deceive the public. It is not necessary for me to determine that question, because what I have already stated is sufficient, in my judgment, to dispose of the application, but it must not be for a moment assumed that I have arrived at any conclusion adverse to the respondents on that ground. As the case stands, though I am not called upon to decide it judicially, my strong impression is that it would be calculated to deceive, and, as the respondents have alleged, to injure them in the trade which they have established for years in this country. The result is that I think Louis Meeus's application fails, and I must dismiss it with costs.

Summons dismissed.

Petition.

The Agricultural Hotel Co. was incorporated in June, 1863, with a capital of £100,000 divided into 10,000 shares of £10 each. Only 4,326 shares were issued; all these shares were fully paid up.

In April, 1867, a special resolution was passed under a power contained in the articles of association of the company, for the increase of capital by the issue of 500 preference shares of £10 each, bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. (afterwards reduced to 6 per cent.); and in July, 1872, another special resolution was passed for the further increase of capital by the issue of 500 preference shares, called B. preference shares, of the same value and bearing the same rate of interest. The latter resolution provided that the interest on the B. preference shares should be postponed to the interest on the former preference shares (therein called A. preference shares), but should have priority to any dividend on the ordinary shares, and also provided for a preference in respect of capital over the ordinary shares in the event of a dissolution of the company, but subject to a similar preference in respect of capital in favour of the A. preference shares. Of the A. preference shares 415 only were issued, but all the B. preference shares were issued; all these shares were fully paid up.

The company was indebted to the amount of £27,100, which was secured partly by mortgages partly by debentures. The articles of association, as duly varied by resolution, authorized a reduction of capital.

(a.) Reported by JAMES H. BAKEWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In July, 1890, resolutions were duly passed and confirmed that the ordinary share capital of the company should be reduced from £100,000 to £50,000, and that such reduction should take effect by cancelling paid-up capital unrepresented by available assets to the extent of £21,630, being £5 per share in respect of the 4,326 ordinary £10 shares which had been issued and were fully paid up, and by reducing the nominal amount of the remaining 5,674 ordinary shares from £10 to £5 each, being a reduction in the unissued ordinary share capital of £28,370. A petition was presented by the company for the confirmation of these resolutions.

Warmington, Q.C., and Eve, for the company.—It is proposed to reduce the ordinary but not the preference capital. The decisions of the judges of this division as to such a reduction are conflicting.

They referred to In re Union Plate Glass Co., 37 W. R. 792, 42 Ch. D. 513; In re Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co., 37 W. R. 249, 39 Ch. D. 582; In re Quebrada Railway, Land, and Copper Co., 40 Ch. KEKEWICH, J.—If the opinion of Kay, J., stood alone it would have been my duty at once to follow it and to say, as he said, that the question must be decided by the Court of Appeal. But a decision of North, J., has been cited to me, not only expressly differing from the opinion of Kay, J., but so differing with reference to former decisions of the same judge, and after he had considered the case of In re Union Plate Glass Co. Then there is the later case, before North, J., of In re American Pastoral Co. I think that, under the circumstances, I am bound to exercise my own judgment in the matter, and my opinion is in favour of the view taken by North, J., and not of that taken by Kay, J.

I do not express any opinion whether the company can reduce any part of one class of capital. Here the application is to reduce the whole of the ordinary capital, leaving intact the preference capital, and the preference capital and the ordinary capital seem to stand in different classes, quite apart from the distinction to which Mr. Warmington has called my attention between the preference capital in this case and the preference capital in the case of In re Union Plate Glass Co. All I say is that if the company desires to reduce, and has by proper resolution purported to reduce, the whole of its ordinary capital, that may be done and may be sanctioned by the court, notwithstanding that there is, outside and above that, preference capital. I think it better to say so in plain terms rather than to endeavour to find distinctions, which may or may not be tenable, between the case before Kay, J., and the cases before North, J.

Order as prayed.

Trustee—Breach of trust—Following assets—Statute of Limitations—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8 (1) a, b, (3)—Parties—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 4.

An action for breach of trust was brought by a newly-appointed trustee against the survivor of the former trustees and the representatives of two deceased former trustees, to make them replace trust money, lost through investments made (more than six years before the action) without proper valuations and on insufficient securities. The executor of G., one of the deceased trustees, had, after duly issuing the statutory advertisements, administered his testator's estate, and then retained the balance as trustee of certain trust legacies, which it was insufficient to pay in full. The court gave leave at the trial to amend the statement of claim so as to make the action one against G.'s executor as a trustee, and not merely as an executor, and so that the amount retained for the legacies might be followed in his hands; but such amendment was allowed only upon the terms that the action was to be treated as commenced on the day of the trial, and that the defence was to be treated as amended so as to allow G.'s executor to claim the benefit of any statutes of limitation.

Held, that the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8, sub-section (1) (b), did apply to the case, though sub-section (1) (a) did not.

Held, also, that, in view of R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 8, the beneficiaries entitled to the legacies were not necessary parties to an action to follow the legacies in the hands of a trustee.

Trial of action.

William Bowden by his will devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to convert the same, and to hold the proceeds in trust for such of his eight children in his said will named as should survive him and attain twenty-one in equal shares, the shares of daughters (of whom there were six) being settled.

The testator died in 1864, leaving all the eight children surviving him, and they all attained twenty-one. In 1869 three new trustees of the will were appointed by the court. They were Baxter, Daniel Greatorex, and the defendant Cooper; and in the year 1874 they advanced a sum of £4,000, part of the trust estate, upon a mortgage of real estate (land and buildings) situate at Birkenhead, and in the same year they advanced another sum belonging to the trust estate to another person upon the security of another mortgage. Part of the latter sum had been paid off, but at the time of the action £2,600 still remained due on this security.

About the end of 1878 the two surviving trustees (Baxter having died in 1876) made a further advance on the first-mentioned security, additional buildings having been erected. In 1882 Andrew (the plaintiff) was appointed trustee in Baxter's place.

At the commencement of the following year D. Greatorex died, having by his will left his real and residuary personal estate to Richard Greatorex and Worthington (the latter of whom disclaimed) upon trust to appropriate two legacies of £6,000 and £5,000, and to hold the same upon trusts mentioned in the will. The testator also named four executors, of whom only the defendant, R. Greatorex, proved and acted. After administering the estate, there remained to meet the two legacies a sum of £8,000 only, which he invested upon mortgage in his own name.

The securities upon which part of Bowden's estate had been invested having proved insufficient, this action was commenced in 1889 against Cooper, Baxter's executors, and R. Greatorex as executor of D. Greatorex. The plaintiff alleged that the advances on mortgage had been made on insufficient security and with no proper valuation, and he claimed that Cooper was personally liable, that Baxter's executors were liable to the extent of their testator's assets, and that R. Greatorex was liable as executor of D. Greatorex to make good out of his testator's estate the sums of £4,000 and £2,600, with interest, and that the defendants generally might be ordered to replace those sums. He further claimed that Cooper was liable personally, and R. Greatorex out of his testator's estate, to make good the further advance, with interest, and that, if necessary, the estates of Baxter and D. Greatorex might be administered by the court.

R. Greatorex's defence was to the effect that he had duly advertised for creditors of his testator's estate, and had not administered the estate till the time for creditors to come in had expired, and that the £8,000 was, therefore, not in his hands as executor.

The action was tried before Fry, L.J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division. It was clear upon the evidence that no proper valuations had been made, and it followed (the securities having proved insufficient) that the trustees who advanced the money were liable to make good the losses sustained in consequence.

Section 8, sub-section (3), of the Trustee Act, 1888, provides that section 8 shall apply only to actions or other proceedings commenced after the 1st of January, 1890.

Warmington, Q.C., and Methold, for the plaintiff.—We are entitled to judgment in the terms of the claim.

Neville, Q.C., and T. L. Higgins, for Baxter's executors.—The court will not under the circumstances make an immediate order to replace the whole amounts, but will order the securities to be realized, and the deficiencies, then ascertained, to be replaced.

Clare, for the executors of Cooper (who had died since the action was commenced).

S. Hall, Q.C., and E. S. Ford, for R. Greatorex.—As the action is constituted, the assets cannot be followed in the hands of R. Greatorex, who is sued as executor only, and not as trustee; for his liability in the capacity of executor was at an end after the issue of the statutory advertisements and the expiration of the time for creditors to come in: Clegg v. Rowland, 15 W. R. 251, L. R. 3 Eq. 368. But if the action, as constituted, can be treated as an action to follow the assets, the cestuis que trust ought to have been made parties: Clegg v. Rowland. [FRY, L.J., held that if on the pleadings R. Greatorex was sued as trustee, on the principle of following the assets, then by R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 8, cestuis que trust were not necessary parties, and he accordingly dissented from the dicta of Malins, V.C., in Clegg v. Rowland, but he thought it not clear that the statement of claim did ask such relief against R. Greatorex as trustee, and therefore held that the plaintiff should be put to his election whether he would proceed on the present pleadings, or amend his claim on the terms that the action should be treated as commenced on that day, and that the defence of R. Greatorex should be taken as amended in such a way as to enable him to claim the benefit of every statute of limitations on which he could rely. The plaintiff elected to amend on those terms, and the case accordingly proceeded on that footing.] As this action is now to be treated as commenced to-day, section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, applies: see sub-section (3) of that section. The action is therefore barred by the Statute of Limitations, because by section 8 (1) (a) of the Trustee Act, 1888, trustees are no longer excluded from the benefit of the former statute except in cases of fraud.

Methold, in reply.—The section referred to of the Trustee Act, 1888, cannot apply, because an action like the present, for breach of trust, could not be brought against anyone who was not a trustee.

FRY, L.J.—It is not seriously contended in this case that these investments were not breaches of trust, it being clear on the evidence that the securities were insufficient, and that no proper valuations were made. What I propose to do is to order the securities to be realized and the deficiency ascertained, and to direct an inquiry how such deficiency is to be made up out of the different estates liable. I will take time to consider the point as to the liability of R. Greatorex.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 8.—FRY, L.J.—This action for breach of trust has been brought by a newly appointed trustee against an old trustee, and the representatives of two deceased trustees. The estate of Daniel Greatorex, one of those deceased trustees, was administered some years ago, after the usual statutory advertisements had been issued. His executor accordingly raised the objection that if the plaintiff sought to follow the funds, which remained in his hands, not as executor, but as a trustee of trust legacies, the persons beneficially interested in those legacies were necessary parties to the action. I decided adversely to that contention, but the further question arose whether upon the pleadings this could be treated as an action to follow assets, or was merely an action against Greatorex's executor in his character as such. There was a difficulty on the pleadings as they stood, because, according to the statement of claim, the sum of £8,000, which was all that was available to pay the legacies, had been appropriated to them, and had been invested on a mortgage in the name of Richard Greatorex, the executor, and was "now held by him as executor and trustee of the will of Daniel Greatorex," and was "applicable to answer the claim raised in this action." Some embarrassment obviously arises from the statement that the money is held by him in those two characters. The claim then proceeds to ask for a declaration that Richard Greatorex is liable as executor of D. Greatorex, out of his estate, to make good the breaches of trust, and (consequentially) that so far as necessary the real and personal estate of D. Greatorex may be administered under the direction of the court. Moreover, the writ, which has never been amended, claimed against R. Greatorex as executor. The plaintiff, however, having elected to amend his statement of claim so as to make this an action for following assets, upon the terms which I consider fair, the question arose whether under the circumstances, the Trustee Act of 1888 afforded R. Greatorex a good defence to the action. The last of the breaches of trust took place more than six years before the commencement of the action.

Section 8 provides that "in any action or other proceeding against a trustee or any person claiming through him, except where the claim is founded upon any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust to which the trustee was party or privy, or is to recover trust property, or the proceeds thereof still retained by the trustee, or previously received by the trustee and converted to his use, the following provisions shall apply." It is plain to my mind that none of those exceptions apply to the present case, so as to take it out of the section. Then sub-section (1) (a), which contains the first of the "following provisions" referred to in the paragraph I have read, is as follows: "All rights and privileges conferred by any statute of limitations shall be enjoyed in the like manner and to the like extent as they would have been enjoyed in such action or other proceeding if the trustee or person claiming through him had not been a trustee or person claiming through him."

The defendant, R. Greatorex, relied on that provision, but I do not think it can apply to the case, because it is obvious in the first place that a person could not be sued for breach of trust if he had not been a trustee; and, secondly, so far as I am aware, no statute of limitations confers any right or privilege in respect of a breach of trust. But it appears to me that the next following provision, contained in sub-section (1) (b), to which my attention was not called, does apply to the case. It is this: "If the action or other proceeding is brought to recover money or other property, and is one to which no existing statute of limitations applies" (both those conditions are fulfilled by the present action), "the trustee or person claiming through him shall be entitled to the benefit of and be at liberty to plead the lapse of time as a bar to such action or other proceeding in the like manner and to the like extent as if the claim had been against him in an action of debt for money had and received."

That appears to me to afford this defendant a good defence. For, if this had been an action for debt for money had and received, and such debt had arisen more than six years ago, and there had been no acknowledgment of it in the meantime, the lapse of time would have afforded a good defence. The clause goes on (omitting a part that is immaterial here) "but so, nevertheless, that the statute . . . shall not begin to run against any beneficiary, unless and until the interest of such beneficiary shall be an interest in possession." That restriction does not apply to the present case, because this action is brought, not by a beneficiary, but by one trustee against another. It appears to me, therefore, that a good defence is afforded by the section, and it follows that the action, as against Richard Greatorex, must be dismissed with costs.

Upon consideration, it seems to me that the inquiry I proposed yesterday might raise troublesome questions of law, and that the better course will be to order a sale, and direct the chief clerk to certify the amount remaining due in respect of the breaches of trust, and to reserve further consideration.

Action dismissed as against the defendant R. Greatorex. Judgment for plaintiff as against the other defendants.

GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE IPSWICH UNION (Appellants) v. GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE MACCLESFIELD UNION (Respondents). (a.)

Poor law—Lunatic—County asylum—Private patient becoming pauper — Chargeability—Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97), ss. 95, 96.

A lunatic was sent by her relations from a parish in the Ipswich Union to the asylum at Macclesfield as a private patient. Subsequently they gave notice to the asylum that they would cease paying for her maintenance as a private patient. The clerk to the asylum thereupon gave notice to the guardians of the Macclesfield Union that the lunatic had been transferred to the list of pauper patients chargeable to their union. The guardians accordingly paid a sum for her maintenance.

Held, that none of the provisions of the Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853, *applied to the circumstances of the case; that the lunatic was not chargeable to the Macclesfield Union; that the payment by that union was made under a mistake; and consequently that an order upon the Ipswich Union to repay the sum was bad.

Case stated by the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Chester upon an appeal against an order of justices directing the Ipswich Union to pay to the Macclesfield Union a sum of £21 7s. paid by the latter union to the treasurer of the county lunatic asylum at Macclesfield for the maintenance and care of Margaret Jane Robinson, a lunatic, and also to pay to the said treasurer the reasonable charges of the future maintenance and care of the said lunatic as long as she should remain in the said asylum.

The court of quarter sessions affirmed the order subject to the following case:—

1. Margaret Jane Robinson, the pauper, is the daughter of Henry Robinson, now residing at Shrewsbury.

2. The said Margaret Jane Robinson was born at Ipswich on the 4th day of June, 1854. Her father subsequently took a house in the parish of Stratford, in the West Ham Union, in the county of Essex, and resided there for some years.

3. The said Henry Robinson, in or about 1874, went to reside at Hadley, in the Cosford Union, in the county of Suffolk, and continued to live there up to January, 1885. In 1884 the pauper, who had been away from home in different situations, returned to her father's house, and remained there until she went to Ipswich, as hereinafter stated. She was described as "rather affected in the head" during the time she was at Hadley, and unable to do any work beyond light domestic duties, but she frequently walked out by herself, and she was consulted about going to Ipswich, and described as quite able to judge for herself about removing there, as in the next paragraph stated.

5. In January, 1885, the said Henry Robinson went to live at 43, Alpe-street, in the parish of St. Matthew, in the Ipswich Union, and the pauper accompanied him. She continued to reside with him there until March, 1886, but during the latter part of the time became "worse in her mind."

6. In March, 1886, the said pauper was conveyed as private patient to Parkside Lunatic Asylum, at Macclesfield aforesaid. She was so conveyed there by a female attendant who had been sent from the asylum to Ipswich for the purpose, and she has been confined as a lunatic patient therein until the present time under an order signed by her said father, who, in April of the same year, removed from Ipswich to Shrewsbury.

7. On the 22nd of October, 1888, the clerk of the said county asylum wrote to the clerk to the guardians of the Macclesfield Union informing him that the relatives of the said pauper had given notice that they would cease paying for her maintenance as a private patient from the 30th of September then last, and that she had been transferred to the list of pauper patients chargeable to the Macclesfield Union as from the 1st of October then last. No order of a justice or justices was made directing the said Margaret J. Robinson to be received into the said asylum as a pauper lunatic, and no steps other than the writing of the said letter by the clerk of the asylum were taken with a view to the admission of the said Margaret Jane Robinson in the said asylum as a pauper lunatic.

8. The guardians of the Macclesfield Union accordingly paid for the maintenance of the said pauper as a lunatic primarily chargeable to the Macclesfield Union from the 1st of October, 1888.

9. It is admitted that the said pauper is not settled in any parish in the Ipswich Union.

10. On the 19th of November, 1889, the said guardians of the Macclesfield Union applied for and obtained the order of adjudication and maintenance hereinbefore referred to upon the Ipswich Union in respect of the said pauper.

If the court should be of opinion that the order of adjudication and maintenance was bad, that order, and the order of sessions confirming the same, were to be quashed, otherwise the said orders were to be confirmed.

The arguments and the statutory provisions bearing upon the case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 12.—HAWKINS, J., delivered the judgment of the COURT:—This case raises the question whether an order made by two justices of the peace for the county of Chester directing that the appellants should pay to the respondents the amount paid by the latter for the maintenance of a certain pauper lunatic, was a valid order or not. [His lordship stated the facts shortly, and proceeded:—] The question, therefore, arises whether she was properly placed on the list of pauper patients chargeable to the Macclesfield Union. There never was any order made by a justice for her admission into the asylum as a pauper lunatic. It is admitted that she never was settled in any parish in the Ipswich Union, and also that she had acquired a status of irremovability in that union. On behalf of the appellants it is contended that the pauper lunatic never was chargeable to the Macclesfield Union, and that the respondents cannot, therefore, recover from them the amount they have paid for her maintenance. We are of opinion that this contention must prevail.

In order to see in what asylum, and at whose expense, a pauper lunatic may be confined, it is necessary to consider various sections of the Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97), an act which was passed to consolidate and amend the laws for the provision and regulation of lunatic asylums for counties and boroughs and for the maintenance and care of pauper lunatics in England. By section 43 of that Act it is provided that if an asylum is more than sufficient to accommodate all the pauper lunatics of the county or borough to which the same belongs, the pauper lunatics of other counties or boroughs may be admitted upon certain terms as to payment. Then section 67 contains provisions for sending pauper lunatics to asylums. The medical officer of health is to inform the relieving officer of the presence of any pauper resident in the parish who is or is deemed to be a lunatic, and the relieving officer is to inform a justice of the fact, and he is to order the pauper to be brought before him; then the justice, with the assistance of a medical man, is to decide whether the pauper is a lunatic, and, if he finds that the pauper is, to order his removal by the relieving officer to an asylum. Section 68 provides that every lunatic wandering at large or not being properly taken care of shall be apprehended and taken before a justice, and by him sent to an asylum. Then section 72 enacts that every order of a justice for the reception of a lunatic into an asylum may authorize his admission, not only into the asylum of the county or borough in which the place from which the lunatic is sent is situated, but also into the asylum of another county or borough, but every lunatic shall be sent to an asylum of the county or borough in which the place from which he is sent is situated, unless there be some special circumstances, by reason whereof he cannot conveniently be taken there. The next section (section 73) provides that no pauper shall be received into any asylum without an order under the hands of one justice, or under the hands of an officiating clergyman, or one of the overseers, or the relieving officer of the parish. Then there are several sections dealing with the maintenance of lunatics, and they begin with section 94, which only applies where it appears to the justices that the lunatic has property which is applicable to his maintenance. Then section 95, upon which the argument before us was founded, provides that when any pauper lunatic is confined under the provisions of this Act he shall, for the purposes of this Act, be chargeable to the parish from which, or at the instance of some officer or officiating clergyman of which, he has been sent, unless and until such parish shall have established, under the provisions herein contained, that such lunatic is settled in some other parish, or that it cannot be ascertained in what parish such lunatic is settled.

Although the lunatic in the present case became a pauper, having no property applicable for her maintenance, her friends having refused to provide for her, she was not confined in the asylum under the provisions of this Act, and, therefore, section 95 does not apply to her case. Then section 96 enacts that it shall be lawful for the justice by whom any pauper lunatic is sent to an asylum to make an order upon the guardians of the union or parish, or the overseers of the parish, for payment to the treasurer of the asylum of the reasonable charges for the lodgings and maintenance of such lunatic in such asylum. Then comes section 97, which may be shortly stated as authorizing justices to inquire into and adjudge the settlement of a lunatic and order the payment of her maintenance by the guardians of the union to which the parish in which such lunatic is adjudged to be settled belongs; and section 98 provides that if the settlement of the lunatic cannot be ascertained, a pauper lunatic may be made chargeable to the county in which he was found. In the present case it cannot be suggested that this pauper lunatic was found in the county, or that she comes within the provision for arresting lunatics found at large. The last section I will refer to is section 102, which says that the costs of pauper luuatics who are irremovable are to be borne by the parish wherein they were exempt from removal.

Now there can be no doubt that if it could be made out that this pauper lunatic was sent to the lunatic asylum at Macclesfield, under the provisions of this Act, the cost of her maintenance could be recovered from the appellants, but there was no order of justices under this Act authorizing her to be sent to this asylum, for she was sent there, in the first instance, by her relatives. Then, when they ceased to pay for her, no order was obtained from a justice making it incumbent on the asylum to receive and maintain her.

There is certainly nothing in the Act itself which makes her chargeable to the respondents, and if an order had been made, she would have been chargeable to the appellants, not to the respondents. It was a mistake upon the part of the authorities of the asylum to say that she was chargeable to the respondents. The respondents, therefore, should not have paid the amount they did to the asylum, and as they were not liable, they cannot recover the amount from the appellants. So far as I can see, there is no provision in the Act providing for the very singular circumstances which have arisen in the present case. We are not called upon to decide whether the asylum authorities could have obtained an order making the appellants pay direct to them, but this order, having been made under an Act which does not authorize it to be made, is bad and fails. There is a provision contained in 25 & 26 Vict. c. 111, s. 26, which authorizes the detention of a person who has been a private patient, and subsequently becomes a pauper lunatic; but so far as I can ascertain, there is no provision for his maintenance. The case is not affected by the Lunacy Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 41). In all these circumstances, the order must be quashed simply upon the ground that there was no liability upon the part of the respondents for the maintenance of this pauper lunatic.

Appeal allowed.

SUTTON v. WADE.
GALE v. OVEREND.
MOORE v. ATKINSON. (a.)

Election law — Parliament — Registration — Notice of objection to overseers—Signature of objector—List of names after signature — Authentication — Form I., No. 1, in schedule to Registration Order, 1889—Registration Act, 1885 (48 Vict. c. 15), s. 18.

A notice of objection given to overseers was as follows:—"I hereby give you notice that I object to the names of the persons mentioned and described below being retained on the list as parliamentary electors for the parliamentary city of N." (signed by the objector). After the signature of the objector came a list of the names of the persons objected to. An objection was taken that this notice was a departure from the form, and was bad, on the ground that the signature of the objector ought to have been after the list of names.

Held, that the notice of objection did not substantially depart from the form in the schedule to the Registration Order, 1889, and was good.

In Sutton v. Wade, which was an appeal from the revising barrister for the city of Norwich, the question was as to the validity of the notice of objection given to the overseers.

It was proved that the respondent, the objector, had duly signed and served on the appellant, the person objected to, a personal notice of objection to his name being retained on the list of parliamentary electors, and there was no question as to this notice.

The notice to the overseers was in the following form:—

"I hereby give you notice that I object to the names of the persons mentioned and described below being retained on the List No. 1, Division No. 1, as parliamentary electors for the parliamentary city and county of the city of Norwich, and as citizens for the municipal city and county of the same city.

"Dated this 18th day of August, 1890.

"(Signed) WILLIAM ARTHUR WADE."

Then followed a list of the persons objected to, with their addresses.

The whole of the notice was written and printed on the same side of a sheet of paper. The name of William Arthur Wade was the signature of the respondent, and the notice was not otherwise signed by him. The name of the appellant, Henry Sutton, appeared in this list, together with the names of the other persons objected to.

It was contended before the revising barrister on behalf of the appellant that the above notice to the overseers was not a good notice of objection, on the ground that the name of the appellant did not appear in the body of the said notice, and that as the signature of the respondent (the objector) preceded the names of the appellant and of the other persons objected to, the notice was not signed at the foot thereof, as required.

The revising barrister decided that the notice was a good notice of objection to the name of the appellent, on the ground that the name of the appellant was sufficiently incorporated by reference in the body of the said notice, which was duly signed at its foot in accordance with (Form I.), No. 1, prescribed by the Registration Order, 1889, schedule 3, and having regard to the proviso in section 18 of the Registration Act, 1885; and as it was proved that the appellant was not qualified to be on the list of electors, he allowed the objection, and expunged the name of the appellant from the list.

The appellant appealed, and the revising barrister stated this case.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the notice to the overseers was a good notice of objection to the name of the appellant.

R. S. Wright, for the appellant.—The form is Form I., No. 1, in the Schedule 3 of the Registration Order, 1889, and in that form the place of signature of the objector is at the foot or end of the notice, and after the name of the person objected to. The signature of the objector ought to be at the bottom of the notice: Toms v. Cuming, 7 M. & G. 88. The signature of the objector is for the purpose of authentication, and there can be no authentication where the names come after the signature, as names might be added improperly. The question here is as to what is the effect to be given to the proviso at the end of the 18th section of the Registration Act, 1885, that a disregard of any form shall not of itself invalidate any list or notice. This does not apply to an entire departure from the form such as the present: Humphrey v. Earle, 36 W. R. 510, 20 Q. B. D. 294; Wood v. Chandler, 36 W. R. 522, 20 Q. B. D. 297. The principle of those cases applies here. The case of Smith v. Holloway, 14 W. R. 202, L. R. 1 C. P. 145, is different from the present.

Mattinson, for the respondent.—The first statute dealing with the subject is 6 Vict. c. 18, and that statute provides, in section 17, for the giving of two notices, a notice to the voter and a notice to the overseers. That statute makes no provision for the place of signature of the objector. As an illustration that the signature need not be at the bottom, there is the Statute of Frauds, where the signature need not be at the end. In this statute of 6 Vict. c. 18 there is no provision as to the place of the signature of the objector. Smith v. Holloway is in the respondent's favour on that point. [He was stopped.]

In Gale v. Overend, which was an appeal from the revising barrister for the borough of Leeds, the same question arose as to the validity of the notice, the revising barrister holding that the notice was bad.

Asquith, Q.C., for the appellant.

Macaskie, for the respondent.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

In Moore v. Atkinson, which was an appeal from the revising barrister for the borough of Whitehaven, the signature of the objector was at the end of the list of names, and the notice was held to be bad on the ground that the form made no provision for a list of names, and that there must be a separate notice of objection to the overseers in the case of each person objected to.

Mattinson, for the appellant.

H. D. Warr, for the respondent.

GRANTHAM, J.—We are of opinion that in each of these cases the notices sent to the overseers was a sufficient compliance with the form in the schedule, and that consequently the notices were good notices of objection. Our judgment, therefore, is that in the first case—Sutton v. Wade—we hold that the revising barrister was correct, and in the other two cases—Gale v. Overend and Moore v. Atkinson—we hold that the decision of the revising barrister must be reversed. The chief thing we have to bear in mind about these notices of objection is this, that notice has to be given to the person objected to, and unless it can be shown that this has been done the objection will be bad. But the statute further requires that the overseer should have notice of all persons objected to, as the overseer prepares the list, and he requires to know what the objections are. Referring to Trotter v. Walker, 13 C. B. N. S., at p. 38, Erle, C.J., says, "If the sole object of the statute was merely to authenticate the document, the signature was undoubtedly sufficient," and he holds that that is the object of the statute—namely, to authenticate the document. All that has to be done is to authenticate the document which gives a list of the persons objected to. In that case of Trotter v. Walker, a stamp, in which the name was almost illegible, was held to be sufficient. Much less particularity is required when the name itself is written, so long as it is clearly written to indicate the name and the address of the person objected to by the person who signs the objections. No doubt the statute must be fairly complied with, but not only is there a power, under the 18th section of the Act of 1885, to disregard technical objections, but there is a positive enactment that a disregard of any form or instruction shall not of itself invalidate any list or notice. Even apart from that section I see nothing in any of these forms which creates any doubt or difficulty in finding out who had been properly objected to. No doubt the form was prepared as though for an objection to one name only, but it has been sanctioned by authority that there could be no objection to the names of all the persons objected to appearing on one list. The object of the Legislature seems to have been arrived at by a correct list being given to the overseer of the persons upon whom individual notices of objection had been served. It seems, therefore, that we are bound to give effect to these notices, and that if we did not we should be disobeying the terms of the 18th section of the Act of 1885.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The objection here is that these notices are not in the form provided in the schedule to the Registration Order, 1889. If the departure from the form is a departure in point of form only, but not in substance, then by section 18 of the Act of 1885 we ought not to give effect to the departure. The real question here is whether this is a substantial departure from the form, a departure so as to make the notice given substantially different from that given in the form. If the departure be such as to raise any question which could not be raised if the form had been followed, then it is a substantial departure, otherwise it is not a substantial departure. Here in substance the objection taken is that the notice of objection to the overseers has not been properly authenticated. If I thought that the notice was not properly authenticated, I should hold that a departure in substance, and not merely in form, and that the notice was bad. When we come to look at the notices themselves, it seems to me that there can be no further question as to the authentication than if the signature of the objector had followed the names. I hold, therefore, that these notices have been properly authenticated, and that they are good notices of objection.

Trustee—Investment—Power to vary existing investments —Trust Investment Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 32), ss. 3, 6.

In the absence of any express prohibition in the instrument creating the trust, the power to vary investments given by section 3 of the Trust Investment Act, 1889, applies as well to investments—of the classes specified in sub-sections (a) to (o) of that section—existing prior to, or not made under, the Act of 1889, as to investments made under the powers given by that Act.

In re Manchester Royal Infirmary, 38 W. R. 460, 43 Ch. D. 420, disapproved on this point.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

Mr. Quintin Dick, by his will dated August 30, 1844, gave all his real and personal estate to his executors and trustees therein named, upon trust to convert into money such part of the same as should not consist of money or securities for money or Government securities, and to invest the same in the public stocks or funds of Great Britain, and to stand possessed of the same and all other his residuary estate upon trust to lay out the same or any part thereof in the purchase of freehold lands of inheritance in Ireland to be vested in the trustees upon the trusts and to and for the uses, &c., therein mentioned.

The testator died on March 26, 1858. The present trustees of the will were Lord Justice Lopes and Sir Gustavus Hume. Part of the testator's residuary estate had been laid out in the purchase of lands in Ireland, but part of it still remained invested in Government stocks in the names of the trustees. The trustees had been requested by the present tenant for life of the residuary estate to sell so much of the said Government stocks as would be sufficient to raise a sum of £106,900 cash, and to invest this sum upon mortgage of certain freehold estates in the county of Wilts.

The will contained no power to vary investments, and although it did not authorize an investment of the trust funds in a mortgage of real estate, it did not expressly prohibit such an investment.

An originating summons was accordingly taken out by the trustees to determine the question whether they had power under the Trust Investment Act, 1889, to make the proposed investment.

Stirling, J., sitting in chambers, held, on the authority of In re Manchester Royal Infirmary, 38 W. R. 460, 43 Ch. D. 420 (a decision of North, J.), that the trustees, having no power under the will to vary investments, were not authorized by the Trust Investment Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 32), to sell out existing investments for the purpose of investing the proceeds in the manner sanctioned by the Act.

The material sections of the Trust Investment Act, 1889, are as follows:—Section 3, which enacts: "It shall be lawful for a trustee, unless expressly forbidden by the instrument (if any) creating the trust, to invest any trust funds in his hands in the manner following—that is to say (a) In any of the parliamentary stocks or public funds or Government securities of the United Kingdom; (b) On real or heritable securities in Great Britain or Ireland;" and the section contains a series of other sub-sections running down to (o) enumerating various other classes of investments, and then concludes as follows: "And also from time to time to vary any such investment."

Section 6 enacts:—"This Act shall apply as well to trusts created before as to trusts created after the passing of this Act, and the powers hereby conferred shall be in addition to the powers conferred by the instrument (if any) creating the trust."

From this decision the tenant for life appealed.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., and Farwell, for the appellant.—The words "any trust funds in his hands," contained in section 3, although no doubt they apply to and include money or cash in the hands of a trustee, do not necessarily mean only money or cash in the hands of the trustee, but include also existing investments standing in his name. The words "in his hands" cannot be construed literally, as a trustee never keeps trust moneys actually in his own hands, but would pay them into a bank. [KAY, L.J.—But the words may mean money awaiting investment in the hands of the trustee.] No doubt they include that, but they are not confined to that. The words at the end of section 3, "and also . . . to vary any such investment," clearly show that the section applies to existing investments of a like nature to those previously specified. Section 6 expressly says that the Act is retrospective, and that the powers conferred thereby are to be in addition to the powers conferred by the trust instrument. The whole object and scope of the Act is to enlarge trustees' power of investment; it is an enabling Act, and if there be any ambiguity in the words of section 3, a wide construction ought to be put on them. In re Warde, 2 J. & H. 191, 10 W. R. Ch. Dig. 50, was a decision on Lord St. Leonards' Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35), s. 32, but in that Act there was no power at all given to vary investments, and therefore that case is no authority on the present Act. In In re Clergy Orphan Corporation, 22 W. R. 789, L. R. 18 Eq. 280, which turned on section 11 of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, Malins, V.C., held that the trustees of a charity might sell out trust funds then invested in Consols for the purpose of reinvestment in other securities authorized by the general order of February 1, 1861, with regard to cash under the control of the court. The view taken of the Act of 1889 by North, J., in In re Manchester Royal Infirmary was not necessary for the decision in that case. [KAY, L.J.—Suppose the trust instrument gives power to invest in investments, some of which are authorized by section 3 of the Act of 1889, and some of which are not so authorized. Do you say that the effect of the Act is to give power to vary the former, but not the latter?] Yes; the proper mode of construction is to read into the investment clause contained in the trust instrument the words of section 3 of the Act.

They referred also to Waite v. Littlewood, 41 L. J. Ch. 636, and In re Cooper's Trusts, W. N., 1873, p. 87.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and E. Beaumont, for the remaindermen, the respondents.—The words, "and also to vary any such investment," only apply to investments made under the powers given by the Act of 1889, and not to investments already existing when the Act came into operation, and which were, therefore, not made under the powers given by the Act. Section 3 only gives a trustee power to invest "any trust funds in his hands," and those words only cover "money in the hands of a trustee awaiting investment," and do not apply to existing investments. The same words, "any trust funds in his hands," occur in Lord St. Leonards' Act, 1859, and it was held in In re Warde that they only covered money awaiting investment in the hands of a trustee, and did not apply to funds already invested. That decision was well known when the Act of 1889 was passed; and as section 3 of that Act uses the very same words as Lord St. Leonards' Act, it is clear that the words, "and also to vary any such investment," were not intended to apply to existing investments, but only to investments made under the authority of the Act of 1889. That Act, therefore, does not touch the present case.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., was not called on to reply.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised on this appeal is one of very great importance to all trustees who have moneys to invest, or who have money invested. Now the facts with which we have to deal are these. Under a will made in 1844, certain trustees have considerable sums of money invested in Government securities—properly invested under the trusts of the will. They have power under the will to sell out those investments, and invest the money in land; but at present they have got the money invested in their names in Government securities, and they had no power under the will to vary the securities which they were empowered to invest their trust moneys upon.

Now, in that state of things, in 1888 the Government reduced the interest or dividend payable upon Government securities. The effect of that was, of course, very great indeed, and in consequence of that reduction it was seen that it was necessary, or, if not necessary, that it was, at least, desirable to extend the powers which were formerly enjoyed by trustees as regards the investment of trust moneys. That being the general object of this Act of Parliament, we have now to construe it and to apply it to the present state of things. [The Lord Justice read section 6 of the Trust Investment Act, 1889, and continued:—] That is a section which is in some respects remarkable, because it says in plain language that the Act shall apply to trustees who hold moneys under trusts created before the passing of the Act; and the whole object is to redress the inconvenience and, perhaps, injustice which would be the inevitable result of the reduction of the interest payable upon Government securities if there were no such Act as this. Then, having made the Act perfectly retrospective, as I understand it, section 3 says this:—"It shall be lawful for a trustee, unless expressly forbidden by the instrument (if any) creating the trust, to invest the trust funds in his hands in manner following, that is to say."

Now the expression, "trust funds in his hands," probably does apply to trust funds requiring investment. I think probably that is so. They may invest such moneys in a great variety of investments, which are specified in sub-sections beginning with (a) and running down to (o); and then the section says this, "And also from time to time to vary any such investment." Now this last expression, "and also from time to time to vary any such investment," appears to me to be of the utmost importance. There were no such words in Lord St. Leonards' Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 32), the Act on which In re Warde was decided; and without saying whether In re Warde was right or wrong, which is a matter which concerns nobody, it seems to me that In re Warde is no authority on the construction of the present Act at all. It is said the words are capable of being read in this sense, that the power to vary shall only apply to cases in which money has been invested under this Act of Parliament. That is one construction which is possible; but the other construction, which I confess I prefer myself, is this, that it is a power to vary any of the investments enumerated in section 3, sub-sections (a) to (o), whether made under the Act or not. The second construction appears to me to be that which is most in accordance with the objects which the Legislature had in view in passing that Act. There is no authority against that construction, except the intimation of opinion, which there clearly was, on the part of North, J., in In re Manchester Royal Infirmary. I cannot confirm that view. I think that the view adopted by the learned judge is too narrow, and would be most unfortunate for all trustees and their cestui que trusts. I am of opinion that a wider view ought to prevail, and consequently that this appeal ought to be allowed.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We must approach the consideration of this statute with the knowledge that from the year 1859 down to 1889—that is, a period of thirty years—various attempts have been made by the Legislature to enlarge the powers of trustees with regard to their investments. The decreasing of the difficulty of making investments of a kind which would be sought for by trustees was, no doubt, the object and motive of that legislation. We must, therefore, look upon this as an enabling statute; and, as already has been pointed out, it is expressly retrospective, and is therefore an enabling statute, not only in respect to investments and instruments made and executed after the passing of the Act, but also with regard to those made before the passing of the Act.

Now, bearing that in mind, I approach the construction of section 3, which is the most material section, and I find that it enables trustees, unless summarily forbidden by the instrument creating the trust (if any), to invest any trust funds in their hands in the manner which is mentioned. It gives a very large discretion and power of selection among a series of trust funds.

Now, pausing there, it seems to me that only indicates moneys which, according to the ordinary description, are in the hands of trustees for investment. It does not apply to sums already invested. Then come the words at the end of the section giving power, "and also from time to vary any such investment." Such as what? The Legislature has not told us. It seems to me that it must mean either any such investments as are hereinbefore mentioned, or any such investments as shall hereafter be made under the power conferred by this section. Which of the two things should it be? In my opinion, it is the former, and it should be read as if the words "any such investment" were followed by the words "as hereinbefore mentioned." I think, therefore, the power of variation applies to investments of the specified character, whether the investment be made by the testator during his lifetime or whether the investment be made by the trustees under a power to invest. Now I have come to that conclusion, induced in the first place very largely by the view that I take of the object of the Act—the object of the Act being to enlarge the powers of selection of investments given to trustees who are exposed to the difficulty of obtaining remunerative investments of a particular kind. But there are other circumstances in the case which incline me to the same conclusion. Now, in the first place, it would be a very strange result if, in a case where a testator leaving trust funds invested in securities of the description enumerated in the Act, e.g., parliamentary stocks, and not giving any power of variation, and leaving cash which was to be invested by the trustees also in parliamentary stock, the trustees should find themselves placed in this position, viz., that they had power to vary one portion of the stock—viz., the parliamentary stock purchased with the cash after the passing of the Act—but that they had not power to vary the other portion of the same class of stock invested in before the Act. I think that is an impossible conclusion, and it is not one which we ought to arrive at. But, again, the fact that the Act applies to documents existing at the passing of the Act seems to me to be very strong to show that it must apply to enable a variation to be made of the stocks in which investments have been made under the power of the existing document, because otherwise it is obvious we should be doubting very much the operation of the power of the section. But, again, the 6th section provides "that the powers hereby conferred shall be in addition to the powers conferred by the instrument creating the trust." It consequently follows that the true mode of construing this power is, as was said by Mr. Farwell, to read it into the will, and then the power to vary investments applies to all investments made under the will and under the Act of Parliament, unless they are excluded by the express language of the will. The intention of the Act evidently is, that the powers given by the Act should be in addition to the powers of the trustees under the will.

For these reasons I think that the decision of the learned judge below, following as he did the view expressed by North, J., in In re Manchester Royal Infirmary, was wrong, and that the trustees have power to vary.

KAY, L.J.—It seems that there is considerable ambiguity in construing this Act of Parliament. For my part I cannot wonder that the learned judge should arrive at the conclusion which he did, looking at the existing decisions and the words of this Act; but upon the whole I think the true mode of dealing with an ambiguity of this kind is to look at what was the scope and intention of the Act of Parliament, and to construe the Act in such a manner as will best carry out the general purpose and object of the Act. Now the words of the Act have been referred to, and I will not read them again, and certain illustrations have been given of what would be the consequence of reading the words of the Act giving the power of variation of investments as applying only to investments made under the Act. It is extremely easy to put difficult cases with regard to either view of construction. The power to vary such investments, even if you read the whole section into the will, only means a power to vary such investments as are mentioned in section 3. It is quite possible there might be under the will or settlement investments not mentioned in section 3, which, if the will or settlement contained no power to vary, would not be variable under the power given in this section, even if you read it into the will. That is a difficulty which was put to counsel during the argument, and a difficulty which would still remain even after the construction which the court has put upon it. However, it is easy to put difficult cases whichever construction be adopted, and it seems to me that having regard to the object of this statute, which was, speaking generally, to enlarge the powers of trustees even under existing trusts as well as under trusts created in future, it is more consistent with that object to give the wider interpretation to this power of variation than the narrower one; and I, therefore, prefer to say that this power of varying investments means varying such investments as are mentioned in section 3 of the Act, whether those investments are made under the power given by the Act, or whether they were made before the Act by the settlor or testator himself, or by the trustees since the trust has arisen. If the investments so made, whenever made, are within any of the investments described in sub-sections (a) to (o) in section 3 of the Act, then I think the words at the end of that section give power to vary such investments.

For these reasons I agree with the other members of the Court of Appeal.

I fear that our decision will subject trustees to greater importunities on the part of tenants for life than heretofore, and, therefore, I wish to add that in changing existing investments trustees have to exercise a discretion, and that it would not be a proper exercise of that discretion to change the investment merely for the sake of increasing the income of the life tenant, if in so doing the security of the capital fund is diminished.

MCGOWAN v. MURRAY. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Negotiating sale subject to sanction of court—Fees paid to estate agents to obtain evidence as to value in order to procure sanction—"Commission"—Scale fee for negotiating sale by private contract—General Order under Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, Schedule I., Part I., r. 11.

Where real estate is being sold by private contract under the order and direction of the court in an administration action, a solicitor who does everything that a solicitor can do in arranging the sale and the price and terms and conditions thereof, which only further require the sanction of the court to become binding, "arranges the sale," &c., within the meaning of rule 11 of the General Order (under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881), Schedule I., Part I., and is, therefore, not disentitled to the scale fee "for negotiating a sale of property by private contract" under the scale of charges in Schedule I., Part I., aforesaid, by the mere fact that the contract for sale does not become a binding one till sanctioned by the court, provided that it is ultimately so sanctioned and an actual sale is consequently effected.

Fees paid or payable by the client in such a case to valuers (though they may be auctioneers or estate agents), not for assisting to negotiate the sale, but in order to obtain their evidence to satisfy the court that the price offered is a fair and proper one, and thus obtain its necessary sanction, are not "commission paid by the client to an auctioneer or estate or other agent" within the meaning of the said rule, so as to disentitle the solicitor to the aforesaid scale fee.

Decision of Kay, J. (ante, p. 90), reversed.

Appeal from Kay, J.

This was an appeal by the defendant, and by a party having leave to attend, from an order of Kay, J., disallowing objections to taxation in this action, in which real estate was being administered by the court.

It appeared that the trustees of the estate which was the subject of the action had, during its pendency, conducted through their solicitor negotiations for the sale of the property under administration. The solicitor carried the negotiations to a successful issue to the extent of procuring an offer from a bank to purchase it, but the agreement which, consequently upon that offer, was entered into for the purchase of the property by the bank, was (the estate being under administration by the court) necessarily conditional upon the sanction of the court being obtained. The solicitor got affidavits (to satisfy the court that the price offered was fair and proper) from two skilled valuers, who were estate agents, for which he paid them a small fee, which he charged to his clients. The court being satisfied upon the evidence procured by the solicitor (including the affidavits by the two skilled valuers) that the price offered was a fair and proper one, sanctioned the sale.

The General Order made in pursuance of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), provides, by Schedule I., Part I., r. 11 (inter alia), that "the scale for negotiating shall apply to cases where the solicitor of a vendor or purchaser arranges the sale or purchase, and the price and terms and conditions thereof, and no commission is paid by the client to an auctioneer or estate or other agent." The scale fee for "negotiating a sale of property by private contract" appears at the beginning of the scale of charges in Schedule I., Part I., in the General Order aforesaid.

When the costs came to be taxed, the taxing master allowed the costs of obtaining the sanction of the court, but disallowed the scale fee for negotiating (which the solicitor had charged in his bill of costs), mainly on the ground that commission had been paid to estate agents (referring to the fees paid to the valuers).

The question having come before Kay, J., on a summons to review the taxation, he held that the word "arranges," in rule 11, meant "finally arranges, so that a binding contract is created," and that inasmuch as the bank here was not bound until the court sanctioned the agreement, the sale could not be said to have been finally arranged till such sanction had been given to it, and the solicitor therefore had not arranged the sale within the meaning of rule 11. The judge accordingly dismissed the summons, and upheld the decision of the taxing master (see the report, ante, p. 90).

From that judgment the defendant and A. Murray (a party attending) appealed.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and J. D. Davenport, for the appellants.—The negotiation was in fact complete, notwithstanding that the sanction of the court was required to make the contract binding; and with respect to the commission paid to the estate agent, it was not paid for arranging the sale. In Parker v. Blenkhorn and Newbould v. Bailward, 37 W. R. 401, 14 App. Cas. 1 (before the House of Lords), in which the decision of this court in In re Newbould, 36 W. R. 161, 20 Q. B. D. 204, was reversed, it was held that even where the auctioneer's commission is paid by the client, rule 11 does not deprive the solicitor of all remuneration for work done in respect of the conduct of the sale, but that under the General Order, r. 2 (c), he is entitled to a quantum meruit for such work, the remuneration to be regulated according to the old system as altered by Schedule II. Here the solicitor has been allowed nothing at all for the negotiating. The scale fees apply equally to sales in court as to outside sales: Stanford v. Roberts, 32 W. R. 404, 26 Ch. D. 155; In re Merchant Taylors' Co., 33 W. R. 693, 30 Ch. D. 28; Humphreys v. Jones, 34 W. R. 1, 31 Ch. D. 30, 32. All that rule 11 means is that the solicitor is not to be remunerated according to the scale unless he does the work himself; so that, if, for instance, the negotiation is managed by an estate agent, the solicitor is not to be paid for it, but is simply to be paid a quantum meruit for what he has done, if he has done anything: In re Wilson (a lunatic), 29 Ch. D. 790, 34 W. R. Dig. 185. The negotiation is finished before the matter goes to the court for its approval. As to the amount paid to the valuers, it was so paid to obtain the necessary evidence of value to lay before the court—it was not paid to them as agents for conducting the negotiation.

Levett, for the respondents.—The judgment of the learned judge is right. The negotiation is not complete until the court has sanctioned the agreement. It might have come to nothing through the non-approval of the court. The solicitor has not done the whole of the work. If he is to have the scale fee he must himself advise as to the value of the property to be sold. How can it be said that the sale has been arranged when no one is bound? Having taken part of the costs on the quantum meruit footing, he cannot take the rest according to the scale. Rule 11 lays down two conditions for entitling the solicitor to be paid by the scale: (1) he must arrange the sale and the price and terms and conditions thereof; and (2) no commission must be paid by the client to an auctioneer or estate or other agent. Neither of these conditions has been complied with in this case. The client is charged in the bill of costs with the amount paid to the agents. The arranging of the price could not be complete until the sanction of the court is obtained, and that could not be obtained without the skilled evidence of an estate agent to show that the price offered is a fair and proper one. [BOWEN, L.J.—Does not the solicitor arrange the price when he has done all that a solicitor as such can do to arrange it?] No! Obtaining an offer is not arranging the sale. [BOWEN, L.J.—Then the scale can only apply where the solicitor has authority to contract?] Unless negotiating a sale is equivalent to merely getting an offer, the learned judge was right. The price here was not arrived at without payment of a fee to an estate agent. [Sir H. Davey, Q.C., undertook that, if necessary, the charge for paying the agent should be struck out of the bill of costs, as it appeared from In re Wilson, 29 Ch. D., on p. 794, that if the solicitor pays the agent out of his own pocket he can claim the scale fee.] The case ought to be decided as it stands, and not altered in the way proposed. It is well settled practice that you must stand on your objections: R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 41. Points not raised in the objections before the taxing master cannot be taken upon the hearing of a summons to review: In re Nation, Nation v. Hamilton, 57 L. T. N. S. 648, 36 W. R. Dig. 56. [BOWEN, L.J.—The court can impose terms.] According to their own statement, the trustees consulted the skilled person before verbally accepting the offer, and it was only on that advice that they did accept it. Therefore, the price was not arranged by the solicitor as required by the rule.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We need not trouble you, Sir Horace Davey. This case raises a very important question upon the taxation of solicitors' bills of costs, where sales are conducted under the order or direction of the court. Everyone knows that in cases of that kind there never is or can be any binding contract until the approval of the court has been obtained. Every sale under the direction of the court takes this turn:—Proposals are laid before the court for its approval; if the court does not approve, of course the proposals go off, or have to be modified. If the court does approve them, of course there is a binding contract. The rule relating to this matter which we have to consider is to be found in Schedule I., Part I. of the General Order made under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act. The schedule says this, in Part I., "Scale of Charges on Sales, Purchases, and Mortgages, and rules applicable thereto." Then "Vendor's solicitor for negotiating a sale of property by private contract, 20s. per £100." Then there are the words, "For sale of property by public auction," which I may pass over. Then there is an item for deducing title, which I only refer to because it includes the "preparation of contract or conditions of sale," so much. Then in connection with that we have rule 11: "The scale for conducting a sale by auction shall apply only in cases where no commission is paid by the client to an auctioneer." That does not apply here, because this was a sale by private contract. Then it goes on: "The scale for negotiating shall apply in cases where the solicitor of a vendor or purchaser arranges the sale or purchase, and the price and terms and conditions thereof, and no commission is paid by the client to the auctioneer or estate or other agent."

Now the facts in this case were shortly as follows. A lady whose estate was being administered in Chancery was entitled to £6,000 upon mortgage of some property, and there was a foreclosure order made. I do not think it had been made absolute, but it was close upon being made absolute, and steps were taken to have the property sold. The solicitor to the trust had an offer from some bankers. They said they would buy it out and out for £5,000. He thought that a fair price. He knew perfectly well that, even if it were a fair price, he could not effect a sale on behalf of his client at that or any other price without obtaining the sanction of the court; and he knew he could not obtain that sanction without laying before the court proper evidence that the price was a fair one. So that what he does is this: He goes to certain gentlemen who he knew had valued the property some years before, and asks them whether £5,000 was a fair price. They said it was, and he got them afterwards to make an affidavit to that effect, for which he paid three guineas and a half, and one guinea. He carries the case into court, and the sale at £5,000 is approved. Then he says, "Now pay me for negotiating that sale the scale charges, and pay me in addition what I have paid these two gentlemen for satisfying the court that the proposals I have laid before the court are fit and proper and ought to be allowed."

The taxing master has disallowed that, and Kay, J., has upheld the taxing master's decision. The taxing master disallowed the claim for two reasons: "First of all," he says, "you have not negotiated the sale within the meaning of this rule; and, secondly, your client has paid commission to an agent."

Now let us see what the first proposition involves. I think I do not misunderstand the taxing master, who is an extremely experienced officer, when I construe his observations as amounting to an intimation of opinion upon his part that this scale fee never applies to sales under the direction of the court. His ninth observation is this:—"It is not at all clear to my mind that, where the sale or purchase has to be approved by the court, that negotiation fee can ever be supported, as in every such case a considerable sum in addition to the negotiation fee must be paid by the client, and this the solicitor knows before starting on the business." Now it appears to me there is a little confusion of thought there as to what "negotiation" means. What is a solicitor who has the conduct of the sale in court to do? What is his business as a negotiator? I cannot understand that it is anything more than this:—To obtain all the terms and all the conditions (including the cost price) which are to be laid before the court. It is his business to negotiate those—it is not his business as negotiator to see to their performance. That is quite another matter. But when he draws up and finally settles the proposals, which are laid before the court for its approval, that appears to me to finish the part of the business which can properly be called negotiation. If in the course of doing that he charges his client, or his client pays or has to pay—I do not attach any importance to actual payment—if in the course of discharging those duties which are involved in the negotiation, his client pays, according to the language of the rule, any commission to an auctioneer, estate or other agent, then the scale fee is not applicable.

Now, supposing that I am right to that extent, it appears to me that this solicitor did in the language of this rule, as the solicitor of the vendor, arrange the sale, and the price and the terms and conditions thereof—that is to say, he brought the parties to a point, and said, "There are the terms, there is the price, and there are the conditions." That is the negotiation. Therefore, so far it appears to me he is within the rule.

Now it is said he is excluded by the second clause of this rule, "and no commission is paid by the client to an auctioneer or estate or other agent." That appears to me to mean necessarily this, that no commission is paid by the client, or payable—I put that word in—"to an auctioneer or estate or other agent," as part of the negotiation. It cannot be that no fee is to be paid, or no commission is to be paid, by the client while the negotiation is pending—that is not what the rule prohibits.

Now, what the solicitor has done is this; I take the facts in substance from Mr. Tatham's affidavit, which is obviously a truthful one, and from what is stated in the objections, which is to the same effect. What Mr. Tatham says in substance is this:—"I negotiated the sale, but I knew perfectly well, in order that that condition of obtaining the approval of the court should be performed, that I must obtain evidence to satisfy the court that the contract was a proper one; and it was for that purpose that I paid these fees, and not as part of the negotiation." And he says, "I am entitled to the scale fees plus these." I think he is right on that. Mr. Levett says that in this particular case the facts are not quite in accordance with the statement I have made. He says, in effect, "You, the solicitor, went and negotiated with this surveyor, and even if you did not pay him, you became liable to pay him for it as part of the negotiations." Well, the solicitor explains that; he says, "I might have gone to the surveyor after I had got this proposal, but I did not go after that, because I knew perfectly well it would be absurd for me to go to the court unless I had got the evidence that the price was fair, and therefore I got the surveyor's opinion as to that before, instead of after." Still the question arises, Did he get that opinion as part of the negotiations, or did he get it for the purpose of performing the condition? It appears to me that he got it for the latter purpose, and that the view taken by the solicitor is right, and that the appeal must be allowed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I must add my views, as we are differing from the learned judge who decided the case. I begin by stating that we are not now discussing the case, nor are we discussing the construction of the rule with regard to a case, in which the sale has gone off, and what I am going to say applies to cases in which the sale has not gone off, but has been effected, and in which the negotiations with the agent have terminated in a successful sale.

Now what does the rule say? It lays down two conditions upon which alone the scale for negotiating is to apply. The first is an affirmative or positive condition. The solicitor must have arranged the sale or purchase, and the price and the terms and conditions thereof. The second is a negative condition. He must have done that, but the client must not have paid any commission to an auctioneer or estate or other agent. The first is affirmative. The second, which also must exist before the scale can be applied, is a negative condition. Not only must the first condition have been fulfilled, but the prohibition of the second condition must not have been infringed. When the second condition says that no commission must be paid by the client, it means, I think, it must neither be paid, nor must the client be made liable in law to pay, because I think the one is really the same as the other in the eyes of the law. Where those two conditions are fulfilled the scale applies.

Now, the first observation which it seems to me to be necessary to make is that this rule cannot be intended not to apply to cases where the agent has only power to negotiate, it cannot be that it is only meant to be applicable in cases where the agent has power to contract, and to complete the whole contract, as well as to complete the negotiation. If that is so, What does it mean? What does the first condition mean when it says that the solicitor, before the scale applies, must arrange the sale or purchase, and the price and terms and conditions thereof? It means, I think, in cases like that which we are considering, where the sale is ultimately effected, that the solicitor "arranges," if he brings the negotiation to a close which leaves his principal free to accept or not, and his principal afterwards does accept. Negotiation, I should have thought, in the ordinary meaning of the English language, is that which passes between parties or their agents, in the course of, or incident to, the making of the contract; and if the negotiation is brought to a close which leaves the principal at liberty to say, "You have done this; I accept the offer," then the agent has done all that a negotiating agent can do, and within the meaning of the rule he has "arranged" the sale, the sale afterwards being effected. Mr. Levett says that the arrangement is not complete if the principal has had to consult somebody else, or, if the principal chooses to consult somebody else, before he consents. Really, with great respect to one of the most ingenious arguments we have had in this court, it is an absurdity, and Mr. Levett had to admit that his argument went to this—that a solicitor had not arranged a sale if the principal went down to Brighton to consult his wife before he accepted. Now, is that possible? But if the solicitor has nevertheless arranged completely, although the principal may take time to consult a third person, why is it not arranged completely as regards the solicitor, and as regards a third party, because the principal has to get the sanction of the court before he can effectuate the sale? It seems to me that it is clear that the solicitor has "arranged" if he has done all that a man can do who is appointed an agent to negotiate. If that is so, then the first branch of the definition is fulfilled. The solicitor here has arranged the sale.

Is the negative condition complied with? Has any commission been paid by the client to an auctioneer or estate or other agent? The answer seems to me to be clear—that no commission has been paid at all to anybody. A commission means a payment on a particular scale paid to an agent; but this fee has not been paid by the solicitor on behalf of the client to anybody as an agent. It was paid to obtain the expert evidence of a witness. That is really what it was intended for. However you characterize it, the last words, it seems to me, in which you can characterize it, are as commission paid to an auctioner or estate or other agent.

To my mind the learned judge was wrong, with great respect to him, and it is clear where he went wrong—he thought that the rule was a much harder rule. The learned judge put a construction upon this rule which would exclude, it seems to me, from the operation of it a vast amount of business which the rule must have been intended to cover. It certainly covers, to my mind, cases in which the agent is appointed as agent to negotiate only, and I think it certainly ought to cover cases in which sales are effected under the sanction of the court. The learned judge says:—"Arrange, I think, in this rule 11, which only applies to negotiations, means that the negotiation must be a complete negotiation resulting in a binding contract."

If he means by that that the solicitor cannot get the fee because he is only an agent to negotiate, it seems to me that it makes the rule inapplicable to a vast mass of business, and if he means that, to make the scale fee applicable, the negotiation must result in a binding contract by the principal accepting that which has been done without being obliged to apply for the sanction of the court, I do not myself see any valid reason for the distinction.

FRY, L.J.—I will endeavour with what brevity I can to express my concurrence in the opinions of my learned brethren. We are concerned with interpreting a rule which describes under what circumstances the vendor's solicitor is to be entitled to a fee for negotiating a sale of property by private contract. Now it appears to me that there is no better ascertained distinction than that which exists between negotiating for a contract and the contract itself, and though the negotiation continues up to the point when the consent of the consenting party is given, it ceases there. Now the cases in which the scale fee is applicable are defined in these words: "The scale fee for negotiating shall apply in cases where the solicitor of a vendor or purchaser arranges the sale or purchase, and the price and terms and conditions thereof." According to my view of the facts of this case the solicitor did, in fact, arrange the sale, the price, the terms, and the conditions. He had an interview with the bank manager, who he found was willing to give a sum of £5,000. He then settled the terms with the bank manager or the solicitor of the bank—he arranged with them the terms and conditions of the contract, and then presented it in that form to the court. I think, therefore, in point of fact, he did arrange all the things that are there mentioned.

Now it is said by the learned judge that in such a case as this the solicitor does not "arrange," but that the court "arranges." We are not dealing with a case in which the court has refused to accede to or approve of the terms which had been settled by the solicitor. It may be that there are circumstances in which it might be truly said that the judge in chambers has arranged the terms or the conditions of sale. About those cases I say nothing. Nothing of the kind occurs in the present instance. So far as we have heard, the contract as settled by Mr. Tatham in conjunction with the solicitors of the bank was adopted and approved by the court. Therefore I think the affirmative words are amply satisfied in this case.

The second inquiry is this. Has any commission been paid, or, I may say, is any commission payable, by the client to an auctioneer, or to an estate or other agent? The auctioneer is out of the question. The only thing that can be said is that two fees, one of three and a half guineas, and the other of one guinea, were paid to two gentlemen, who I suppose may be described as estate agents. They are called valuers, and no doubt carry on business as estate agents. They were not employed in this case as agents, and therefore they could earn no commission, and therefore no commission was either paid or payable to them. What was paid, or is payable, to them, are fees, in the one case for inspecting, and making an affidavit as to the value of, the property, and in the other for making an affidavit with regard to the value of the property without inspecting. They are not commissions. I think the solicitor, therefore, has brought his case within the very terms, and within the meaning and spirit, of this rule, and therefore this appeal must be allowed.

Poor rate — Rateability—Residence of police officers—Occupation for public purposes—Police station.

Certain buildings under one roof and surrounded by a wall consisted in part of private residences, occupied by the appellants, who were the chief constable and other officers of police, and their families, and in part of store rooms, parade ground, and stables used for police purposes. There were no cells used for the reception and detention of prisoners. All the buildings were used exclusively for police purposes, the Chief Constable being bound to reside there as a condition of his appointment. Each officer paid a rent for the premises occupied by him, such rent being deducted from his pay. The appellants having been assessed to the poor rate in respect of the buildings occupied by them as residences,

Held, that, upon the facts, the appellants had a separate beneficial occupation of the premises, which were used by them as private residences, and not for public purposes, and that they were therefore rateable in respect thereof.

PER CURIAM (Lord ESHER, M.R., and BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.):—The question in this case is simply one of fact. The appellants occupied these houses beneficially, and they paid a rent for them. It is clear upon the facts stated in the case that this building, called Springfield Court, is not one building. Each appellant occupied a separate house, and he occupied it as a private residence, and not for public purposes. The appellants, therefore, are liable to be rated. But, even assuming that this is all one building, still, upon the facts stated in the case, it is obvious that it is not a police-station, and within the rule of exemption on that ground. A police-station is a well-known term, and there are here none of the ordinary essentials of a police-station. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Coren v. Barne, 37 W. R. 415, 22 Q. B. D. 249, approved.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Mathew and Grantham, JJ.).

The plaintiff having recovered judgment for £148 in the action against the defendant, which remained unpaid, obtained a garnishee order nisi against Vinall on the following affidavit made by his solicitor:—"I am informed by Mr. W. E. Walker, the managing director of the defendant company, and verily believe, that F. J. Vinall, of 79. Camden-road, London, wine merchant, is indebted to the defendant company in the sum of £100 and upwards for unpaid calls due in respect of 300 shares held by him in the defendant company." Upon the application to make this order absolute Vinall appeared to show cause, and filed the following affidavit:—"I have paid to the Capital and Industries Corporation (Limited) all sums payable by me in respect of the 300 shares held by me in the corporation, save and except such sums as are still uncalled on such shares, and which sums I am advised I am not liable to pay until a call is properly made."

The master required Vinall to make an affidavit stating that he was not indebted to the company at all, and on Vinall's refusal referred the matter to the judge. Vaughan Williams, J., at chambers, after giving Vinall an opportunity of amending his affidavit in this respect, which Vinall declined to do, made the order absolute. The Divisional Court reversed this order, thinking that as the plaintiff had chosen in his affidavit to specify a particular debt it was sufficient for Vinall to deny that he owed that debt. The plaintiff appealed.

Winch, Q.C., and Clavell Salter, for the appellant.—The plaintiff has put more than was necessary in his affidavit. Under ord. 65, r. 1, he need only state that the third party "is indebted" to the debtor.

In re JEFFERY.
BURT v. ARNOLD. (a.)

Infant — Contingent legacy — Income — Maintenance — Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 43.

A testator gave his residuary estate to trustees in trust for sale, conversion, and investment, and out of the income of the investments to pay certain life annuities, and subject thereto the fund was to be held upon trust for all and every the present and future-born children of his two daughters respectively (except a specified son of one of them) who, whether in the testator's lifetime or after his death, being a son or sons, should have attained or should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, should have attained or should attain that age or should have married or should marry.

Held, that the whole surplus income belonged to those grandchildren who had attained twenty-one at the time it accrued, and that section 43 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, empowering trustees to apply for the maintenance of an infant the income of property held in trust for him contingently on attaining twenty-one, was not applicable to the case.

Adjourned summons.

William Jeffery by his will, dated the 1st of July, 1886, gave his residuary estate to F. Arnold and B. Blatch upon trust for sale and conversion and investment of the proceeds, and out of the income of the investments to pay certain life annuities, and the testator directed that, subject to the trusts thereinbefore declared, the proceeds of the sale and the investments thereof for the time being should be held upon trust for all and every the present and future born children of his son Clayton William Jeffery, and all and every the present and future born children (except W. C. Burt) of his daughter Matilda Jane Burt, and all and every the present and future born children of his daughter Paulina Mary Burt, who, "whether in my lifetime or after my decease, being a son or sons, shall have attained or shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, shall have attained or shall attain that age or shall have married or shall marry," and if more than one in equal shares as tenants in common, such children of his sons and daughters to take per capita and not per stirpes. And the testator declared that the shares of his granddaughters not born in his lifetime should be for their separate use.

The testator also directed that the shares of his grandchildren born in his lifetime should be settled upon them and their children.

The testator died on the 20th of February, 1887, leaving his son Clayton William Jeffery, who afterwards married but had no children; his daughter Matilda Jane Burt, who had, besides W. C. Burt and a child who died a minor in the testator's lifetime, a son who was of age and a daughter who was under twenty-one and unmarried; and his daughter Paulina Mary Burt, who had nine children, four of whom were of age, and who was living apart from her husband and maintaining her children.

The surplus income of the testator's residuary estate after payment of the annuities given by his will was represented by a sum of £1,221 Consolidated £2¾ per Cent. Annuities standing in the names of the trustees.

This was an originating summons taken out by Paulina Mary Burt and her children, and served upon the trustees of the will and the son who was of age of Matilda Jane Burt, for the determination of the questions who were entitled to the surplus income, and whether Paulina Mary might be repaid out of the surplus income the moneys which had been expended by her for the maintenance of her children, and also whether part of the surplus income might be paid to her for the future maintenance of her infant children by virtue of section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

Section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, enacts as follows: "(i.) Where any property is held by trustees in trust for an infant, either for life or for any greater interest, and whether absolutely, or contingently on his attaining the age of twenty-one years or on the occurrence of any event before his attaining that age, the trustees may, at their sole discretion, pay to the infant's parent or guardian, if any, or otherwise apply for or towards the infant's maintenance, education, or benefit, the income of that property, or any part thereof, whether there is any other fund applicable to the same purpose, or any person bound by law to provide for the infant's maintenance or education or not.

"(ii.) The trustees shall accumulate all the residue of that income in the way of compound interest by investing the same and the resulting income thereof from time to time on securities on which they are by the settlement, if any, or by law authorized to invest trust money, and shall hold those accumulations for the benefit of the person who ultimately becomes entitled to the property from which the same arise; but so that the trustees may at any time, if they think fit, apply those accumulations, or any part thereof, as if the same were income arising in the then current year."

G. Curtis Price, for the plaintiffs.—This is a case in which the income of the shares to which the infants are entitled contingently on attaining twenty-one is applicable for the maintenance of the infants, and Mrs. Burt ought to be repaid out of the surplus income the sums she has expended on the maintenance of her infant children, and to receive part of the surplus income for their future maintenance: Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 43 (i.); Hill v. Grant, 33 W. R. 511, 29 Ch. D. 331.

Coltman, for the defendant other than the trustees.—The surplus income of the trust fund belongs to those of the children who have for the time being attained twenty-one, and section 43 (i.) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, is inapplicable to this case.

Curtis Price, in reply.—Shepherd v. Ingram, Mills v. Norris, and Scott v. Earl of Scarborough are at variance with the later case of Brandon v. Aston, 2 Y. & C. C. C. 24, 30.

NORTH, J.—The 43rd section of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, provides:—[His lordship read the section and proceeded.] Now, eliminating the words not applicable in the present case, it comes to this. Where property is held by trustees in trust for an infant either for life or for any greater interest contingently on his attaining twenty-one, the trustees may, at their discretion, pay to the infant's parent, or otherwise apply for the infant's maintenance, education, or benefit, the income of that property, or any part thereof. A construction, which I am bound by, has been given by the Court of Appeal to this section in the case of Hill v. Grant. The decision is this, that section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, empowering trustees to apply towards the maintenance of an infant the income of property held in trust for him contingently on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, does not authorize the allowance of maintenance where, apart from the Act, the infant on attaining twenty-one would only be entitled to the legacy without interest. That decision settles the law as far as I am concerned. If the infants attain twenty-one would they be entitled to the past income of their shares? If not this section does not apply. Would an infant, on attaining twenty-one and so becoming entitled to a share, be entitled to say, "Where is the past income of my share, pay it over to me?" On reading the will it is impossible to say what the share will be which any infant will become entitled to on attaining twenty-one. If I cannot say what any share will be, it is impossible to give the income of any share or say what sum should be allowed for maintenance in respect of any share. If any share were vested, then I might consider whether, if an infant must receive something, I could not render the fund available for the maintenance of the infant; but here the infants are entitled contingently on attaining twenty-one. Then, again, is there any past income which an infant could call for on attaining his majority? The cases seem to show that the income of the trust fund belongs to the children who for the time being have attained twenty-one, according to Shepherd v. Ingram, Mills v. Norris, Scott v. Earl of Scarborough. It is suggested that the later case of Brandon v. Aston is at variance with these cases. But I do not think the point was decided in that case. I do not find that the adult children asked to have the income of the whole trust fund. The learned judge stated that he should allow the adult children the interest of their shares, which, if not otherwise right, might be supported by analogy to the course frequently taken by the court as to maintenance, and no parties objected.

Then there is the still later case of Furneaux v. Rucker, W. N., 1879, at p. 135, in which the circumstances are stated thus:—"Bequest in trust for the daughter of the testatrix for life, and after her decease for all her children living at the death of the testatrix who, being sons, should attain twenty-one or who, being daughters, should attain that age or marry, in equal shares. The daughter, who survived the testatrix, died, leaving three children, two sons and a daughter, born in the testatrix's lifetime. The Master of the Rolls considered that the income of the property up to the time when the eldest child attained twenty-one should fall into the residue, and that on his attaining twenty-one he was entitled to the whole of the income until the next child attained twenty-one, when the two eldest were entitled to share the income until the youngest attained a vested interest in the property, when the corpus would be divided between them in equal shares." This decision seems to be a decision in point; and I decide this case in the same way. I should be glad to decide the other way if I could.

Company—Borrowing powers—Indemnity by company to directors to secure promissory notes and guarantees given by directors—Mortgage of uncalled capital.

A limited company, incorporated in 1880, of which one object was (clause 3 (L)) "to borrow money by mortgage or otherwise, receive money on deposit, and issue transferable and other bonds and mortgage debentures, and any other securities founded or based upon all or any of the real and personal assets or upon the credit of the company," was in liquidation under an order of the 16*th of February*, 1889. In 1882 the company had obtained an overdraft from a bank on security of two joint promissory notes, payable on demand, given by two directors, M. and G. These notes were renewed at various times down to 1889. M. and G. also executed guarantees to two railway companies. In April, 1882, the board resolved that, under article 81 of the company's articles, the directors should be indemnified, and in March, 1886, a similar resolution was passed, and also that they should be secured by means of a charge on the uncalled capital. In May, 1886, a mortgage by way of indemnity to M. and G. was executed "of the uncalled-up amounts of £4 per share on 5,000 shares." M. and G. had made payments to the bank and to the railway companies, and now claimed the benefit of their security.

Held, upon the evidence, that it was part of the agreement that M. and G. should be indemnified by a charge upon the uncalled capital, and that, the overdraft being a borrowing of money, the transaction was a borrowing on the security of the uncalled capital, and to that extent the mortgage was valid.

Held, also, that clause 3 (L) authorized the issue of securities founded upon uncalled capital.

Held, also, that, under the articles, the indemnifying of a director was a legitimate business purpose of the company.

Adjourned summons.

The question in this case was whether a mortgage of uncalled capital, dated the 3rd of May, 1886, in favour of Robert McIlwraith and Edward Gotto, two of the directors of the company, was valid.

The company was incorporated in 1880 under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867. The objects of the company were, inter alia, to acquire certain mines, and (clause 3 (L) of the memorandum of association) "to borrow money by mortgage or otherwise, receive money on deposit, and issue transferable and other bonds and mortgage debentures, and any other securities founded or based upon all or any of the real and personal assets or on the credit of the company."

Among the articles of association were—

"81. Everydirector, and also every auditor, manager, secretary, and other officer, and his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, shall be indemnified by the company from all losses and expenses incurred by them respectively in or about the discharge of their respective duties, except such as happen from their own respective wilful acts or defaults."

"102. The business of the company shall be managed by the board, who shall, on behalf of the company, adopt and carry out the agreements mentioned in the memorandum of association, and exercise all such powers of the company as are not by Act of Parliament, or by the regulations of the company for the time being in force, expressly declared to be exercis-able by the company in general meeting; subject, nevertheless, to such regulations (not being inconsistent with the aforesaid provisions or regulations) as may be prescribed by the company in general meeting; but no regulations made by the company in general meeting shall invalidate any prior act of the board which would have been valid if such regulation had not been made."

Powers of directors:—

"106. They may let, mortgage, sell, or otherwise dispose of, either absolutely or conditionally, and in such manner and upon such terms and conditions in all respects as they think fit, any of the property of the company, and may accept payment or satisfaction for any property so disposed of in fully paid-up or other shares, or partly in shares of the company or any other company and partly in cash, or in any such other manner whatsoever as they deem expedient."

"111. They may from time to time borrow on bonds or debentures of the company, or on mortgage of all or any part of the property of the company, and either with or without including in any such mortgage all or any definite proportion of the capital of the company then uncalled, such sums of money as they from time to time think expedient."

"116. They may do all such acts, enter into all such contracts and engagements, and pay, apply, and dispose of any of the moneys or property of the company, and generally act in such manner as they shall from time to time deem necessary or expedient for carrying out all or any of the objects or purposes of the company, and may also from time to time, and either temporarily or permanently, omit, postpone, or abstain from carrying out all or discontinue the further carrying out of any one or more of such objects as they shall from time to time, in the exercise of their discretion, deem most to the advantage of the company."

In 1882 the company found it necessary to obtain an overdraft from their bankers, who were willing to give the required accommodation on the security of a promissory note signed by two directors. At this time there were five directors—McIlwraith and Gotto, the claimants, R. C. Grant, J. S. Fletcher, and M. W. Cave, the last named being since deceased. It was arranged that the note should be given by the claimants, and a promissory note, dated the 14th of April, 1882, for £2,500, payable on demand, was given by them to the bankers.

On the 28th of April, 1882, the following resolution was passed:—"Resolved that, under article 81, the directors who have made themselves jointly responsible with the company for a sum of £2,500 by a promissory note signed by Mr. Gotto and Mr. McIlwraith be, and are, hereby indemnified. This promissory note having been requested by the company's bankers as a security for a loan to the company; the bank having asked a second promissory note for £2,500 as a security for a further loan to the company for that sum, and Messrs. Gotto and McIlwraith having consented to sign such note, Resolved that, on their doing so, they be indemnified in respect of such liability, in accordance with article 81, as above."

A second promissory note for £2,500, payable on demand, was, on the 29th of April, 1882, given by McIlwraith and Gotto to the bankers for a similar purpose. The two notes were renewed from time to time, the last renewals being on the 29th of January and the 4th of February, 1889. On the 23rd of May, 1886, McIlwraith and Gotto executed guarantees in favour of the Great Western and London and North-Western Railway Companies for sums which might become due from the Pyle Works (Limited) to those railway companies. The guarantees were as follows:—

"Great Western Railway.—Conditions of Guarantee.

"We, the undersigned, Robert McIlwraith, Rochester-buildings, Leadenhall-street, and Edward Gotto, The Lodge, Hampstead, two of the directors of the Pyle Works (Limited), do hereby guarantee and agree that, in consideration of the Great Western Railway Co. giving credit to the Pyle Works (Limited), we will be personally responsible for the payment of all moneys from time to time owing by the Pyle Works (Limited) to the Great Western Railway Co., and will pay the same on demand in case of default by the Pyle Works (Limited)."

This guarantee was duly executed by these two directors on the 26th of May, 1886.

The guarantee given to the London and North-Western Railway Co. was in a somewhat fuller form, and was as follows:—

"In consideration of your opening a ledger account in favour of the Pyle Works (Limited) for carriage of materials to be both received and forwarded over your system and other systems connected therewith, we hereby jointly and severally agree to guarantee the due payment of such account on the following conditions."

Ten conditions followed with reference to the carriage of the goods, including, (3), to the effect that the accounts were to be made up monthly and must be paid in full within eight days after the 12th of each month; and (10), that in case of failure to observe any of the conditions the credit accounts would be closed and cash payments required to be made for the future, and in case the account should not be paid in accordance with the conditions the company was to have the right to detain any goods or wagons by way of lien, and to sell them, and apply the proceeds in or towards the liquidation of the debts due to the company. This guarantee was duly executed by the same two directors on the 26th of May, 1886.

At a meeting of the directors of the Pyle Works (Limited) on the 18th of March, 1886, it was resolved "that, Messrs. McIlwraith and Gotto having guaranteed the loan to the company of £5,000 by the British Linen Co.'s Bank, be indemnified, and that a charge on the uncalled capital be given them in respect of this loan, and that they, having guaranteed the Great Western Railway and the London and North-Western Railway ledger accounts, that a similar charge be given for £1,500; and it is resolved that the company's solicitors be instructed to prepare the charge, and that the company's solicitors, Messrs. Grant & Beesley, be instructed to affix the seal of the company to the documents."

The mortgage of the 3rd of May, 1886, was given in pursuance of the last-mentioned resolution. It contained recitals that the company had been incorporated with a capital of £100,000, divided into 10,000 shares of £10 each, that 6,000 shares had been issued and allotted, and that from 5,000 of them the sum of £6 per share, and no more, had been called up, and that the remainder of the 6,000 had been paid up in full or issued as fully paid up, and that a mortgage was given on the 3rd of January, 1882, to Messrs. F. & J. B. Greenwood (see 38 W. R. 282, 674, 44 Ch. D. 535) on 3,500 of the shares to secure the repayment to them of the sum of £2,500 and interest thereon. It was further recited that the mortgagees (McIlwraith and Gotto) had, at the request of the company, guaranteed to the British Linen Co.'s Bank the repayment of a sum of £5,000 which had been advanced by the bank to the company with interest at four per cent. per annum, and had also at the like request guaranteed to the railway companies above-mentioned the payment of such sum as might be owing to those companies by the company for carriage of goods upon their ledger account with the railway companies, and that "the said guarantees were given by the said mortgagees upon the express condition that the said company should execute to them the mortgage hereinafter contained to secure them (the said mortgagees) against any loss or damage they may sustain by reason of giving the said guarantees." After such recitals the company, in consideration of the premises, thereby covenanted with the mortgagees that the company, their successors and assigns, would forthwith, immediately after the mortgagees, or either of them, should pay any moneys under the guarantees, repay the same, with interest at £4 per cent., and would otherwise indemnify their, and each of their heirs, &c., against all loss or damage by reason of entering into the said guarantees, and that, in further consideration of the premises, the said company, as beneficial owners, did hereby assign unto the said mortgagees "all the said uncalled-up amounts of £4 per share on 5,000 shares" of the said company (these 5,000 shares including ordinary and preference shares), on which £6 per share only had been paid up.

This was expressed to be subject to a prior mortgage of the 3rd of January, 1882, above-mentioned, to Messrs. Greenwood of "the uncalled-up amounts of £4 per share on 5,000 shares of the company," and to be by way of indemnity to McIlwraith and Gotto against all loss and damage by reason of their giving the guarantees mentioned in the recitals. The Pyle Works (Limited) had gone into liquidation, by an order made the 16th of February, 1889, and McIlwraith and Gotto had been called upon to make, and had made, payments to the British Linen Co.'s Bank of £5,000, and to the railway companies, in respect of the promissory notes and of the guarantees, of £1,943, and they now, by their summons, claimed the benefit of their security.

Mr. McIlwraith, who had been chairman of the board, and was largely interested, having been settled on the list of contributories for 583 shares, had, since the decision of Stirling, J., in January, 1890 (see 38 W. R. 282, 44 Ch. D. 234) deposed that he was willing to assist in procuring the overdraft or loan to be made if he was assured that he could be secured against loss, that he consulted Mr. Lane, the solicitor to the company, as to what security could be given to the directors who should join in the guarantee, and that the solicitor suggested a mortgage over the uncalled capital, that he explained to Mr. Gotto that such a security could be given, and that he agreed to join in guaranteeing the overdraft or loan upon the terms of a mortgage of the uncalled capital being given them; that at a meeting of the board of directors on the 12th of April, 1882, it was resolved that an overdraft should be obtained on the note of the company and two directors, it having been previously arranged that Mr. Gotto and himself should be the directors executing it on the terms of their being properly indemnified by the company, and having a security given to them over the uncalled capital to protect them against loss, and that on the 17th of April, 1882, Mr. Gotto and he, relying on that understanding and arrangement, executed a joint and several promissory note for £2,500 payable on demand, that being the amount required in the first instance, that the loan account of the company was at once debited with the sum and credit was given by the bank for the amount to the company in the ordinary current account. He further deposed that he discussed with the other directors the question of giving them a security for their guarantee before they consented to give such guarantee; that in particular he suggested they should have a mortgage similar to that given to prior mortgagees, but not to include the general assets; that it was unanimously agreed that they ought to be so secured in respect of the guarantees, and that it should be executed in their favour when they required it, and that it was certainly understood by him, and, he believed, by Mr. Gotto, by Mr. Lane, the solicitor of the company, and by the other directors that they were to be entitled to have such a proper and sufficient security given to them, whenever they should ask for it, to secure them against loss under their guarantees; that they only executed the promissory notes upon that footing; and that the further overdraft or advance of £2,500 was, in due course, carried through in the same manner and upon the same terms and understanding. He also deposed that he and Mr. Gotto were asked to give the guarantees to the railway companies in 1886, and that, having regard to the additional liability which they were then asked to undertake, they both agreed that they ought to press the company to execute to them the security which it had been understood they were to have to secure them against loss in respect of the guarantees given to the British Linen Co.'s Bank; that both Mr. Gotto and he insisted that a security should be given to them over the uncalled capital to secure them against liability under the guarantees to the two railway companies, and also against the liability under which they were to the British Linen Co.'s Bank in respect of the two promissory notes, and that it was only on condition of such security being given them that they consented to give the new guarantees. He further deposed that it was thoroughly intended by them, and they believed, thoroughly understood by the other members of the board, that they would only allow the guarantees to the bank to continue upon the terms of the security being given, and that, therefore, a mortgage of the uncalled capital was given them on the 3rd of May, 1886; and on the 26th of May, 1886, Mr. Gotto and he signed the guarantees to the two railway companies. Similar evidence was given by Mr. Gotto, which was confirmed by an affidavit of the two surviving directors, Messrs. Grant and Fletcher.

On the 10th of August, 1887, the company executed a mortgage to Ferdinand Gautier (who was not a shareholder), to secure a sum of £4,000, with interest at eight per cent. per annum, the property assigned as security being "all the said uncalled-up amounts of £4 per share on the said 5,000 shares," but subject to the said mortgages to Messrs. Greenwood and to McIlwraith and Gotto.

On the 28th of October, 1887, the company executed a mortgage to McIlwraith alone to secure a sum of £3,000, with interest at four per cent. per annum, the property assigned as security being "all the said uncalled-up amounts of £4 per share on the said 5,000 shares." This mortgage purported to be made subject to the mortgages to Messrs. Greenwood and to McIlwraith and Gotto, but did not refer to Gautier's mortgage of the 10th of August, 1887.

Of these four mortgages the only one registered at the office of the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies was Gautier's, but all four were registered in the register of mortgages kept by the company.

On the 13th of January, 1890, Stirling, J., after deciding that the mortgagees under the mortgages of uncalled capital of the 3rd of January, 1882, of the 10th of August, 1887, and of the 28th of October, 1887, were entitled to have the calls applied in payment of their mortgage debts in priority to the general creditors (and which decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, 38 W. R. 674, 44 Ch. D. 534), said that the mortgage of the 3rd of May, 1886, appeared to go a step beyond those which had been upheld in In re Inns of Court Hotel Co., L. R. 6 Eq.

82, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 65, and Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., 36 W. R. 801, 38 Ch. D. 156, and that he would not then say that it was invalid, but that it would be desirable to know something more of the circumstances under which that mortgage was given than was contained in the affidavits then before the court, and that his decision on that part of the case would be postponed until that information had been furnished to the court. Since this last-mentioned date the further evidence above summarized had been in consequence filed.

H. B. Buckley, Q.C., and C. A. James, for Gotto.—At the date of the agreement to indemnify there was an agreement to give an advance, and the evidence now put in shows the transaction was the borrowing of money in compliance with a request made. The directors went to the bank under their powers (article 102); this may not all appear in the books of the company, but the directors had to be secured.

They referred to In re Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and F. Whinney, for McIlwraith.

H. A. Giffard, Q.C., and Haldane, Q.C., for the liquidator.—Was there a power to borrow? It is covered by the earlier part of the clause; it is for the purposes of the company; either it is part of the business of the company, or it falls into some express clause; and, if the latter, it must be under the borrowing clause. Article 81 only refers to a general indemnity out of general assets. There is no power of giving such a preference. The directors, it should be observed, abstained until 1886 from taking this form of indemnity, and merely took a general indemnity under article 81.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., and T. H. Carson, for unsecured creditors.—If the general power to issue bonds and to borrow is taken, article 106 might possibly justify these transactions; but even in that article the power is only to borrow such sums as they shall deem expedient; so these mortgages have to be justified. Was this really a mortgage for money borrowed? A definite agreement is wanting. A mortgage must be something capable of being registered under section 43 of the Act of 1862. The mortgage of 1886 is not really part of the transactions of the year 1882. As to the railway companies, that is not borrowing money, it is running into debt.

They referred to In re German Mining Co., 2 W. R. 543, 4 De G. M. & G., at p. 40.

Buckley, Q.C., in reply.—The powers of the directors to borrow are entirely at their own discretion.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 18.—STIRLING, J. (after stating the facts and reading the resolutions and articles of association above set out).—The Pyle Works having gone into liquidation, Messrs. McIlwraith and Gotto have been called upon to make, and have made, payments to the bankers and the railway companies in respect of the promissory notes and the guarantees, and they now claim the benefit of their security. The validity of a charge on uncalled capital of the company given by way of security for money borrowed has been established by the decision of the Court of Appeal (In re Pyle Works, 38 W. R. 674, 44 Ch. D. 534).

In the present case no money was borrowed from McIlwraith and Gotto, and the question is whether it was within the powers of the directors to give such a security as that of the 3rd of May, 1886. First, is it valid as an indemnity against loss on the promissory notes given to the bankers? It is to be observed that the resolutions of the 28th of April, 1882, as recorded in the minutes, say nothing as to any bargains on the part of McIlwraith and Gotto for a security on the uncalled capital, or on any part of the property of the company. I apprehend, however, that evidence is admissible to show what the real agreement was between them and the company. This would clearly be so if McIlwraith and Gotto had not been directors; in that case the minute would not have been admissible against them. As they were directors, the minute is admissible against them, but none the less does other evidence appear admissible, though the existence of the minute is a circumstance to be considered in judging its weight. Now, McIlwraith gives this account of the matter: [His lordship read the evidence of Mr. McIlwraith, a summary of which is above stated.] Gotto gives similar evidence, and this is confirmed by the joint affidavit of the other surviving directors, Grant and Fletcher. None of these gentlemen have been cross-examined, and I come to the conclusion that it was a term of the agreement between the company and McIlwraith and Gotto, under which the promissory notes were given to the bankers that McIlwraith and Gotto should be indemnified by means of a charge on the uncalled capital of the company in accordance with the recital to that effect in the deed of the 3rd of May, 1886. That being so, and the overdraft being clearly a borrowing of money, it appears to me that the transaction was in substance a borrowing of money on the security of the uncalled capital of the company within the meaning of article 111. It is true that the bankers from whom the money was actually borrowed were content with the personal security of the guarantors; but the guarantors, as part of the same transaction, stipulated for a counter security in the shape of a charge on the uncalled capital; and I do not think that article 111 requires the mortgages there mentioned to be given to the persons by whom the money is lent. I think, therefore, that to this extent the mortgage is valid.

Next, how does the case stand as regards the sums paid in respect of the guarantees given to the railway companies? The company did not, on the security of these guarantees, borrow money from the railway companies, but by means of them obtained on credit the services of the companies as carriers of goods. No authority has been cited to show that this can be treated as a borrowing of money, and on principle I have difficulty in seeing that it is. If, then, the validity of the mortgage depended on the applicability of article 111, I should feel great doubt whether it could be supported. I think, however, that clause 3 (L) of the memorandum of association empowers the company to "issue transferable and other bonds, and mortgage and debenture and any other securities founded or based upon all or any of the real and personal assets or on the credit of the company," not merely to secure the repayment of borrowed money, but generally for the purposes of the company. I think, further, that the term "assets" in this clause is intended by article 111 to include unpaid capital, and, accordingly, that the clause authorizes the issue by the company of securities founded or based upon the uncalled capital of the company. By article 102 the directors may exercise all the powers of the company, subject to any regulations prescribed by the company in general meeting. There are no such regulations which affect the issue of securities; and I think, therefore, that the directors might issue securities founded or based upon uncalled capital for any legitimate business purpose of the company. The indemnifying of a director seems to me, both under article 81 and under article 116, to be such a purpose, and I therefore come to the conclusion that the mortgage is valid, and that the claim under it ought to be admitted.

WILLIAMSON v. HINE BROTHERS. (a.)

Shipping—Managing owners—Principal and agent—Secret profits—Brokerage—Commission.

It is the duty of a managing owner of a ship to procure charters and freights, and therefore, in the absence of any special bargain, a managing owner who is also a shipbroker is not entitled to make a profit for himself by commission or brokerage for procuring charters and freights.

Adjourned summons.

This action had been brought by one of the co-owners of certain ships against the managing owners, who were a firm of ship and insurance brokers, for a declaration that the defendants were not entitled to retain for their own benefit certain secret profits, alleged to have been made by them, consisting of brokerage on freights and charters, commissions on insurance premiums, and other commissions, and an account of such alleged secret profits and payment accordingly. The defendants received as their remuneration for management a fixed sum for each ship.

Upon the action coming on for trial, judgment was given, dismissing the greater part of the plaintiff's claim, but an inquiry was directed whether it was within the duties of the defendants, as managing owners of the ships, or otherwise as agents of the plaintiff and the other owners, to procure freights and charters; and, if so, an account of the sums received by them by way of commission or brokerage in respect of such chartering or freightage. This judgment was affirmed on appeal. The chief clerk, by his certificate, answered the inquiry in the affirmative.

This was a summons by the defendants to vary this certificate.

KEKEWICH, J.—The principle upon which this inquiry is based is abundantly clear. A paid agent—I am not now concerned with an unpaid agent—is bound to discharge for a reasonable remuneration all those duties, multifarious or otherwise and onerous or otherwise, in his personal contemplation, which the terms of the agency cover. He must make his own bargain with his principal, and it is his duty to do all that that bargain entails, and to be content with his wages. If he is called upon to do anything outside the terms of his agency, he is entitled to make a special bargain, or he can decline to do it unless he is remunerated on a special footing. Or he may do the work, and, provided everything is fair and above board, he probably would be allowed some fair remuneration according to some known measurement of the value. But if he does anything within the terms of his agency, however uncompensated it may seem to him personally, he can neither charge for it in his account, nor can he secretly take any commission for it. Take such a case, by way of illustration, as that of an estate agent. An estate agent's duties might be extremely difficult to define, but if the landowner requires him to see after the building of a cottage which involves the purchase of timber, it would be, I apprehend, the duty of the estate agent to purchase the timber on the best terms obtainable; and if he happens to be a timber merchant he cannot supply the timber at a profit. If he deals with another timber merchant, who is disposed to give him a commission for the introduction of the business, he must either resign that commission, or, accepting it, give his employer the benefit of it. If, on the other hand, the landowner requires a carriage for his own use, and he asks the estate agent to get it for him, the estate agent certainly can employ himself, or somebody else, or, provided it is all fair and above board, he can, if he happens to be a carriage builder, sell a carriage to his employer. That is outside the limits of his agency, and, as long as it is all done fairly, no one could complain of a man making a profit in his own trade which was not within the terms of his agency.

Nobody ever doubted that managing owners were at liberty to employ brokers. Nor was it, as far as I remember, at all doubted, nor do I doubt now, that if the managing owner is also, as frequently happens, a ship broker, he can, so to speak, employ himself, if it is fair and above board; but there must be no secret arrangement and no secret profit. If he employs another broker, of course he can pay, on behalf of the shipowner, the moneys necessary to pay that broker. If he employs himself he, of course, can pay what is necessarily expended in making a bargain; but, unless it is outside his duty as managing owner, he cannot make a profit if he employs himself, and he cannot receive a commission for his own benefit from the outside broker. [His lordship then dealt with the evidence before the chief clerk, and continued:—] I have not before me satisfactory evidence that, in the absence of a special bargain, there is a right on the part of the managing owner to charge this extra payment for procuring freights and charters against the ship. On the other hand, I have a considerable amount of evidence on behalf of the plaintiff to show that it is not part of the duty of managing owners to make any such charge against the ship. I think, therefore, that I must hold that it is one of the duties of the managers to procure charters, and that it is such a duty as comes within the terms of their duties as managing owners, in respect of which they are not entitled to make a charge, and in respect of which they are not entitled to debit the ship with a commission. If they receive a commission I think it belongs to the shipowner as the principal, and cannot properly be received by them for their own benefit. That being so, I think the chief clerk has come to a proper conclusion, and the certificate must stand.

Summons dismissed.

PAYNE (Appellant) v. THOMAS (Respondent). (a.)

Licensed house—Intoxicating liquor—Sale of beer in measure not marked as an imperial measure—Conviction—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 8.

A publican supplied to a customer, at the request of the customer, what was known as a "blue" of beer, which was a quantity of beer in a blue jug, more than half a pint and about one-third of a quart. At the time of the sale there were conspicuously posted up in the room notices that the vessel called a "blue" was not represented as containing any amount of imperial measure, or as being a measure of imperial standard, and in fact the vessel was not an imperial measure or marked as such.

Held, that the publican had, under section 8 of the Licensing Act, 1872, committed the offence of selling intoxicating liquor, not being a quantity less than half a pint, in a measure not marked according to the imperial standards, and that he was properly convicted of the same.

Case stated by justices.

An inspector of weights and measures preferred an information against the appellant, Henry Payne, a licensed person, for having, on the 11th of October, 1889, at his licensed premises called the Golden Lion, in the parish of Llanelly, and county of Carmarthen, unlawfully sold in a certain measure not marked according to the imperial standards, certain intoxicating liquor, to wit, beer, which was then sold by retail, and not in cask or bottle, and was not then sold in a quantity less than half a pint.

The justices convicted the appellant, and fined him in the sum of five shillings, including costs, but stated a case from which the following facts appeared:—

The prosecutor, an inspector, visited the house of the defendant for the purpose of testing the measures used by him in his business; a customer came in and asked for a "blue" of beer (that is, a blue jug of beer), and the defendant handed him a blue vessel of beer, called a "blue" of beer, saying, "That's twopennyworth"; and the customer paid twopence for the same. At the time of such sale there were conspicuously displayed in the room in which the sale took place cards on which the following notice was printed—videlicet, "Notice, the vessel called blue is not represented either as containing any amount of imperial measure, or as being a measure of imperial standard, or secondary imperial measure of capacity." The prosecutor seized the measure or "blue," tried it and found it contained more than half a pint, to wit, one-third of a quart, and then proceedings were taken against the defendant under section 8 of the Intoxicating Liquors Licensing Act, 1872, for selling intoxicating liquor in a larger quantity than half a pint in a measure not marked according to the imperial standards. It was proved that there is no imperial measure answering to one-third of a quart. It was admitted that the blue contained more than half a pint, and that it was supposed to contain one-third of a quart, but at the same time the beer was not sold as one-third of a quart, but under the local denomination of a "blue," a "blue" being well known in the locality as being a vessel of a particular shape containing about a third of a quart.

The prosecutor contended that the fact of the defendant knowing he was selling intoxicating liquor in a vessel containing more than half a pint, rendered him liable to the penalty under section 8 of the above-mentioned Act, and that all intoxicating liquors sold in quantities exceeding half a pint must be sold in measures marked according to the imperial standards.

The defendant contended that section 8 of the Licensing Act of 1872 only applied to sales by measure, and that the section was not intended to inflict a penalty for a sale to a customer who might ask for and be supplied with a quantity of intoxicating liquor which might be more or less than an imperial measure, and that he was at liberty to sell any quantity of intoxicating liquor exceeding half a pint so long as he did not sell it in a vessel representing it as containing any amount of imperial measure, and he also relied upon sections 19 and 22 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878.

The justices held that the defendant did sell intoxicating liquor by retail in a quantity exceeding half a pint in a measure or vessel not marked according to the imperial standards, and they convicted him accordingly.

Section 8 of the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), enacts:—"Every person shall sell all intoxicating liquor which is sold by retail and not in cask or bottle, and is not sold in a quantity less than half a pint, in measures marked according to the imperial standards."

Crump, Q.C., and W. Evans, for the appellant, referred to section 22 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, and to the case of Addy v. Blake, 35 W. R. 719, 19 Q. B. D. 478.

Tudor Howell, for the respondent, was not called upon.

HAWKINS, J.—Nothing can be clearer than the language of section 8 of the Licensing Act, 1872, nevertheless, it has been suggested that we ought to introduce words into the section to explain its meaning, words which, I think, would make the section absurd. The clear meaning of the section is, that a publican may sell an intoxicating liquor of a quantity less than half a pint in a measure that is not marked, but that if the quantity is half a pint or over half a pint it must be sold in a measure marked according to the imperial standards, the only exceptions being when the liquor is sold in bottle or cask. The case of Addy v. Blake is rather in favour of the prosecutor than the defendant. Then it is said that section 22 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, in effect repeals section 8 of the Licensing Act, 1872, but this section merely deals with measures and vessels coming under the Weights and Measures Act, and has no reference to the Licensing Act, 1872. It is clear that there was no intention of repealing section 8 of the Act of 1872, as it is not mentioned in the schedule of repealed Acts at the end of the Weights and Measures Act. Section 8, then, of the Licensing Act, 1872, being in force, we are bound to interpret it by the ordinary rules, and I cannot imagine language more apt for the purpose of compelling persons selling intoxicating liquors to do so in measures marked according to the imperial standards.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the appellant was properly convicted, and the conviction must be affirmed.

AYLESFORD (EARL) v. POULETT (EARL). (a.)

Solicitor—Remuneration—Mortgage—Investigating title—Separate mortgage transactions—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), s. 7—Solicitors' Remuneration Order, 1882, Schedule I., Part I., r. 10.

The life interest of a tenant for life in the whole of the real estates comprised in a settlement made in 1871 was subject to a mortgage of £192,000 created by the tenant for life. In 1882 the trustees of the settled estates were empowered by a private Act to raise a larger sum, on mortgage of the fee of the settled estates, for the purpose of paying off the charge on the life estate and the other debts of the tenant for life. In August, 1883, the trustees accordingly executed a mortgage in fee of part of the settled estates, to the same mortgagees, for a sum of £232,000, out of which the sum of £192,000 was retained by the mortgagees in repayment of their charge on the life estate, and only the balance—viz., £40,000—paid in cash to the trustees. The mortgagees employed the same solicitors in respect of both mortgage transactions.

Held, that the mortgage of 1883 was not a further charge for £40,000, but an entirely new mortgage for £232,000, and, therefore, that the solicitors of the mortgagees were entitled to be remunerated on that footing, according to the scale fee prescribed in Schedule I., Part I., of the Solicitors' Remuneration General Order, 1882.

Decision of North, J. (reported ante, p. 106), reversed.

Appeal from the decision of North, J. (reported ante, p. 106).

In 1882 the life estate of the then Earl of Aylesford in the whole of the Aylesford settled estates was subject to a mortgage of £192,000 which was vested in the Eagle Insurance Co. By the Aylesford Settled Estates Acts, 1882-3, the trustees of the settled estates were empowered to raise, by mortgage of the fee of the settled estates, a sum not exceeding £350,000, and to apply the same in paying off the mortgage on the life estate and the other debts of the then tenant for life.

On the 7th of August, 1883, the trustees accordingly mortgaged the fee simple of part of the settled estates to the Eagle Co. for a sum of £232,000, out of which sum, the sum of £192,000 was applied in paying off the mortgage on the life estate and was accordingly retained by the Eagle Co., so that the sum actually paid in cash by the Eagle Co. to the trustees of the settled estates was only £40,000.

The Eagle Co. (the mortgagees) had employed the same solicitors in respect of both mortgage transactions, and the question raised by the appeal was whether the remuneration to which the mortgagees' solicitors were entitled was the sum of £450, that being the amount of the full scale item prescribed by Schedule I., Part I., of the Solicitors' Remuneration Order, 1882, on a mortgage for £232,000, or whether the solicitors were only—at the utmost—entitled to receive for their remuneration the sum of £145, that being the amount of the scale fee on the sum of £40,000.

The trustees (the defendants in the present action) claimed in passing their accounts to get credit for the payment to the mortgagees' solicitors of the larger sum, while the plaintiff (the present tenant for life) contended that only the smaller sum should be allowed.

The taxing master disallowed the charge for £450, and expressed his opinion that the mortgagees' solicitors were only entitled to remuneration according to Schedule II., the transaction being a further charge of £40,000 on property the title to which had been already investigated; but with the assent of the plaintiff he allowed the charge for £145, being the scale fee on the sum of £40,000.

North, J., on a summons by the defendants to review taxation, held that the view taken by the taxing master was right, and dismissed the summons (see the report ante, p. 106).

The defendants appealed.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Dauney, for the appellants.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and W. C. Druce, for the plaintiff.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is a question of some importance to solicitors. [The Lord Justice then stated the facts, and proceeded:—] The question before us is whether the trustees are to be allowed in passing their accounts to charge the estate with a sum of £450, that being the scale fee prescribed on a mortgage of £232,000, or whether they are only—at the utmost—entitled to charge the estate with the sum of £145, being the scale fee on the sum of £40,000.

The question turns on the rules under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, Schedule I., Part I., and rule 10 in that schedule. By the first part of the schedule a mortgagee's solicitor is entitled to a scale fee "for negotiating loan," and to another scale fee "for investigating title to freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property, and preparing and completing mortgage." Then rule 10 provides that "the above scale as to mortgages is to apply to transfers of mortgages where the title is investigated, but not to transfers where the title was investigated by the same solicitor on the original mortgage or in any previous transfer, and it is not to apply to further charges where the title has been so previously investigated. As to such transfer and further charges, the remuneration is to be regulated according to the present system as altered by Schedule II. hereto. But the scale for negotiating such loan shall be chargeable on such transfers and further charges where it is applicable."

The taxing master having allowed only the scale fee on £40,000, the defendants carried in this objection: "The item of £1,255 should have been allowed at £450, being the amount according to the scale authorized by the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, upon a mortgage for £232,000. The mortgage for the £232,000 was a new and independent transaction, and entirely distinct from the mortgage for £192,000 which previously existed on the life estate." The taxing master answered:—"The solicitors have already been once paid for investigating the title, at least on £192,000 (part of £232,000)—that is, on the life estate. On the present occasion an additional £40,000 was advanced, no doubt this time on the fee. But the transaction was between the same parties, and, as before observed, the proper fee had been already paid for investigating the title. On the present occasion the defendants are really entitled to nothing more than the proper charges under Schedule II., and I invited them to bring in such items. This they declined to do, contending that they were entitled to be allowed the full scale item on £232,000. In these circumstances I have, with the assent of the plaintiff's solicitors, allowed them £145, being the scale fee on £40,000, which is in my judgment much more than the defendants would be allowed if items were brought in under Schedule II."

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This appears to proceed on the theory that this mortgage is a further charge within rule 10. It cannot be contended that it is a transfer, but the taxing master treated it as a further charge on property the title to which had been previously investigated by the same solicitor.

Now, no doubt the title had been investigated on behalf of the Eagle Co. when they advanced the £192,000, but the real question is whether the transaction can be considered a further charge. I think that it cannot. I should be sorry to sacrifice substance to form, but it appears to me that the deed of the 7th of August, 1883, was really, and in substance, a new mortgage under the statutory power given to the trustees, and cannot be treated as a deed of further charge. It is not on the same property, being a mortgage in fee of part of the property, whereas the former mortgages were on the interest of the tenant for life in the whole of the property; and it was not made by the same parties, being made by the trustees and not by the tenant for life; it is, then, in my opinion, nothing but a new mortgage for £232,000. It is true that only £40,000 was advanced in cash, but that does not make the transaction a further charge for £40,000. It is a new mortgage in fee for £232,000, and falls within Schedule I., Part I., and the scale fees for negotiating a loan of that amount and for investigating title and preparing and completing mortgage must be allowed.

BOWEN, L.J.—In order to bring this case within rule 10 of Schedule I. the respondent must make out that the deed is only a further charge. The rule is both affirmative and negative, and if the present case is within the rule it must fall within the second part of it—viz., that the scale is not to apply to further charges where the title has been previously investigated. But to bring the present case within those words it must be made out that this is a deed of further charge, which, in my opinion, for the reasons given by Lindley, L.J., it is not.

FRY, L.J.—If we had a discretion as to the taxation of costs I am not sure that I should not agree with the taxing master and North, J. But the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), s. 7, enacts that so long as any general order under the Act is in operation the taxation of solicitors' bills of costs shall be regulated thereby. We have, therefore, no discretion to depart from the terms of the order. It seems to me that the remuneration in this case does come strictly within the charge which the mortgagees' solicitor is entitled to make as on a new mortgage. The present instrument cannot fall within rule 10 unless it is a transfer or a further charge. It cannot be contended that it is a transfer, and I am of opinion that it is not a further charge. The statutory trustees were bound to raise money by mortgage of the estate and apply the money in paying off the subsisting charges on the life interest. The instrument by which they raised the money is a new mortgage, and cannot be held a further charge because only a part of the sum raised was actually advanced in cash. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal succeeds.

JENKINS v. JACKSON. (a.)

Costs—Taxation—Plaintiff successful on some issues and failing on others—General costs of action, how apportioned—Form of order.

A plaintiff in the Chancery Division succeeded on the substantial part of his claim and failed on a subordinate part, but the form of order adopted referred it to the taxing master to tax the defendants' costs of so much of the action as related to the issue on which the plaintiff failed, and to tax the plaintiff's costs of the rest of the action, and directed the said costs of the defendants to be set off against the said costs of the plaintiff, and the balance to be certified, and ordered the defendants to pay such certified balance to the plaintiff. It appeared that in the taxing master's office in the Chancery Division it was the established practice, where the order was in the above form, to apportion the general costs of the action between the plaintiff and defendant according to the number of issues on which they had respectively succeeded, without regard to the relative importance of such issues, but that, where the plaintiff was intended to have such general costs, the form of order is adopted which gives him "the costs of the action, except so far as they have been increased by the issue" on which he has been unsuccessful. The general costs of this action having, in accordance with the above rule, been apportioned between the plaintiff and defendants in moieties, the plaintiff took out a summons to review the taxation.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that, though the plaintiff got less than he was fairly entitled to, that was owing to the adoption of the wrong form of order (a mistake which could not now be rectified), and that it would be wrong to disturb the settled practice of the chancery taxing office, in accordance with which the taxation under the form of order here adopted had been correctly worked out.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of Kekewich, J., dismissing a summons for the review of taxation in an action for nuisance. The plaintiff had in his pleadings alleged that a dancing-room belonging to the defendants over his office caused a nuisance, owing to the noise and vibration when dancing was going on. He had also alleged unmannerly and offensive conduct upon the staircase and in the lobby of the house on the part of disorderly persons assembled there for the purpose of the dancing.

At the trial (reported 37 W. R. 253, 40 Ch. D. 71) Kekewich, J., found in favour of the plaintiff as to the noise and vibration alleged to be caused by the dancing, and ordered the defendants to pay him £20 damages on that issue. But as to the alleged unmannerly and offensive conduct on the staircase and in the passages, he found that the defendants were not liable for it. The judge referred it to the taxing master to tax the costs of the defendants of so much of the action as related to the unmannerly and offensive conduct, and to tax the plaintiff's costs of the rest of the action, and directed the taxing master to set off the defendants' costs against the plaintiff's costs, and certify the balance, and ordered the defendants to pay such balance to the plaintiff.

Proceeding under this order, the taxing master apportioned the general costs of the action in moieties between the plaintiff and defendants, treating the case on the footing of the plaintiff having succeeded on one issue, and the defendants on the other. The plaintiff was dissatisfied with this apportionment, as he considered that the issue on which he had failed was a minor one, and that regard ought to have been had to the relative importance of the issues, which could have been gathered from the pleadings and evidence. He accordingly took out a summons to review the taxation.

After the summons had been argued, Kekewich, J., sent a memorandum to the taxing master desiring his assistance and that of his colleagues in ascertaining the principle on which the costs ought to be taxed in such a case, and he mentioned that the judgment was intentionally not in the form of directing "the defendant to pay the costs of the action, except so far as they had been increased by the" complaint of disorderly conduct, and directing the plaintiff to pay the costs so excepted, but in the form of giving each party the costs of the issue on which he had succeeded. He also explained the grounds of the plaintiff's dissatisfaction with which he (the judge) was disposed to sympathize, and added that if there was a settled practice to tax the costs on such an order in the way the taxing master had done, he (the judge) was unwilling to interfere with it, though it did not give effect to his intention in the present case.

To this memorandum a reply was received to the effect that the practice as to costs when a party was partially successful and partially failed was well settled in the chancery taxing master's office in accordance with the decision of Knight v. Purssell, 28 W. R. 90, referred to in the memorandum, that where the form of order was that adopted in the present case, the plaintiff got his costs of the issue or the part of his claim on which he had succeeded, and the defendant the costs of the other issue or part; that there was nothing in the order to show the relative importance of the issues, and the master could not go behind that order. It was the practice, therefore, in such a case, to divide the general costs in moieties, but to give each party the costs of such part of every affidavit or document as related to that part of the claim on which he had succeeded, disallowing the rest. Where the judge considered the plaintiff entitled to more than this, the other form of order was adopted, which gives him "the costs of the action except so far as they have been increased by the unsuccessful issue." The effect of the latter form was to give the plaintiff all the general costs, eliminating everything on which he had failed. The reply further called the judge's attention to the case of Harley v. Hunt, 32 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 8, W. N., 1887, p. 184, and stated that the taxing master was bound by the form of the order.

Kekewich, J. (after receiving this reply), gave judgment dismissing the summons to review the taxation. He held that he was bound by Harley v. Hunt, which had not been cited to him in the argument. That case was a decision of the Court of Appeal upon an order substantially the same in form as that in the present case, and the effect of that was that the principle on which the general costs had been apportioned here was correct. Though he did not think the plaintiff had got all he ought to have got by way of costs, he thought it more important that the practice should be certain than that it should be right. The same order as to costs would, probably, have been differently worked out in the Queen's Bench Division, and he thought that was an anomaly which it was desirable to get rid of, if possible, by bringing the conflicting practices in the two divisions into harmony.

The plaintiff appealed.

Warmington, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the appellant.—In Harley v. Hunt there were two distinct issues and causes of action, which was not the case here. In Knight v. Purssell, also, the several issues on which the plaintiff succeeded and failed were entirely distinct from each other. The plaintiff here was successful in the substantial and important part of the action, and only failed in a minor and subordinate part. In Sparrow v. Hill, 29 W. R. 490, 705, 7 Q. B. D. 362, 8 Q. B. D. 479, in which case the plaintiff succeeded on one issue and failed on two, the Court of Appeal held that the order was rightly interpreted by the taxing master, who gave the plaintiff the general costs of the cause, disallowing only those which applied exclusively to the parts of his claim on which he had failed, and allowed the defendants such costs only as were incurred by them by reason of the two items of claim which they successfully resisted. The order in that case was that the plaintiff was "to be allowed such costs as one of the masters may find he has rightly incurred in recovering" the amount for which he had got judgment, and that the defendants were "to be allowed such costs as they have rightly incurred in defending themselves on those points on which they have succeeded." We deny that the taxing master has no power to discriminate between the relative importance of the different issues. It will be observed that the order here is that the defendants shall pay the certified balance of the costs to the plaintiff, which shows that the judge did not intend the general costs to be equally divided. There is no such hard-and-fast rule as to the principle of taxing according to the form of order, as the taxing master's reply asserts. A witness might be in the box all day on one point, and be asked only one question on another, which is what actually occurred here. The taxing master has exercised no discretion at all, as he considered himself bound by an arbitrary rule.

They also referred to Heighington v. Grant, 1 Beav. 228.

Neville, Q.C., and Prance, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I regret to say I think there has been something wrong here, and that the plaintiff will not get all it was intended he should get; but it does not follow that we can put that right now. Judging from the observations made by Kekewich, J., I should come to the conclusion that the wrong form of order has been put in. If it was intended, as I am inclined to think it was, that the plaintiff should have the general costs of the action, minus a certain portion of them, there is a well-known form of order for giving him that advantage. It is in the power of the judge to make such an order as to costs as he thinks proper, and I suppose in the Chancery Division, as in the Queen's Bench Division, if the plaintiff succeeds primâ facie he gets his general costs of the action, although he may fail upon some minor point. At the same time it is for the judge to say whether that is to be so. It is perfectly competent to the judge to depart from that and to apportion the costs of the action between the plaintiff and the defendant. The question is, which has the judge done? I think what he intended to do, I am bound to say, having regard to his own observations, was to give the plaintiff the general costs of the action. But unfortunately the order has been drawn up in such a way that, consistently with the established practice, which I do not think we ought to disturb, it does not give him the costs of the cause.

Now the form of the order is this. It says, "It is ordered that the defendants pay the plaintiff £20"—that is, damages for the nuisance occasioned by the wrongful use, by dancing, of a room over the plaintiff's room—"and on so much of the statement of claim as relates" to what I call bad behaviour and disorderly behaviour on the stairs, the court gives judgment for the defendants; "and it is ordered that it be referred to the taxing master to tax the costs of the defendants of so much of this action as relates to" such disorderly conduct, I will call it, "and also to tax the plaintiff's costs of the rest of this action, including in the plaintiff's costs the costs of" a certain motion, and then to set off the defendant's costs against the plaintiff's costs and to certify the balance, and then the defendants are to pay the balance of the plaintiff's costs so certified. I think there are two methods of reading that. I am not at all sure that a judge in the Queen's Bench Division would not say that that should give the plaintiff the general costs of the action—I rather think that it would be so construed there. But then in the Queen's Bench Division there are not those two forms of order which are in constant use in the Chancery Division, and when this is taken to a chancery taxing master, he says: "This is not the form which would have been adopted if you had been intended to have the general costs—it is the other form, and under it you cannot get the general costs." That appears to me to be the established rule. It was established long before Knight v. Purssell; it has been followed ever since Knight v. Purssell, and it was reconsidered only in 1887 by the Court of Appeal in the case (to which we have been referred) of Harley v. Hunt. It appears to me it is quite impossible to put the matter right by forcing upon this order a construction which would not be put upon it by those who are in the habit of dealing with it. I regret to say I think there has been an injustice done to the plaintiff. I attribute it, not to any error of the taxing master, but to the fact that the wrong form of order was adopted. I am afraid it is too late to clear that up, and I think, therefore, the appeal should be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think, exactly as Lindley, L.J., does, that here the wrong form of order has been adopted. It seems to me that the judge really intended to give the plaintiff the general costs of the action. That is the form to which on my side we are most accustomed. Of course the Chancery Division has its own forms, which are more appropriate to the business brought in that division. Again, I also think that on the common law side of the court we should probably have construed this order as giving the plaintiff the general costs of the action; but it seems to me that in chancery it has been construed in a different way, and that the case of Knight v. Purssell cannot be overruled or set aside and treated as of no effect. It really settles the practice.

I will only add one word, and the word I am about to add shows the reason why I add anything to what the Lord Justice has said. It is this, that I have been constantly pressed for the last twelve years since I have been a judge with the diversity of opinion and practice, as to taxations, that exists in the Chancery Division and the Queen's Bench Division, and it seems to me really that nothing could be more important than that the Lord Chancellor, or some authority at the head of the law, should methodically inquire into the differences that do exist both in the opinion and in the practice as to taxation on the different sides of the court.

Collins v. Paddington Vestry, 28 W. R. 588, 5 Q. B. D. 368, explained.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Pollock, B., and Charles, J.) refusing to extend the time for appealing from the judgment of a county court.

On December 12, 1890, the action was tried in the county court of Bloomsbury, and judgment was given for the defendants. The plaintiff, being desirous of appealing, applied to the county court judge for his notes, and asked the defendants to supply him with a document which had been put in at the trial. On December 29, not having received either of these, he served notice of appeal, but waited, hoping to receive the notes and documents, until January 3, when he tried to enter the appeal, but was told that he was too late, since, by ord. 59, r. 12, such appeal must be entered within twenty-one days from the date of the judgment.

The Divisional Court refused to extend the time for entering the appeal, holding themselves bound by the decisions in Collins v. Vestry of Paddington, 28 W. R. 588, 5 Q. B. D. 368, and Reg. v. Kettle, 17 Q. B. D. 761, 34 W. R. Dig. 50.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cavanagh, for the plaintiff.

Shearman, for the defendant.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think that we must say that we do not think that the decision in Reg. v. Kettle fetters the discretion of the court to grant an extension of the time for appealing under ord. 59, r. 16. No doubt that was the tendency of the case of Collins v. Paddington Vestry, but that case was decided at a time when the court took much stricter views of the rules, and nearly every judge of the Court of Appeal has withdrawn from that case in its strictness. I think the court has a discretion, which it will not exercise loosely, but which must be exercised on the circumstances of each particular case.

In the present case, considering all the circumstances, I think that the extension of time should be granted.

BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal from a refusal of a divisional court (Pollock, B., and Day, J.), to set aside the service of the writ in this action upon a person named Koppel. The action was brought against the defendant firm (in the firm name) as acceptors of certain bills of exchange. The defendant firm carried on business abroad and had no place of business in England; all the partners were resident and domiciled abroad. In June, 1890, the plaintiff served the writ upon Koppel (who was temporarily in England), alleging that he was one of the partners in the firm. On July 3 an appearance was entered on behalf of Koppel, the words "but who denies that he is a partner" being added to the ordinary form of appearance. At the same time Koppel took out a summons to set aside the service. On July 4 he took out a summons asking for security for costs. On July 21 the Divisional Court made an order refusing to set aside the service of the writ, striking out the appearance as being "conditional" (see Davies v. André, 38 W. R. 437, 24 Q. B. D. 598); and giving Koppel forty-eight hours in which to enter an unconditional appearance—which he accordingly did on July 23. Koppel now presented this appeal on behalf of himself alone against so much of the order as refused to set aside the service.

French, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for Koppel.—The court below decided upon the preliminary objection that after service of the writ Koppel entered an appearance. But he appeared denying that he was a partner, and that is no appearance at all: Davies v. André. He was in a position of difficulty, as service upon him might affect other persons (the partners in the firm) with whom he had no time to communicate; he had no intention to submit to the jurisdiction. His action in the matter was a nullity: Hewitson v. Fabre, 36 W. R. 717, 21 Q. B. D. 6. There is no power under ord. 9, r. 6, to serve a foreign firm, the members of which are resident abroad, by serving one partner within the jurisdiction, Russell v. Cambefort, 37 W. R. 701, 23 Q. B. D. 526. That rule does not apply "to firms consisting of foreigners who have in no way become subject to the English Parliament," per Cotton, L.J., at p. 528 of 23 Q. B. D. If the plaintiff were to succeed, judgment would go against the firm, who had never been properly before the court: Jackson v. Litchfield, 30 W. R. 531, 8 Q. B. D. 474; Adam v. Townend, 14 Q. B. D. 103, 33 W. R. Dig. 165.

Bigham, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the plaintiffs.—The service is good against the firm; Koppel comes within the description "one or more of the partners" in ord. 9, r. 6. The service is good also against Koppel individually. Adam v. Townend does not decide that judgment cannot be signed against the individual partner who is served. Besides the consequences of service are not under consideration now; the sole question is as to the validity of the service.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—Lord ESHER, M.R., after stating the facts, continued:—The question raised in the action being one of the liability on a contract, is a question of personal liability ambulatory with the person, and is therefore a question, although it arises abroad between foreigners, which the English court must entertain if the defendants are personally brought according to the English law before the court. The writ is, on the face of it, one which the English court must entertain if it has been duly served. The question, therefore, is whether there has been such a service as, according to English law, brings the defendant in the action legally before the court as a defendant, the defendant in the action being the firm—that is to say, all the partners in the firm. The question cannot be satisfactorily determined without a close examination of the English procedure as to service of English writs. That the question is one of procedure is determined by this, that the writ is an English writ in respect of a matter over which the English court has jurisdiction if the writ is duly served. The service of the writ of the court is therefore a part of the procedure of the court. The procedure of the court as to service of its writ is contained in the rules and orders made under the Judicature Acts. In order to determine whether they can be applied to, and if "yes" their effect on, the particular case in question, it seems valuable to consider their bearing on other cases which are beyond question within them and governed by them.

First, then, I will take the case of a writ issued against a defendant, an English subject found in England. The writ must be served, or that done which is equivalent to service (order 9). If the person attempted to be served desires to submit that there was no proper service he must move to set aside the alleged service. But he must do so before he appears, because if he has appeared, any irregularity in the service is waived by his appearance (ord. 12, r. 30). If the service is not impeached, the person served, the defendant, may appear or not. If he appears he may defend by alleging he never was liable—that is, that he never ought to have been made a defendant; if that turns out to be so, the defendant succeeds. If the person served does not appear, the plaintiff files an affidavit of service of the writ on the defendant named in it and verifies the writ indorsed according to ord. 9, r. 15, the affidavit of service alleging a service on A. B. as defendant according to ord. 13, r. 2. Upon such affidavit, judgment is entered against the alleged defendant for default of appearance.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is obvious from this statement that a judgment for default of appearance is procured solely upon assertions of the plaintiff. He asserts a service on the defendant against whom he obtains such judgment. If there has been a service, however irregular, the defendant is bound by the judgment, unless the court sets aside the service for particular reasons. It may be, however, that the affidavit of service, either by mistake or fraud, is erroneous, and that in truth the defendant was not served at all. Nevertheless the judgment is good against the defendant named in it until it is set aside; the defendant must move to set it aside (ord. 27, r. 15); of course, in the suggested case, it will be set aside with costs.

I will next consider a case equally beyond question governed by the rules and orders, the case of an action against the partners of an English firm in England, where this court has general jurisdiction over the cause of action. The mode and manner in which the court will exercise the jurisdiction is matter of procedure regulated by the rules and orders. By them the partners may be sued in the name of their firm (ord. 16, r. 14); the partners, therefore, are sued, although the firm is, as it were, defendant on the face of the writ. The service of the writ is regulated by ord. 9, r. 6. If the writ is against the firm it shall be served "on one or more of the partners, or at the place within the jurisdiction of business of the partnership upon any person having at the time of service the control or management of the partnership business there, and such service shall be deemed good service on the firm." The last word "firm" in the rule obviously includes all the partners in the firm. All the partners, therefore, shall be deemed to have been served. This is made, if possible, more clear by the rule as to appearance in such case. In case of such a writ and such service each and every partner shall appear individually in his own name (ord. 12, r. 15). This rule could not have been made except on the assumption that each and every partner is to be deemed to have been served. If a person specifically served as a partner desires to allege that the service is wrong, he must, before appearing, move under ord. 12, r. 30. But the only question then is whether the service was regularly made in the prescribed manner. If it was, the person served must appear absolutely, or will not appear. If he appears he will defend, and his defence will be entertained; he can plead that he was not a partner, or that the firm was not liable. If he does not appear, the plaintiff will proceed to obtain judgment for default of appearance, as in the case of a single defendant. The plaintiff will verify the writ and make an affidavit of service. The writ will disclose an action against the firm. The affidavit will assert service on the firm by means of service on A. B. as partner. Such service being deemed to be service on the firm, the judgment following the writ will be judgment against the firm for default of appearance; execution will without more be against the property of the firm, and against the person who has, according to the affidavit of service, been actually served as a partner. But other persons alleged to be partners must be brought in according to ord. 42, r. 10. In the same way as in the case of an individual defendant, if the affidavit of service is, by mistake or fraud, erroneous to this extent, that in truth the person alleged to have been served as a partner of the firm has not been served at all, the court will, on the application of the firm or of the person alleged to have been actually served, set aside the judgment and all proceedings.

If the writ is against the firm it may be served otherwise than on a partner—if there be a place of business within England and a manager there, then the writ may be served there on such manager. If the writ is so served, it is deemed to be service on the firm. There is no rule which says that the person so served, and served in that character, can appear in his own name. Ord. 12, r. 15, excludes him; he is not a partner, and, therefore, not a defendant. Partners who have left their business to be managed by such a person must accept the consequences of his omitting to inform them of the service of the writ on him. In case of such a service, and no appearance by a partner, the plaintiff could, upon proper affidavits, obtain judgment as for default of appearance against the firm.

I will next consider the more delicate case of a writ issued against a foreigner not domiciled or resident in England, but found in England. In certain cases the English court will entertain and determine a cause against a foreigner neither resident nor domiciled in England. Whether the cause of action is one which the English court can entertain as a cause of action will appear by the writ. If the writ is unobjectionable, the court has the general jurisdiction over it. How is the court to exercise such jurisdiction? It must proceed in it according to its own laws of procedure. The writ must be served, or that done which is equivalent to service. If the writ can be served in England it can, according to the rules and orders, be served without leave. If the foreigner is in England the service can be on him without leave. Then it must be served according to the rules and orders, and with all the effects of such service as regulated by the rules and orders. The whole procedure and all its results will correspond exactly with all the steps and their results which have been described in the first case of a writ issued against an English subject served on him in England. This is not denied. If follows from it that the English procedure can be exercised against a foreigner temporarily in England, although neither resident nor domiciled in England. His case is governed by the procedure of the English court.

If the foreigner thus sued is not found in England, or, indeed, if an English subject sued in England is not in England, the English laws of procedure could not be exercised outside the territorial jurisdiction of England by an English court, unless the court were authorized to do so by an English Act of Parliament which it was bound to obey. The writ must be one with regard to a cause of action which the English court can entertain. Can the English court serve such a writ abroad, first, on an English subject, secondly, on a foreigner. Ord. 11, r. 1, is a direct enactment that the court can give leave to serve its writ abroad. The cases in which it can are exhaustively included in order 11. But in those cases it can. It is only by virtue of that rule being equivalent to an enactment that the court can give such leave. Whether such enactment is strictly within international comity is a question which no English court can entertain. The order binds the court.

The order is conclusive that, to the extent to which it goes, the court must exercise its jurisdiction over a foreigner neither resident nor domiciled in England. The forms 5 and 6 in appendix A. and the N.B. to form 5 support, if necessary, the view that by English Act of Parliament a foreigner sued by a writ issued from an English court is, in certain cases enumerated in order 11, liable to be proceeded against in enforcement of that writ by the English enacted rules and orders, it being true, however, that only enacted rules and orders could be used against him. But if the order 11 is effective against him, it seems absurd to say that the enacted rules made for the purpose of giving effect to the service of a writ served under that order do not bind him. Otherwise, the leave given under order 11 would be futile. If, therefore, the leave is given under order 11, and the service is effected, then all the effects enacted by the other rules and orders must have the same force against the defendant so served as against a defendant served in England. The plaintiff may on proper affidavits obtain judgment for default with all its consequences. In case of mistake or fraud, and in all respects, the court would deal with such judgment precisely in the same manner as with any other judgment signed for default of appearance.

We now come to the case of foreign partners of a foreign firm, sued in an English court, the partners being all abroad, none of them resident or domiciled in England. If the partners were each and all sued by name, it is difficult, I think impossible, to say otherwise than that each of them would be subject to the procedure and rules and orders just previously described. Each of them would be within order 11, and, therefore, within the consequent or consequential rules. If their case is within some of the rules, they must, I think, be within all the rules. There is no distinction made between the rules. They are all rules made for the same ultimate purpose—namely, for the purpose of enforcing the writ of the court. They are all rules of procedure adapted to different cicumstances, but with one ultimate purpose. If so, the rules as to the form of the writ and as to its service must have the same effect in the case of foreign partners as in the case of a foreign individual. Then the foreign partners, in the case in which an English writ can issue, may in such writ be sued by their firm name. The court may, under order 11, give leave that the writ may be served abroad. If the writ may be served abroad, the reasoning which led to the conclusion that all the rules subsequent to the service must apply to an individual who might by leave be served abroad, will lead to the same conclusion with regard to a firm which by such leave may be served abroad. It follows that service on one partner abroad is service on the firm and on all the partners of the firm. If one partner is served and he appears, his appearance is that of the firm. If he does not appear, judgment for default of appearance will be entered against the firm. In case of mistake, or fraud, or other circumstances, the same relief or indulgence will be given as in all other cases of judgment for default of appearance. And if one of the foreign partners be found in England, service may be effected on him without leave. Order 11 is not then called into play. But the other orders and rules apply, and service on that partner is service on the firm and on all the other partners, with all the consequent results. As to this last case, the case of Pollexfen v. Sibson, 34 W. R. 534, 16 Q. B. D. 792, is absolutely in point. The reasoning of the judges in that case seems to me to be the same as the reasoning more elaborately set forth in this judgment. Davies v. André is, I think, an authority that service in England on a foreign partner found in England is a good service on the foreign firm. The question directly decided was, that a conditional appearance was no appearance at all. That the service was good service was not disputed. The case of Russell v. Cambefort is hardly consistent with all the reasoning of this judgment. But in it the case of Pollexfen v. Sibson was not overruled. Russell v. Cambefort raises for the present, in my opinion, an exception as to the application of the second part of ord. 9, r. 6, to the service of a sufficient writ in the prescribed manner on a foreign firm where all the partners in it are foreigners abroad.

I have gone elaborately into all the cases to which the rules and orders are applicable in order to show how I construe those rules. If my view is right, the present case is simple. The service on the person alleged by the plaintiffs to be a partner could not at any time have been set aside. It certainly cannot be set aside now that he has appeared unconditionally. He can proceed to make his defence. What that defence may be, what questions may arise with regard to it, I think it unnecessary now to suggest.

Again, it has been said that no foreign court would enforce in its own country a judgment obtained in this country under the rules and orders in the manner above described. That may be so as to the partners not actually served and as to their share in the partnership property. It hardly seems that it would be so as to the property or share of the partner who has actually been served. All these questions do not seem to me to arise yet in the present case. But, supposing that the judgment would be ineffectual abroad, it may well stand as a valid judgment in this country effectual against any partnership or personal property which may hereafter come into this country.

I have the strongest opinion that the rules and orders as to the service of writs abroad should be at once revised.

The appeal, in my opinion, should be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgment which is about to be read by Bowen, L.J., and in which I concur. I only, therefore, add a few words on my own account. When a firm's name is used it is only a convenient method for denoting those persons who compose the firm at the time when the name is used; and a plaintiff, who sues partners in the name of their firm, in truth sues them individually just as much as if he had set out all their names. Now, if one of those partners is out of the jurisdiction, the mode of proceeding against him is under order 11, and the necessity for proceeding against him under order 11 exists whether he is sued by name or as one of the firm under order 9. That is the ratio decidendi of the Court of Appeal in Russell v. Cambefort, and is, in my judgment, right. That case is inconsistent with some other decisions which will be alluded to presently by Bowen, L.J. Practically it comes to this, as I understand it, that if a member of a firm is resident abroad, the prudent way is to proceed against all the partners by name, or against all who are in this country, and not to attempt to proceed under order 9, and sue them in the name of the firm, which will lead to trouble in getting judgment and future execution, and had better be avoided. The order appealed from should be varied, as the Lord Justice will state.

BOWEN, L.J.—The contracts here sued upon are foreign contracts made and to be performed abroad, the contracting parties on both sides are wholly resident and domiciled abroad, having no place of business, and so far as appears no joint assets, in this country. But a person who is alleged to be one of the partners of the firm being temporarily and accidentally in England has been served with a writ issued against the firm in the firm name, and served upon himself "as partner." This person, to whom I hereafter allude as the defendant, has appeared, but objects to the writ and asks us to set it aside altogether as null and void, and not warranted by the rules.

The first question which arises is whether such service is good service as against the "firm" within the meaning of ord. 9, r. 6. The second question will be whether, assuming the writ as against the firm to be misexpressed, it is not (after the defendant's appearance) to be held good as against himself, the case of the plaintiffs being that the defendant is a partner in the firm, without proof of which fact they cannot succeed. If the writ in its present form, and the service of it, are to be held valid as against the firm, the judgment entered, if the plaintiffs were to prove successful in the action, would be in form a judgment against the firm (ord. 12, r. 15), a judgment which in such a shape would not be recognized by any other country, since the firm are not within the English jurisdiction. It is contrary to the doctrines of international law that a judgment should have any validity except against such persons as are or as have been brought within the jurisdiction of the court that gives it, and as the other members of the foreign firm do not come within this category, a judgment against the entire foreign firm's property would be useless abroad, and unjust both abroad and here.

Upon such a ground it has been urged before us that it was never intended by ord. 9, r. 6, to deal with actions against foreign firms, the members of which are wholly resident abroad, but that the procedure which governs such actions is indicated by order 11 so far as concerns service of writs out of the jurisdiction. In opposition to this view the plaintiff's counsel have contended before us that ord. 9, r. 6, applies to actions against all firms, foreign and English alike, whether the members of such firms are or are not resident abroad—that the rules are not necessarily intended to be confined within doctrines of international law, and are competent to prescribe how actions should be tried against all persons outside or inside the jurisdiction—and, lastly, that ord. 9, r. 6, has, in effect, prescribed what procedure should be adopted both as respects foreign firms and English.

I do not think that the field is open to me to discuss the broad and important subject upon principle, apart from authority. The case of Russell v. Cambefort was a case which arose under the same rule and order, although the service in that case was effected not on a partner, but on a manager of the partnership business. The judgment of the Court of Appeal was, however, based expressly on the view that ord. 9, r. 6, was not intended to govern writs directed against foreign firms, none of whose partners were resident or domiciled in England, and I do not think we should be carrying out the real view of the law so laid down if we were to seek to distinguish the case of service effected on a partner under one portion of the rule from that of service effected on a manager under the other portion of it. We are, therefore, I think, bound to apply the same reasoning to both cases, and, this being so, we ought to hold, on the authority of Russell v. Cambefort, that the present writ is incorrectly issued against the firm, and cannot be justified as against the firm by ord. 9, r. 6. It follows that O'Neil v. Clason, 46 L. J. Q. B. 191, Pollexfen v. Sibson, and Shepherd v. Hirsch, Pritchard, & Co., if really inconsistent with that decision, must not be followed. It must not be supposed that our decision implies that no remedy can be had against foreign firms or such of their members as happen to come within the jurisdiction. The law as to suing and serving them will remain what it always has hitherto been, though the writs cannot, under ord. 9, r. 6, be addressed against them in the foreign firm's name. The old course will be still pursued—namely, to insert in the writ the names of the partners whom it is desired to sue, and such writ so framed may be served on any of the partners who are found within the jurisdiction. For service out of the jurisdiction recourse must be had to order 11 if the case is one which can be brought within the rules of that order.

The law as to actions against foreign firms being thus, according to the effect of our present decision, wholly unaltered and unaffected by ord. 9, r. 6, it becomes necessary to apply ourselves to the second question in this case—viz., whether, as against the defendant who has appeared, the writ should be set aside on the ground of its being directed against his firm, and it appears to me that as against the defendant the service of the writ must, under the circumstances, be upheld. The defendant is not the less intended to be sued because he is intended to be sued with others who, with him, are misnamed, and who, together with him, are intended to be comprehended (though, as we have seen, irregularly) in one firm name. The writ is no doubt irregular in that it uses a single firm name to describe the defendant and others who are beyond the jurisdiction. This irregularity as regards the firm must be set right. What has been writ short must be writ large, for the plaintiff is not entitled to the benefit of ord. 9, r. 6, nor to the advantage of proceeding further as against the firm in the firm name. But the defendant is really himself sued together with others, since the plaintiff intends to include him, and to show at the trial that he is properly included, among the members of the firm, and the irregularity of the nomenclature in the writ the defendant has waived as against himself by appearance, since he might, if he had chosen, have moved under ord. 12, r. 30, to set aside the service upon himself, and was not obliged to appear to enable himself to move.

The service, therefore, must stand as against himself, if the plaintiffs elect to amend the writ in ten days, so as to state that the defendant is sued together with the other alleged members of the firm, who should be named separately, and when this amendment has been made the parties will be left to take such further steps, if any, in respect of the progress of the action as they may be advised, if any steps can be lawfully taken against the remaining defendants beyond the jurisdiction, as to which I offer no opinion at present. The defendant will be entitled in his defence, if the action proceeds, to avail himself of any defence open at law or equity to a defendant who is sued, together with other persons beyond the jurisdiction, on an alleged liability which he disputes.

The costs here and below will, in such a case, be costs in the cause.

If the plaintiffs do not so elect in ten days, the writ must be set aside, and the plaintiffs must pay all costs down to and including the costs of the appeal.

In conclusion, in addition to what has been said by the Master of the Rolls, I desire to express an opinion, formed after some experience and observation, of the necessity of re-drafting the rules under the Judicature Act so far as they affect partnerships.

In re WHITELEY AND ROBERTS' ARBITRATION. (a.)

Arbitration—Setting aside award—Misconduct—Admission—Evidence—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 11 (2).

On a motion to set aside an award, on the ground of the misconduct of the arbitrator, it was alleged that he had been bribed. The only evidence of the truth of this allegation adduced at the hearing was that of witnesses who had heard the arbitrator himself admit the fact in a conversation, at which R. (the other party to the arbitration) was not present.

Held, that the admission was not sufficiently proved to enable the court to set aside the award as against R.

Motion.

The question was whether misconduct on the part of an arbitrator could be proved by evidence of admissions made by him after the award without calling him as a witness.

The motion asked that an award might be set aside upon the ground that the arbitrator had misconducted himself by acting in collusion with the defendant Roberts (the other party to the arbitration), and by accepting, or agreeing to accept, money from Roberts, or some other person in his behalf, as an inducement to fraudulently make his award in favour of Roberts; and that the award had been improperly procured through such fraudulent conduct.

The evidence at the hearing was taken vivâ voce, and the plaintiff's witnesses alleged that in a conversation, which took place after the award, and in the absence of Roberts, the arbitrator Clough had said that he had made enough out of the arbitration to keep him for a twelvemonth. There was no other evidence of misconduct.

Before calling any witnesses the defendant Roberts took the objection that no evidence of misconduct on the part of the arbitrator had been adduced except his admission in the alleged conversation, and that that admission was not evidence against Roberts, as it was not made in his presence.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Waggett, for the motion.—The arbitrator has misconducted himself, and the award has been improperly obtained within the Act of 1889, s. 11 (2). It ought to be set aside.

Warmington, Q.C., and Dare, for Roberts.—There is no evidence against Roberts of any misconduct on the part of the arbitrator. He has not been called as a witness. In fact he has made an affidavit denying it.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Waggett.—If the arbitrator has gone so far wrong as to justify the court in setting aside the award, the court will act upon any admission by him: Mills v. The Society of Bowyers, 3 K. & J. 66; Earl v. Stocker, 2 Vern. 251; Morgan v. Mather, 2 Ves. Jun. 15.

Warmington, Q.C., in reply on the authorities.—The admission must be made to the court. In all those cases it was on the record.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is somewhat strange that, notwithstanding the industry of counsel, no case has been found bearing directly on this point, which is of some importance and must have occurred before. It is desirable to show how the question arises. The applicant says that the arbitrator arrived at an unjust conclusion because he was bribed by Roberts. In support of that he brings forward a variety of circumstances intended to show a probability that such a thing took place, or, at any rate, that it would be consistent with those facts that it took place, but his only piece of direct evidence is this. He called several witnesses to prove that on the 23rd of October the arbitrator himself expressed himself in language which can be interpreted fairly enough to mean that he had been bribed by Roberts. I have not heard the argument on the part of Roberts or Clough on the meaning of those words, and need not express any opinion on their meaning, nor would it be convenient now to criticize the conduct of the witnesses who swore to them. So I assume that they are stating what occurred, and that what occurred was an admission by Clough from which the conclusion would follow that the award was corrupt. The question is, Is that admission by Clough sufficient to call upon Roberts to answer Whiteley's charge? Is there any evidence to go to a jury. As a rule, an admission by any one party, though it can be adduced as evidence against himself, cannot be adduced as evidence against any other party, and that rule stands on common sense and legal principles. There are well known exceptions to the rule, which may be classed under two heads. The first is when the party against whom the admission is sought to be read has a joint interest with the party whose admission is sought to be read. That is on the principle that persons seised jointly are each seised of the whole of the subject-matter, so that an admission by one joint-owner is an admission by the owner of the whole. That is an application of a rule of real property law to other matters. The other exception is where the party against whom the admission is sought to be used, derives title to what he claims in the subject-matter from the person who made the admission—as, for instance, where it is sought to read against the heir an admission by his ancestor. He stands in the shoes of the person who made the admission, and derives his title through him, so it is only fair that he should be bound by the admissions of the person through whom he claims. With these two exceptions the rule, so far as I am aware, is absolute. Why should admissions by an arbitrator form any exception to the rule? Apart from authority, it is put rather on the necessities of life. It would be, to use the term of Lord Commissioner Wilson, a "melancholy" thing if this could not be done, but one must have regard to the great danger of introducing such an exception. If the argument of Whiteley were admitted any arbitrator might, not only immediately after the award, but at any time afterwards, say, perhaps for insufficient reasons, that he had been bribed, and the person against whom the award was made could apply to set it aside. Of course, there are rules as to the time within which an application can be made for that purpose, but the court has power to extend the time for doing so, and it might be very difficult to resist such an application where the allegation was of gross misconduct. It would introduce uncertainty into the law.

Is there any authority for the exception? Two or three cases were cited, but none go exactly to the point, and it is difficult to extract any principle from them. The most direct authority is the case of Mills v. The Society of Bowyers. There, no doubt, Wood, V.C., attributed great importance to an admission by the arbitrator. The admission in that case was of a mistake, and he pointed out that the admission was absolutely necessary. He referred to two cases, and stated that there the arbitrators admitted by affidavit the mistake they had made. The Vice-Chancellor further said that in the case before him he thought he had an admission on the part of the arbitrators that they had made a mistake, and he seems to have thought, by reference to those cases and on general principles, that he must have such an admission.

But I am bound, under that judgment, to turn to the special facts of the case, and see the meaning of his judgment. There was a contest between the parties whether the award had proceeded on a proper basis. Affidavits were filed on both sides showing the principle on which the award was made, and it was alleged that the umpire had improperly held communication with the agents of the company. Then I understand that the umpire himself made an affidavit, and there was a conflict of evidence. The Vice-Chancellor referred to the arbitrator's affidavit as containing admissions of mistake, and relied on that; so that I cannot necessarily consider that the Vice-Chancellor said, "I can set aside the award on the admission of the arbitrator," but, "even though the impropriety is proved by other evidence, I cannot set aside the award without the evidence of the arbitrator." There were only two other cases cited, and in the paucity of authority I ought to notice them. There was the old case of Earl v. Stocker, which there is some little difficulty in understanding, because one has not the ordinary facts, but I must take it that the admission of the arbitrators was in some way a matter of record, so that it was an admission made to the court. They had confessed it by their answer. Without more, that could only be read against the arbitrators themselves, but it was read against other parties as well. No other case has been cited which lays down that if arbitrators confess, even by answer, to improper motives, that that should operate against the award and enable the parties to set it aside.

The only other case referred to is Morgan v. Mather, where, at p. 18, Lord Commissioner Wilson says:—"The only grounds for setting aside awards are, first, that the arbitrators have awarded what was out of their power; secondly, corruption, or that they have proceeded contrary to the principles of natural justice, though there is no corruption, as if, without reason, they will not hear a witness." Those are matters which would have to be proved; and, thirdly, the case which Wood, V.C., dealt with in Mills v. Society of Bowyers, "that they have proceeded upon mere mistake, which they themselves admit."

That entirely agrees with what the Vice-Chancellor says. Where you are dealing with a mistake you must not be contented with conflicting evidence, but must have the admission of the arbitrator. Here was a case where it could not possibly be proved to the satisfaction of the court, as regards the domestic tribunal, so as to enable the court to adjudicate on the validity of the award without the admission of the arbitrator. The mistake is in his own mind, and if he does not himself confess it the court must hold that there was no mistake at all. The case shows what the value of admissions is, and why the admission of the arbitrator is of such value.

It was argued that he could not give evidence of his own misconduct. But that was argued in the case of Duke of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R. 5 H. L. 418, and the matter was gone into fully. Lord Cairns says:—"It appears to me that upon every point which may be considered to be a matter of fact with reference to the making of the award the evidence of the arbitrator or umpire was properly admissible. He was properly asked what had been the course which the argument before him had taken, what claims were made, and what claims were admitted, so that we might be put in possession of the history of the litigation before the umpire up to the time when he proceeded to make his award. But there, it appears to me, the right of asking questions of the umpire ceased." If you desire to prove a mistake you may call the umpire to show what circumstances were brought before the umpire which ought not to have been brought before him, and you must call him and get his evidence, he being the person best qualified to give it. Beyond that you must not ask him as to the award itself, but that does not exclude his evidence in a case like this. It does not exclude questions as to what occurred before the umpire, or the circumstances on which the award is founded. This question is outside the award, whether or not the arbitrator was bribed. You can call him to prove that, and no objection can be taken to his evidence. That shows that, although there may be difficulty in proving such a fact, there is no legal difficulty in doing so; and that is a reason why one should rely on the ordinary rule, and say, if a man comes here to establish a case of fraud, he must prove that fraud, or otherwise his case fails.

The point is new, and there seems to be no direct authority upon it; but, on principle and such authority as there is, I think the objection is good, and a mere admission such as is stated will not suffice to prove fraud on the part of the arbitrator, and that the motion fails as against Roberts.

[The plaintiffs declined to go on with the case against the arbitrator alone, and the motion was refused, with costs.]

HARRISON, AINSLIE, & CO. v. CORPORATION OF BARROW-IN-FURNESS. (a.)

Lease—Covenant not to assign—Manufacturing purposes—Corporation—Person of responsibility and respectability.

A lease of land, with an iron furnace and mill and certain water rights for the purpose of working the same, contained a covenant on the part of the lessees not to assign or underlet without the consent in writing of the lessors, "such consent not to be unreasonably refused, or refused to a person of responsibility and respectability." The lessees agreed with the Corporation of Barrow-in-Furness to assign to them, and the corporation agreed with the lessees not to use the water rights for manufacturing iron or steel. The lessors refused to consent to the assignment, on the ground that the corporation could not use the premises for the purposes they were intended.

Held, that the corporation was not, under the terms of the lease, "a person of responsibility and respectability" within the meaning of the covenant therein, and that the consent had not been unreasonably withheld.

By a lease dated January 6, 1886, the plaintiffs, Harrison, Ainslie, & Co., who were iron manufacturers, leased from the trustees, under the will of William Laurey Rawlinson, certain premises with an iron furnace and bobbin mill thereon, situate at Duddon Bridge, in the county of Cumberland, together with the dams, sluices, and water courses connected therewith, for fourteen years from May 12, 1885, at an annual rent of £25. In the lease was contained a covenant by the lessees not to assign or underlet the premises or any part (except the mill and other buildings) without the previous consent in writing of the lessors. The covenant then proceeded "but such consent shall not be unreasonably refused or refused to a person of responsibility and respectability." The lease also contained a covenant by the lessees to repair and yield up the premises in substantial and tenantable repair at the expiration of the term.

For a period of more than twenty years before the grant of the lease the furnace and mill had not been worked. The plaintiffs themselves had no intention of working them. On June 3, 1889, Harrison, Ainslie, & Co. agreed with the defendants, the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Barrow-in-Furness, to assign to them the lease in consideration of a premium of £570, and they also agreed to withdraw their opposition to a Bill then before Parliament by which the corporation sought power to impound the waters of the River Duddon, and to obtain all necessary licences for the assignment of the lease. The corporation, on their side, agreed not to use the waters of the River Duddon for or in connection with the manufacture of iron or steel at any place without the water limits of the corporation. The Bill was in fact not passed.

On June 5 an application was made by the plaintiffs to the solicitors of the lessors for the requisite consent to the assignment, and on October 7 the lessors definitely declined to give it, on the ground that the proposed assignees were a corporation who were not taking the lease for the purposes it was granted, and might use it prejudicially to the lessors. By their claim the plaintiffs averred that the consent was unreasonably withheld, and that consequently they were entitled to assign it without licence, and claimed a declaration to that effect, and specific performance by the corporation of the agreement to take the lease. The defendants (inter alia) pleaded that it was ultrà vires of the corporation to take the lease.

Haldane, Q.C., and Fellows, for the plaintiffs.—The reasons given for withholding consent are insufficient, as they contemplate future injury. The lessors will be amply protected under the covenants in the lease. "Person" in that lease includes corporation (Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 2, xvii.), and it cannot be suggested that this corporation is not a responsible one. The consent has, therefore, been unreasonably withheld: Treloar v. Bigge, 22 W. R. 843, L. R. 9 Ex. 151; Sear v. The House Property and Investment Co. (Limited), 29 W. R. 192, 16 Ch. D. 387. There is nothing ultrà vires in the corporation taking the lease: Riche v. The Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. (Limited), 23 W. R. 7, L. R. 9 Ex. 224; Jesus College v. Gibbs, 1 Y. & C. Ex. 145; Vigers v. Dean of St. Paul's, 18 L. J. Q. B. 97.

Wilkinson and Attwater, for the corporation.

Neville, Q.C., and Morshead, for the lessors.—The corporation is not "a person of responsibility and respectability" within the meaning of the covenant, as such a corporation cannot work an iron furnace or a mill, and the consent has therefore not been unreasonably withheld. The corporation has taken the lease to get rid of the opposition, not to use the premises as contemplated by the lease; indeed, there is a covenant by them not to use the water rights for manufacturing iron. Hence it was not unreasonable to withhold consent. It was not mere caprice which caused the lessors to refuse consent: Lechmann v. McArthur, 16 W. R. 877, L. R. 3 Ch. 496.

Haldane, Q.C., replied.

ROMER, J.—This is an action for specific performance of an agreement for the sale and purchase of leasehold premises. The parties to the action are the vendors, who are the plaintiffs, the Corporation of Barrow-in-Furness, who are the purchasers, and the remaining defendants are the lessors. The premises in question are granted by a lease of the 6th of January, 1886, for a short term of years of an iron furnace and other premises, and certain rights to use the waters of the River Duddon, which flows close to the demised premises, for the iron works. Such being the lease, the agreement in this action was entered into under the following circumstances:—The defendant corporation were promoting a Bill in Parliament to enable them to take the waters of this river for the purposes of the borough. The lessees and lessors opposed the Bill, on the ground that, should the corporation acquire the powers which they sought by their Bill, the lessees and lessors would both be considerably injured. The corporation thereupon enters into an agreement of the 3rd of June, 1889, to buy the leasehold property belonging to the plaintiffs. There can be no doubt that the sole object was to buy off the plaintiffs' opposition to the Bill, an object apparent on the agreement and the admitted facts. Under that agreement the corporation purported to buy all the leasehold rights of the plaintiffs, and it contains a very important clause, the short effect of which is that the corporation were to bind themselves never to use any of the waters of the River Duddon for the purposes of using in connection with the manufacture of iron or steel at any place or places outside the water limits of the corporation. The result of that would be that the corporation could not use all the rights given to them as lessees, though the lease clearly contemplates the use of the waters by the lessee for the purpose of the manufacture of iron and steel. It is quite true that for a period prior to the date of the agreement the original lessees did not work the furnaces, but they could have resumed work at any moment if they had chosen, and they had never abandoned the idea of so doing, and the lessors could always look forward to that, whereas if the corporation became lessees that could never take place. Under these circumstances it struck the lessors that it was undesirable that they should give the licence to assign which was asked for. The provision in the lease is this. There is a covenant by the lessees with the lessors that the lessees will not, without the consent in writing of the lessors, assign or underlet the premises, "but such consent shall not be unreasonably refused, or refused to a person of responsibility and respectability." The reason given as a refusal was the circumstances I have stated. The defence, as amended, states that the defendants were entitled to refuse to give the licence to assign because the corporation were not able to become the assignees, as it was ultrà vires on their part to have entered into the agreement to purchase.

Now I have to decide, first, whether the corporation can be considered "a person of responsibility and respectability." No doubt, for many purposes, the word "person" includes corporation as, for example, for the purposes of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. But, looking at the particular lease, I have to decide whether the Corporation of Barrow-in-Furness falls within the definition of "a person of responsibility and respectability." I think not. The corporation cannot, under the terms of the lease, and in view of the facts, be said to come within the fair meaning of these words. Has, then, the consent of the lessors been unreasonably withheld. I think, on this point, that the plaintiffs have not shown or established that the lessors refused their consent unreasonably. I come to this conclusion because the lessors were fairly entitled to say that the corporation could not be a good tenant or assignee, because they could not use these water rights for working the furnace. The action will, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

Company—Misrepresentation—Prospectus—Materialty of statements.

Directors of a gold mining company issued a prospectus containing a statement that "full reports on the property have been prepared for the directors by eminent engineers" (naming them). None of the reports in question, however, had, in fact, been prepared on the instructions of the directors, or on their behalf, and one of the reports had, in fact, been prepared on the instructions of the agent of a vendor of the property. The value of the shares had greatly decreased.

In an action for damages brought against the directors by a person who had taken shares in the belief, induced by the prospectus, that the reports had been prepared on behalf of the directors,

Held, that the statement as to the reports in the prospectus was a material misstatement, and none the less material because the plaintiff adduced no evidence to show that the reports were in themselves inaccurate or exaggerated, and, consequently, that the defendants were liable in damages.

Trial of action.

This was an action claiming a declaration that the plaintiff was induced to take 2,000 shares of £1 each in the Valley Gold Co. (Limited), by alleged misrepresentations in a prospectus issued on the 27th of October, 1886, by the defendants as directors of that company, and for damages thereby incurred.

The company was registered in August, 1886, with the object of purchasing and working certain gold-bearing land in California.

After the plaintiff had taken shares, for which he paid £2,000, the company was reconstructed, the £1 shares being divided into 5s. shares, which had greatly decreased in value.

The prospectus stated that full reports (therein set forth) on the property had been "prepared for the directors" by four eminent engineers therein named.

It further stated that the engineers had personally inspected the property, that one of them had advised the board as to the means to be adopted for working and developing it to the best advantage, that the reports had convinced the directors that the estate was a rich one, and that the directors had no hesitation in recommending the shares to the public as a genuine investment.

The reports of the engineers had, in fact, been made before the defendants became directors, and had not been made for them, but on the instructions and on behalf of the London agent of the vendors to the company.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and T. R. Hughes, for the plaintiff.—The plain meaning of the words in the prospectus is that the directors had themselves employed the engineers to make the reports. This allegation is untrue and a material misstatement, and the defendants are therefore liable.

Rigby, Q.C., Asquith, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the defendants.

ROMER, J.—The plaintiff in this case is Mr. John Henry Angus. The defendants are four—Sir Charles Clifford, Mr. Thomas Meates, Mr. Nelson, and Mr. Lloyd. They were the directors, and the only directors, of a company called the Valley Gold Co. (Limited). The action is one for damages caused to the plaintiff, as he alleges, by his being induced to take shares in the company by a certain alleged untrue statement contained in a prospectus inviting subscriptions for shares in the company issued by, or by the authority of, the defendants. Now there is no question in this case that the defendants are responsible for the prospectus in question, and that, if the prospectus makes those who issued it liable for the statements contained in it, the defendants are liable accordingly. There is no question here that the plaintiff applied for shares in this company on the faith of the prospectus, and was allotted shares accordingly. Upon the evidence before me I think it is clear there has been some loss, at any rate, accruing to the plaintiff by reason of his having been induced to take those shares. The real question in issue in this action is as to whether certain statements, to which I will refer in a moment, were or were not, in fact, made and inserted under such circumstances in the prospectus, that the defendants are liable for the statements so contained. Now those statements are these:—"Full reports on the property have been prepared for the directors by the following eminent engineers." I may mention here that there is no question as to who the directors are; they are referred to by that statement because their names appear in the earlier portion of that prospectus, and they are the four defendants to this action. Then the prospectus proceeds by giving the names of the four eminent engineers—Messrs. Jackson, Pearson, Rodda, and Del Mar. Then follow these statements:—"These gentlemen have personally inspected the property, and Mr. Del Mar has advised the board as to the means to be adopted for working and developing the same to the best advantage. These reports have convinced the directors that the estate is a rich one, and they have no hesitation in recommending the shares to the public as a genuine investment."

Now the first question which arises is, What meaning would naturally be attributed to these statements by the ordinary reader? I think any ordinary reader would come to the conclusion that the mining engineers referred to had been instructed by the directors to report to them in the interest of the company as to the property to be purchased, so that they might see whether it was one that the company could be advised to purchase. That is how I, at least, should read these statements, and the impression which they would convey to me. But whether that be or be not their undoubted meaning, it clearly is a meaning which could be attributed to them.

Then the question arises, Did the plaintiff himself attribute such a meaning to the statements in question? The plaintiff has given his evidence in the box, and has been cross-examined. The result is he has established before me that he did attribute the meaning that I have given to these statements, and, acting in the belief that those statements had that meaning, he applied for the shares in question, and so had them allotted to him. He was not in any way shaken by cross-examination; he was a good witness, and I trust what he has said.

The next question which arises under the circumstances is this, Assuming these statements to have had the meaning attributed to them, were the statements true? Now I think, beyond any question, the statements were not true as to the reports of Messrs. Jackson, Pearson, and Rodda. Mr. Grosvenor Woods said, and said truly, that what the plaintiff chiefly relied upon were the statements so far as they referred to Mr. Del Mar's reports; and it is said on behalf of the defendants that, as applied to Mr. Del Mar's reports the statements were, at any rate, in some sense true, and evidence has been given by the defendants for that purpose. Upon the evidence I come to the conclusion that these statements, even as applied to Mr. Del Mar's report, are not true in any fair sense. When the defendants, who were all called and cross-examined, were asked to explain what meaning they attributed to these statements with regard to these reports, they were not able, to my satisfaction, to explain what meaning in fact they attributed to them themselves. One of them—the defendant, Mr. Lloyd—said, in effect, that the meaning to be attributed to the statements in question was that the reports of those engineers had been adopted on behalf of the directors, or by the directors. Another defendant, Sir Charles Clifford, after stating that he attached no meaning whatever to these words used so far as concerned the report of Messrs. Jackson, Pearson, and Rodda, said that, with regard to the first report of Mr. Del Mar he attributed the meaning to it that Mr. Del Mar had been instructed by the promoters to make that report, so as to give information to the proposed directors. I also listened to the evidence of the other two defendants, and the result I have come to is this—that I do not think that the defendants themselves, as I have said, can give any satisfactory explanation of what they did mean by the statements in question as applied to these two reports. But one thing I think is clear. Mr. Del Mar's reports were not prepared on the instructions of the defendants, nor on their behalf, nor in the interest of the company as purchasers. In fact, there is no evidence of any kind against that, except, possibly, some few observations of the defendant, Mr. Meates, in the witness-box.

Having regard to what Mr. Meates said in his answers to interrogatories, and to his demeanour in the box, I am bound to say I do not rely on Mr. Meates' statement that I am referring to. I wish to deal with Mr. Meates as gently as I can, and I would only say that in the witness box he was somewhat too anxious to defend himself. Bearing the whole evidence in mind, I think it is clear beyond any question that the first report of Mr. Del Mar was not prepared, as I have said, on the instructions of the defendants, or on their behalf, or in the interests of the company, and I also think that, with regard to the second report, although there is a little more evidence with regard to it, that report also was in no true sense made at the suggestion of the defendants, or at their request, or on their behalf, or, in other words, that that second report stands on any different footing from the first report. The only evidence which would tend to show that that second report stood on a different footing from Mr. Del Mar's first report was the evidence of Mr. Nelson and Mr. Meates, which, when examined, only came to this, that they deposed to certain conversations which they had had with Mr. Del Mar with regard to the property. In fact, with regard to most of the defendants, it is clear that they did not finally resolve even to become directors until after both the reports of Mr. Del Mar had been sent in.

Now Mr. Del Mar has not been called on behalf of the defendants in this case; but I gather that, in making these reports, he was acting, to a certain extent at any rate, in the interests of the vendor. I gather that from the whole evidence, and also—because it is clear from the evidence that certainly he was so far assisting those interested with the vendors, and in the promotion of the company—that he was trying in their behalf to procure directors for this company. It also appears by the evidence that he was instructed to make his reports to the vendors' agents in this country, Messrs. Beachcroft & Gordon, and was to be paid by them. They, and not the directors, were his employers. It is true that the reports purported to be addressed to the directors of the company, which by this time was not formed. At the time these reports were made there were no directors of the company, in fact, constituted or even finally agreed upon; and I have come to the conclusion that they were addressed in that way because undoubtedly Mr. Del Mar thought of submitting these reports to certain persons with a view of inducing them to become directors of the company. These reports of Mr. Del Mar, in my judgment, were not prepared for the directors of this company in any true sense—in any fair sense—perhaps I may say in any sense except that in which any vendor's expert making a report for the benefit of his employer may contemplate the fact that his reports may be used for the purpose of inducing persons to become shareholders in a company to be formed by the vendor to purchase the property. In that sense and no other could Mr. Del Mar's reports be considered to be prepared for the directors. In my judgment also it is not, on the evidence, true that Mr. Del Mar advised the board as to the means to be adopted for working and developing the property to the best advantage.

The result is that, in my opinion, these statements which have been relied upon by the plaintiff in this case are not true, and I think the defendants were not justified in allowing them to be inserted in the prospectus. In fact, looking at the circumstances stated by some of the defendants in the box under which the prospectus was allowed to go out, I think it is clear that no proper care was taken by the defendants with regard to the statements contained in that prospectus.

The next question that I have to consider is, whether the statements are material. In my judgment, they are material. I think that any person who is considering the statements in a prospectus given by experts as to the nature of the property to be acquired by the company and worked by the company, would be very much influenced by considering in whose interest and by whose instructions the reports were prepared. Looking at the question as men of business, there is no one who knows the affairs of life, I think, who would not say that, either as to the reports on the value and the nature of a property by experts or as to the valuation of a property by experts, it is material to know on whose behalf they were acting in considering a question as between vendor and purchaser. I suppose, theoretically, it ought not to make any difference on whose behalf an expert is employed to report on or value a property. If experts were perfect men, and could be relied on to make reports as if they were calculating machines, of course it would be immaterial; but in the practical affairs of life it does make a very considerable difference by whom an expert is employed. For example, could anyone say that it made no difference in considering the price to be paid for a property whether that price was fixed by a valuer for the vendor or by a valuer for the purchaser? Of course it does. In the ordinary course, would any prudent purchaser choose to buy a property at the valuation of a valuer instructed by the vendor and acting for the vendor. I think not, and vice versa. Therefore it appears to me that it was a very material thing for the plaintiff to know, in a case like the present, when he applied for shares, whether the reports to which his attention was called by the prospectus, putting it substantially, were reports given by experts employed by the vendor or experts employed by the purchaser. In my judgment, therefore, the statements in question were material, and did influence the plaintiff, as appears by his testimony in the box.

But then it was said that the statements ceased to be material because the plaintiff had not taken upon from the general district rate account. No part of this sum of £8,404 was a receipt in respect of water rates, rents, or charges, or of a rate in aid, nor was any part of the sum supplied towards the working expenses, but it was applied partly to the payment of interest on capital borrowed for the construction of the works, and partly to the payment of instalments on loans.

The first item in the valuation prepared for the respondents—viz., that of £8,424—was arrived at by subtracting from the said sum of £8,404, the amount expended in respect of instalment of loan—viz., the sum of £5,680—and adding the balance of £2,724 to the said £5,700, thereby making the total £8,424, the amount which is alleged by the respondents to be necessary to pay working expenditure and interest on capital for the year. The question for the opinion of the court is, Which is the correct figure to adopt as the basis of the calculation for estimating the rateable value of the works—whether the said sum of £5,700 only, as the appellants say, or that amount increased by the said sum of £2,724, as the respondents say.

The appellants submit that the water rates and charges alone which are received by them form the proper basis for estimating the rateable value of the undertaking, that they have no power to make up any deficiency in the receipts to meet the expenses, outgoings, and liabilities of the works by a rate in aid, or to levy a public water rate; and if they have such power they have had no necessity to put it in force, nor have they done so. They also contend that the respondents are not entitled to bring any part of the district rate into account in estimating the net rateable value of the works, inasmuch as a hypothetical tenant could not draw upon the general district rate, or levy a rate in aid, and, therefore, could not have the benefit of such assistance.

The respondents contend that the water rates and charges alone do not represent the value of the water supplied to the district, and do not therefore, by themselves, form a proper basis for estimating the rateable value; that a local board or municipal corporation is on a different footing from a private company, inasmuch as such a company, in obtaining parliamentary powers for supplying water, will take care that their scale of charges is such as to secure a fair return for capital invested, while a local board may, for the purpose of giving the public a cheap suppy of water, be compelled to adopt a scale of water rate which is insufficient to meet current outgoings and rent, any deficiency being made up by a rate in aid, or by contributions out of the general district rates, and that a hypothetical tenant would be entitled to the same advantages, amongst them being that of raising loans, and paying the interest thereon out of the district rate.

If the court is of opinion that the contention of the appellants is right, then the rate is to be amended, and the rateable value of the undertaking is to stand at £2,624, as the rateable value thereof, being the amount at which the same is valued for rating purposes by the appellants; otherwise the present rateable value is to stand.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 25.—WILLIAMS, J., read the written judgment of the COURT, as follows:—The question in this case is whether or not a sum of £2,724 ought to be included in the receipts of the appellants for the purpose of calculating the net rateable value of the property. The answer to questions of this sort as to the rateable value of land occupied by corporations and companies for purposes of large undertakings for the service of the public is hardly ever of satisfactory character, having regard to the object of ascertaining the rateable value. It could hardly be expected to be so, seeing that the question, in effect, generally is, What is the proper conclusion to draw from given impossible hypothetical premises.

The sum of £2,724 is a portion of a sum of £8,404 6s. 8d. received by the appellants by transfer from the general district rate. Of the said sum of £8,404 6s. 8d., £5,680 was expended in respect of instalment of loan, and the £2,724 is the balance of the £8,404, which was received by the appellants and expended by them for purposes other than the instalment of loan. Now if this sum of £2,724 is to be treated as part of the money received by the appellants for the supply of water, then it would seem properly included in the receipts for the purpose of calculation of rateable value: see Dewsbury Waterworks Board v. Assessment Committee of Penistone Union; for if the £2,724 is received in payment for water supply it is equally a receipt of money available as an item of gross profit in arriving at the profit or debit balance.

Whether the money is received from the hands of the consumer, or by means of a rate in aid, or by means of an unconditional transfer of money from the general district rate, the only essential is that the money so received should be money potentially available to the hypothetical tenant as an item of gross profits. It is because the £5,680 was not so available to the hypothetical tenant, being appropriated to the repayment of capital expenditure, and, therefore, received by the appellants, not as hypothetical tenants, but as landlords, that this sum is properly, by common consent, not included in the receipts of the hypothetical tenant for the purpose of arriving at the annual value.

But although it may be conceded that when once money has been received, or is receivable, by the hypothetical tenant as such tenant, it must be included in the receipts for the purposes of the calculation of his anticipated profit, even though the profits when earned may be appropriated in the hands of the tenant to the liquidation of debts which are not his as hypothetical tenant, as was held in the Dewsbury case, yet the money must have been received by the tenant under conditions that make it potentially available to him as an item of gross profit. It is so available if the money is received as the price of water supplied, or as an unconditional aid augmenting the receipts of the tenant; but it is not so received if the tenant received the money on terms that he shall repay it—if he receives it, in short, by way of loan.

Now do the appellants receive this money as they would money raised by a rate in aid, as an unconditional aid, or do they receive it by way of loan, or otherwise on terms which render it not an item of gross profit? We are of opinion that, having regard to the terms of the 63rd section and the 71st section of the special Act of 1858, the money is received by the appellants by way of loan, and that it is not the less so received—or, at all events, on terms which prevent it being an item of gross profit—because the repayment is deferred and conditional on the happening of a contingency which may never happen—namely, the contingency of a balance standing to the credit of the waterworks account available for the repayment of moneys advanced out of the general district rates in accordance with the 6th appropriation of section 71.

We think, therefore, that the contention of the appellants is right, and that the £2,724 should not be included as a receipt of the tenant for the purpose of arriving at the rateable value.

BELLAMY v. DEBENHAM. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Contract contained in letters—Subsequent negotiation—Contract to sell freehold—Minerals found not to belong to vendor—Right of purchaser to rescind before time for completion—Rights of vendor to specific performance or damages on acquisition of minerals prior to time for completion—Damages.

D. offered by letter to purchase from B. (assuming the title to be satisfactory) the freehold of a house, with about a quarter of an acre of land, with possession at a fixed date (beyond which nothing was said about the time for completion), and B. accepted that offer by letter. B.'s solicitor subsequently attempted to introduce into the contract some additional terms, which, however, he ultimately abandoned. In the meantime, D.'s solicitor, having discovered that the minerals under the property, which was enfranchised copyhold, belonged to the lord of the manor, and not to the vendor, wrote that he could not advise his client to go on with the matter. D. adopted this advice of his solicitor, and neither of them ever receded from that position. Before the day fixed for delivery of possession, the lord had agreed to convey the minerals to the vendor, but they were not actually conveyed till more than two months after that day. The vendor had in the meantime commenced an action for specific performance and (alternatively) for damages for breach of contract.

Held, first, that, assuming (without deciding the question) that there was a concluded agreement, the purchaser was not bound to wait till the day fixed for delivery of possession, which, in the circumstances of this case, was the end of a reasonable time, for the completion of the contract, but was entitled to rescind the contract as soon as he found that the vendor had not got what he had contracted to sell; and held, that the contract was in fact so rescinded by the conduct of the defendant and his solicitor.

Held, secondly, that, as the plaintiff was not in a position to carry out his contract on the said day fixed for delivery of possession, he could not maintain an action for damages for breach of contract.

Whether he could have done so if he had been in a position to carry out his contract on that day, quære.

Appeal from North, J.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of North, J., dismissing an action for specific performance of a contract to purchase a freehold house and land known as "Effingham-place," and situate at Cheshunt.

Early in April, 1889, the defendant, Mr. Debenham, was negotiating by letter with Mr. Sanders, an agent of the plaintiff, as to a proposal for the purchase by the defendant of "Effingham-place," on behalf of the committee of a hospital.

On April 17, 1889, Mr. Debenham wrote to a Mr. Bridgman, an agent of the plaintiff, as follows:—

"Effingham-place.

"I am prepared myself to offer you £800 for the freehold, with possession at Midsummer, and run the risk of inducing the committee to take it off my hands. I am assuming, of course, that the title is satisfactory, and that all the ground now occupied with the house is included."

To this Mr. Bridgman replied on April 18:—"I am obliged by your letter of the 17th inst., and am instructed by Mr. Sanders to accept your offer of £800 for the freehold therein contained, subject to the owner's ratification, of which he entertains no doubt, and for which he will at once apply."

On April 25 the defendant wrote to Sanders:—"I have no wish to press you unduly, but I cannot allow my offer to stand over indefinitely, and as we have a committee meeting to-morrow evening, if I do not hear that the owners accept it before 5 p.m. to-morrow, I must consider myself at liberty to withdraw it."

Sanders replied the same day in a letter headed, "Effingham-place": "I am pleased to inform you the owner confirms the sale of above to you for £800. Possession to be given at Midsummer next. Kindly let me know if the contract shall be prepared in your name or that of the committee."

The defendant replied on April 29:—"The committee have decided not to buy the property, so that the contract must be made out in my name, and can be sent to my solicitor, Mr. T. G. Bullen."

On May 3 the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to Mr. T. G. Bullen:—"We are instructed by Mr. Bellamy to send you the enclosed draft contract for sale of Effingham-place to your client, Mr. F. G. Debenham, for approval on his behalf. On receipt of the draft approved, we will lose no time in exchanging contracts, and we will then send you abstract of title."

The draft contract which accompanied the last letter contained several special conditions as to evidence of identity and verification of title, and providing that the abstract of title should commence with the will of a testator who died in 1863, that as to such testator's seisin or ownership no proof should be required, and that the property was to be sold subject to the existing tenancy. All the special conditions were struck out by the defendant's solicitor, who returned the draft as altered to the plaintiff's solicitors, with a letter, dated May 7th, informing them that he returned the draft agreement "settled on behalf of the proposed purchaser," and that he could not accept the special conditions. On the 14th of May the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant's solicitor: "We return draft agreement. We cannot consent to all your alterations, which, in fact, make the contract almost an open one. We submit that none of the conditions are special. You will observe that our client does not insist upon the payment of any deposit, and will allow the fixtures belonging to the landlord to pass with the house."

The defendant's solicitor replied on the 17th of May: "In reference to your letter of the 14th inst., returning the draft agreement, I am sorry I cannot advise Mr. Debenham to go on with the negotiation. Two points were of the greatest importance—that there should be clear possession on the 24th of June, and a title that trustees could accept. I return your draft." On the 18th of May the plaintiff's solicitors wrote: "We cannot understand the objections which you raise to the draft contract. We appreciate the importance of the facts you mention. With reference to the title, we propose to commence the abstract with the will of an ancestor of the present owner who died twenty-four years ago. We could, of course, go further back, but we do not know what would be gained by doing so. The property has been in the hands of the Bellamy family for several generations. We inclose without prejudice the abstract of title, that you may judge for yourself as to its sufficiency. We may mention that, when the present owner disentailed the property, we were advised by counsel on the title. With regard to possession at Midsummer, we hear from the land agent that he has agreed with the tenant to give us possession; but we have written to him again to make this quite clear. We return the draft contract, in which we have made a further alteration with reference to possession, and we hope that all difficulty will now be removed, as we are not aware of anything in the form which is unusual." On the 20th of May the defendant's solicitor wrote: "I have your letter of the 18th inst., with the draft contract and abstract of title. I have read the abstract. I daresay you could carry the title back, and show that the property was part of the estate of Anna Maria Bellamy; and who Cayley Shadwell was; but I see there is this fatal objection—that your client has not the mines and minerals. The minerals are very valuable in Cheshunt. I am very sorry not to do business; but I cannot possibly advise my client to go on with the matter. I return the draft contract and abstract." On the 25th of May the plaintiff's solicitors replied: "We received your letter of the 20th inst., and confess that we were much surprised at its contents. The rights of the lord of the manor are, we understand, worthless; but to avoid any question with your client, Mr. Bellamy has agreed to purchase them, so that we shall be able to convey the fee simple on the 24th of June, as agreed. Please return the contract (inclosed) approved, at your early convenience. The tenant is moving out of the house, so as to give possession at Midsummer."

On May 27 the defendant's solicitor wrote:—"I have received your letter of the 25th inst., with the draft agreement. I take leave to remind you that I wrote to you on the 17th inst. that I could not advise my client to go on with the negotiation, and I so informed him, and he has given up all idea of the purchase. He is away from home and I really cannot reopen the matter. I return the draft."

On June 8 the plaintiff's solicitors replied that they were advised by counsel that there was a good contract upon the letters, and added: "The question raised by you about the minerals is one which we are prepared to remove before the time of completion. There was a binding contract by letter, which in our case left no further terms to be arranged. It is true we sought to introduce further details as to title, &c., in our draft contract, but we are willing, if there is to be a formal contract, that it should be in the form approved by you on 7th May last."

Having received no reply, the plaintiff's solicitors on June 22 commenced this action. The plaintiff claimed specific performance of the agreement embodied in the four letters of April 17, 18, and 25.

The defendant by his defence did not admit any contract, craved leave to refer to the whole correspondence, and said, if there ever was a contract, it was put an end to by his solicitor's letter of May 17, or, if not then, at any rate, by the subsequent letters, and that the plaintiff had previously refused to carry it out. He also pleaded section 4 of the Statute of Frauds.

It was proved that prior to May 27 the agent of the lord of the manor had promised verbally that the lord would convey his rights in the mines and minerals under the property to the plaintiff, and that on June 18 the lord had authorized his agent to convey such rights, together with similar rights under some other land larger in quantity, for ten guineas in all.

The action was heard before North, J., on July 15, 1890.

North, J., held that there was a complete contract in the letters of April 17 and 18, and though the whole correspondence ought to be looked at, yet a definite offer having been once made, and accepted without qualification, and all the terms agreed on by the parties being contained in the two letters above mentioned, the contract thus arrived at could not be affected by subsequent negotiation; but he came to the conclusion, that as the plaintiff, through his solicitors, had caused the whole difficulty by insisting in the subsequent letters upon terms to which he was not entitled, it would not be equitable at that distance of time to enforce specific performance of the contract. The judge accordingly dismissed the action, but gave no costs to either party.

From that judgment the plaintiff now appealed.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and C. S. Medd, for the appellant.—What the learned judge meant by "at this distance of time" is not apparent. The correspondence ended on the 8th of June, 1889, and the writ was issued on the 22nd of the same month. The question of the minerals was a very unimportant one, in view of their trifling value, and we were ready to convey them by the date fixed for completion. [KAY, L.J.—Has not a purchaser a right to rescind even before that time if he finds the vendor is not in a position at once to make a title to a material part of the subject-matter of the contract: Forrer v. Nash, 14 W. R. 8, 35 Beav. 167, 171?] In In re Bryant and Barningham's Contract, 38 W. R. 469, 44 Ch. D. 218, at p. 223, Cotton, L.J., said, "I do not doubt that if the vendor is able to make a good title before the day fixed for the completion of the contract, the contract can be enforced." Moreover, the minerals here were not a "material part" of the property. The learned judge himself held that there was a complete and concluded contract. In Hussey v. Horne-Payne, 27 W. R, 585, 4 App. Cas. 311, it was found as a fact that the two letters did not contain the whole contract, but here the judge has found that there was a complete contract in the two letters of the 17th and 18th of April. The decision of Kay, J., in the case of Bristol, &c., Bread Co. v. Maggs, 38 W. R. 393, 44 Ch. D. 616, was avowedly based solely on Hussey v. Horne-Payne, and is distinguishable on similar grounds.

[LINDLEY, L.J.—The letter of the 14th of May seems the most against you, as showing that the writer did not consider there was a binding contract.] Chamberlain v. Lee, 10 Sim. 444, at p. 450, shows our right to acquire the minerals within a reasonable time after the conclusion of the contract. [Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., referred to Wylson v. Dunn, 35 W. R. 405, 34 Ch. D. 569, as showing the purchaser's right to rescind up to the date of the vendor's acquiring the minerals. KAY, L.J., referred to Brewer v. Broadwood, 31 W. R. 115, 22 Ch. D. 105, as supporting the same view.] Brewer v. Broadwood is inconsistent with Chamberlain v. Lee. There is a wide distinction between a case where there is a defect of no importance, which can be cured at any time, and where there has been no intentional misrepresentation, and a case where there is no title to a material part of the property; and in the former class of cases the vendor is allowed time to make his title complete, Fry on Specific Performance, 2nd ed., pp. 321, 576. [KAY, L.J., referred to In re Head's Trustees and Macdonald, 38 W. R. 657, 45 Ch. D. 310.] In Forrer v. Nash the plaintiff had agreed to let the property for twenty-one years, but found he had only twenty years and no right to underlet. Time, moreover, was essential there, and he failed to remedy the defect for months after the time of the contract. In Weston v. Savage, 27 W. R. 654, 10 Ch. D. 736, the property was a leasehold public-house, and the vendor's lessors had an option to determine the lease before its expiration. If a man sells what he has not got he has till the date of completion to get it; at any rate, unless the purchaser previously rescinds. The letter of May 20 did not amount to rescission, nor was there, at that time, any right to rescind, as the plaintiff had given no ground for it. The value of the minerals here was not much over a pound. The lord sold us the minerals under this property and a great deal more for ten guineas. This case is within the reasoning of Kay, J., in Hatten v. Russell, 36 W. R. 317, 320, 38 Ch. D. 334, at p. 347. In Hoggart v. Scott, 1 Russ. & My. 293, the vendors filed their bill before they had cured the defect in their title. In no case has the purchaser been allowed to rescind where the vendor has cured his defect before the time for completion. [Cozens-Hardy, Q.C.—It was done in Weston v. Savage, 27 W. R. 654, 10 Ch. D., at p. 741. The purchaser was there absolved from waiting till the day of completion.] That was the case of a public-house sold as a going concern, where every day was valuable, and time, therefore, was of the essence of the contract. A mere letter, as in this case, from the vendor's solicitor, endeavouring to settle something more, could not reopen a concluded contract. The mere fact that a formal contract is contemplated does not prevent an agreement from being complete: Rossiter v. Miller, 26 W. R. 865, 3 App. Cas. 1124; Bolton Partners v. Lambert, 37 W. R. 236, 434, 41 Ch. D. 295. [KAY, L.J., referred to May v. Thomson, 20 Ch. D. 705, 31 W. R. Dig. 187.]

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and McSwinney, for the respondent, referred to Upperton v. Nickolson, 19 W. R. 733, L. R. 10 Eq. 228, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 436, where, as in the present case, the land had been sold as freehold, but, having been formerly copyhold, the minerals belonged to the lord of the manor, and the objection was held fatal. [They were stopped.]

Napier-Higgins, Q.C., in reply.—In Upperton v. Nickolson it does not appear that the vendor ever remedied or offered to remedy the defect in his title. That case, therefore, has no relevancy to the present one. If we cannot have specific performance, we are entitled to damages for breach of contract. There are circumstances in which damages may be awarded, though specific performance is refused. The subject is discussed in Falcke v. Gray, 7 W. R. 535, 4 Drew. 651.

They also referred to Murrell v. Goodyear, 8 W. R. 398, 1 De G. F. & J. 432, and Halsey v. Grant, 13 Ves. 73.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal by a vendor in an action against a purchaser, in which the vendor seeks to enforce specific performance of an agreement for the sale of a house at Cheshunt, and asks, in the alternative, for damages, if he cannot have specific performance. The contract is to be found (if at all) in a series of letters which have been carefully considered by us all. It is not necessary, I think, in view of the point to which I will allude presently, to spell through those letters to see whether or not they amount to a concluded agreement, though I confess I feel very considerable doubt whether they do so. But I shall assume that they do amount to a concluded agreement for the sale and purchase of this house and land, and I will then consider whether the plaintiff is entitled to specific performace of such agreement, and, secondly, whether, if not, he is entitled to damages. The contract, if there was one, as I shall assume, was for the sale of this house as freehold. There was in terms no day fixed for completion, but the contract was entered into in April, 1889, and the time fixed for delivery of possession was the 24th of June following, and, that being so, and having regard to the nature of the property and the time which had elapsed, it does seem to me, I confess, that that day was at the end of a reasonable time for the completion of the contract. The real truth was that this was not an ordinary freehold house, but it was a house built upon land which had formerly been copyhold land, and had been enfranchised. There was a quarter of an acre of land, and under the Copyhold Acts the mines, minerals, clay, gravel, &c., did not belong to the vendor.

It was argued that the purchaser (an auctioneer of long standing, whose name is familiar to us all) must have known that he was buying land which had been enfranchised. That may be, but it does not necessarily follow, that he would know that the minerals had not been acquired by the vendor. The vendor had not got that which he had contracted to sell. That is perfectly obvious. The purchaser sees that, as soon as the abstract is sent in; he does not see it before, and he immediately says, "I shall not complete." The letter of the 28th of May (written by the defendant's solicitor) says, in effect, "You cannot give me the mines and minerals, and, therefore, I cannot advise my client to complete the contract." The client adopts that advice, and, therefore, it seems to me there was a plain repudiation by the defendant of all liability to complete the contract on that day, and he has never flinched from that position—he has always stood by it from that day to this.

Now, what effect has that on the plaintiff's right to specific performance? I will not go through the authorities, but I shall merely say that, having regard to the cases of Hoggart v. Scott, Forrer v. Nash, In re Head's Trustees and Macdonald, and Weston v. Savage, I think the purchaser was justified in refusing to complete.

Now as to damages, the plaintiff had, if I am right in the assumption I have made, until the 24th of June to tender a conveyance, and if he had been ready and willing on that day to complete his contract and give the defendant such a conveyance as he was entitled to, I am not prepared to say that the defendant would not have been liable in damages in an action for non-completion. I rather think he would.

But the facts are that on the 24th of June the plaintiff had no more got the property than he had in April. He had begun to negotiate for it, but he did not get it till September. Mr. Higgins says he has an answer to that—he says the purchaser prevented him from getting it. He did nothing of the sort—he merely refused to complete. There was no prevention. If you look at it, therefore, as an action by the vendor for damages for non-completion, the purchaser's defence is complete; he says, "You were not in a position at the time for completion to give me what I had bargained for." That is a complete defence to any action at law.

It appears to me, therefore, that both the equitable remedy and the legal remedy fail, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—As to whether there was a concluded agreement here I express no opinion, but I have, like Lindley, L.J., considerable doubts upon the subject; and I shall assume for the purposes of this decision that there was a concluded agreement. The question then arises, Was there repudiation of that agreement?

It has been contended that the letters relied on as supporting repudiation are insufficient to support it. I think, looking at the letters of the 17th and 20th of May, that the defendant did repudiate the contract. Then the question arises whether he had power to do so. At that time the vendor had not a freehold title to the property which the defendant had agreed to purchase. The mines and minerals under the house and land did not belong to the vendor, but were vested in the lord of the manor. There was, therefore, no title at all to a material part of the subject-matter of the purchase. That being so, had the defendant a right to repudiate the contract? I think the authorities on the subject are clear, and I will read the end of the judgment in Forrer v. Nash, which seems to be very much in point. The learned judge says (35 Beav., on p. 171): "I am of opinion that when a person sells property which he is neither able to convey himself, nor has the power to compel a conveyance of it from any other person, the purchaser, as soon as he finds that to be the case, may say, 'I will have nothing to do with it.' The purchaser is not bound to wait to see whether the vendor can induce some third person (who has the power) to join in making a good title to property sold."

It appears to me that that entirely covers this case. There are other decisions to the same effect—Hoggart v. Scott, Head's Trustees and Macdonald, Weston v. Savage, and other cases referred to in the argument. It appears to me, therefore, that there is a complete answer to the action for specific performance.

But then it is said by Mr. Higgins that there is a right to damages for breach of contract—that he was entitled to sue the defendant for not completing the contract on the 24th of June. Without expressing any opinion whether such an action would be maintainable for other reasons—and I have very grave doubts whether it would—there is a perfectly clear answer to Mr. Higgins' contention. He would be nonsuited. In order to maintain such an action he would have to prove that he was, on the 24th of June, in a position to make a good and valid conveyance of this property; whereas in fact we know from the evidence that it was not till a much later period that he acquired those mines and minerals which alone would enable him to fulfil his contract, and convey that which he had contracted to convey to the defendant.

On all grounds, therefore, I think the decision of the learned judge was right, although I am not prepared to say that I come to that conclusion on the same grounds as he did, or that I altogether follow many of his observations.

KAY, L.J.—I entirely agree with the other Lords Justices. I have followed closely what Lindley, L.J., said in his judgment; I am not able to add to it, and I agree with every word of it. I content myself, therefore, with saying I am not satisfied that there was a valid concluded contract in this case; but, assuming that there was, I think it was validly rescinded, and that no claim is sustainable either for specific performance or damages. We are resting our judgment on rather different grounds from those relied on by the learned judge below, but I suppose that will make no difference as to the costs. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

In re JOHANNESBURG HOTEL CO.
Ex parte ZOUTPANSBERG PROSPECTING CO. (a.)

Company—Shares—Payment in cash—Contributory—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.

Shares which have been allotted to, and accepted by, a creditor of a company as fully paid up, in consideration of the extinguishment of the company's debt, cannot, in the liquidation of the company, be treated as having been paid for "in cash" within the meaning of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, as expounded by Spargo's case, 21 W. R. 306, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 407, because a contract to take fully paid-up shares creates no liability to pay money, and consequently the transaction cannot amount to an extinguishment of existing cross-debts of the company and the allottee.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

The Zoutpansberg Prospecting Co. was incorporated in April, 1889, one of its objects being the promotion and formation of other companies. Two of its directors, Durnford and Stephenson, carried out the promotion of the Johannesburg Hotel Co., which was registered on September 25, 1889, with a nominal capital of £75,000 divided into £1 shares. One of the objects specified in the memorandum of association of the Hotel Co. was to adopt and carry into effect an agreement, dated September 25, 1889, between Charles Tyler of the one part and E. B. Phelps of the other part. Tyler was the nominee of the Prospecting Co., and Phelps, who was its secretary, entered into the agreement as trustee for the Hotel Co. The agreement provided that Tyler was to complete the registration of the Hotel Co., pay all expenses of promotion up to the date of the first allotment of shares, and indemnify Phelps against all liability for such expenses, and Phelps, as trustee, thereby agreed with Tyler that the directors should as soon as possible proceed to allot such shares as should have been applied for by the public, and that, immediately after such allotment, the Hotel Co. should pay in cash to Tyler the sum of £3,750, being £5 per cent. on the nominal capital of the company. The memorandum and articles of association of the Hotel Co. were signed by Durnford,

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Stephenson, and Phelps (among others), and on September 26, the day after the registration of the company, Durnford, Stephenson, and two others, alleged to be nominees of theirs, met as signatories of the memorandum and purported to approve the prospectus and to adopt the agreement of September 25, 1889.

On October 1 the same four persons again met and purported to adopt and confirm the agreement to allot the shares applied for to date—viz., 4,718; to appoint four gentlemen named in the prospectus and Durnford and Stephenson directors; and to resolve that £1,250 be paid to Tyler on account.

On October 2 Durnford and Stephenson and another director formed a board meeting of the Hotel Co., at which a cheque for £150 was drawn in favour of Tyler.

At a board meeting held on the 8th of October a further cheque for £500 and certain bills were drawn in Tyler's favour (which, with the cheque of £150, altogether amounted to the sum of £1,250), and it was resolved that 2,500 fully paid ordinary shares be allotted to the Prospecting Co. in terms of the agreement. In pursuance of this resolution 2,500 shares were, on the same day (October 8) allotted to the Prospecting Co., and on the same day a letter of allotment was sent to the Prospecting Co.

There was no evidence from the books of the Prospecting Co. that this resolution was communicated to or accepted by the Prospecting Co., and, although there was evidence to show that the cheques and bills given to Tyler were indorsed by him to the Prospecting Co., there was no evidence as to the date when they found their way into the possession of the Prospecting Co.—whether before or after the 8th of October. The Prospecting Co. were, however, on the 8th of October, registered as the holders of 2,500 fully paid shares in the Hotel Co. No certificate of the shares had been issued. No contract relating to the 2,500 shares had been registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

On October 21 the Prospecting Co. declared a dividend.

On November 23, 1889, the Hotel Co. was ordered to be wound up by the court upon its own petition. The official liquidator, finding the Prospecting Co. entered in the share register as the holder of 2,500 shares, and that no contract respecting them had been registered pursuant to section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, put the Prospecting Co. in the list of contributories of the Hotel Co. in respect of these shares.

On a summons taken out by the Prospecting Co., Chitty, J., held that there was no agreement binding on the Hotel Co. to pay Tyler the £3,750, but that there was an agreement by the Prospecting Co. to take the 2,500 shares, and that, having regard to section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, the shares had not been paid for.

From this decision the Prospecting Co. now appealed.

Dunham, for the appellant company.—Durnford and Stephenson were directors of the Prospecting Co. as well as directors of the Hotel Co. The Hotel Co. was incorporated on the 25th of September, and the fact that Durnford and Stephenson, after the incorporation of the Hotel Co., were parties to the resolutions passed at the meetings of that company held on the 26th of September and the 1st and 8th of October, coupled with the other facts as to the way in which the allotments and the payments in cash were made, is evidence from which a new contract between the two companies, made after the incorporation of the Hotel Co., must be inferred. This new contract was that the Hotel Co. should pay to the Prospecting Co. for work and labour done in promoting the Hotel Co. the sum of £3,750, of which £1,250 was to be paid in cash, and the balance—viz., £2,500 was to be paid by allotting 2,500 fully paid shares in the Hotel Co. to the Prospecting Co. It was intended to register this new contract under section 25 of the Act of 1867, but by mistake the preliminary contract was registered instead. However, what was done in this case amounted to a "payment in cash" so as to satisfy section 25. The Hotel Co. being indebted to the Prospecting Co. to the extent of £2,500, allot to the Prospecting Co. fully paid shares to the amount of £2,500, on the terms that the liability for calls should be set off against the debt. That is equivalent to a payment in cash within section 25: Spargo's case, 21 W. R. 306, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 407; and the fact that calls had not been made in respect of the shares so allotted does not prevent the transaction being treated as payment in cash: In re Jones, Lloyd, & Co., 37 W. R. 615, 41 Ch. D. 159; Ferrao's case, 22 W. R. 386, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 355. In the present case there was at the time of allotment a present debt due by the Hotel Co. to the Prospecting Co., and Kent's case, 36 W. R. 818, 39 Ch. D. 259, is therefore distinguishable, for that case does not establish that there must be a present debt due on both sides.

Romer, Q.C., and Borthwick, for the liquidator, the respondent.—At the date of the allotment of the shares there was not, in fact, a debt due to the Prospecting Co. by the Hotel Co., and Spargo's case is not applicable: Andress' case, 26 W. R. 567, 8 Ch. D. 126. No such new contract as is suggested by the appellant can be inferred. There was no consideration given to the Hotel Co. for the supposed debt, no property was transferred by the Prospecting Co. to the Hotel Co. The real agreement was that these shares should be issued to the Prospecting Co. as fully paid up, and they were allotted to and received by the Prospecting Co. on that footing; there was, no doubt, a common mistake in thinking that a proper contract had been registered before the issue of the shares, so as to satisfy section 25, but now that the Hotel Co. is in liquidation, the Prospecting Co. cannot be relieved from the liability of paying cash for the shares they hold. The Prospecting Co., by their conduct, showed that they accepted the allotment, as they declared a dividend after the allotment, and as they carried on no business except the promotion of the Hotel Co., the dividend must have been declared on the ground that these shares belonged to them. [Lord HALSBURY, C., referred to Arnot's case, 36 Ch. D. 702, 36 W. R. Dig. 34, and In re Railway Time Tables Publishing Co., Ex parte Sandys, 37 W. R. 531, 42 Ch. D. 98.] There must be a present debt existing on both sides in order to constitute an equivalent to payment in cash: White's case, 27 W. R. 895, 12 Ch. D. 511; Kent's case.

Dunham, in reply, cited In re Empress Engineering Co., 29 W. R. 342, 16 Ch. D. 125, and Ex parte Bentley, 28 W. R. 165, 12 Ch. D. 850.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 17.—Lord HALSBURY, C.—The policy of the Act of 1867 appears to have been that the capital of the companies to which that Act applies should be real, and that such arrangements as had occupied the attention of the courts in that same year, by which payments from the shareholders were to form the capital, should not be satisfied by agreements like that in Pellat's case or Elkington's case (15 W. R. 613, 665, L. R. 2 Ch. 511, 527), decided in the earlier part of that same year (1867). The language of the statute is simple enough—"Every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued, and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash," unless a written contract to be filed before the issue of the shares shall otherwise determine. The policy and language are equally clear. The shares are to be paid for, and paid for in cash, so that, I think, the Legislature contemplated that the money should actually be received on behalf of the company, and those who received it should be accountable to the incorporated body for the money so received. It is obvious, I think, what security that was intended to give both to shareholders and creditors, and if it were honestly acted on, security would be given that the capital of the new trading concern should really and truly be subscribed. Experience had shown what indirect and dangerous arrangements might be made whereby a person might appear to be a shareholder and yet have never contributed one farthing to the concern. The statute, as it seems to me, intended by express language to render impossible any such indirect settlements of the right of the incorporated body to have the money, and provided that the shares should not only be paid, but added the words "in cash." Had the course of decisions always followed the language of the statute, no difficulty would have arisen. But a case to which I will presently refer has, I think, unfortunately established that payment in cash need not be what the words literally signify; but that if there is something which the parties choose to call payment, and if there is that which the court can consider equivalent to cash, the language of the statute is satisfied.

In this case it is difficult to speak of the adventures which are in question as real companies. Two gentlemen appear to have got up both companies in different characters, and, having gone through the legal forms to establish two companies, and themselves acting as directors of both companies, proceeded to enter into contracts binding each of the companies in a way which would be ludicrous if it did not involve loss and damage to persons who knew little or nothing of the real nature of the machinery by which these companies were being established. The Prospecting Co. promote the Hotel Co., and the Hotel Co. agree to pay £3,750 for the work of promotion and for an agreement of indemnity against all liability in respect of the formation of the company up to the date of the allotment. Before the existence of the Hotel Co. two persons named Tyler and Phelps executed a written contract which, upon the formation of the Hotel Co., was adopted and confirmed by the two gentlemen (Durnford and Stephenson) who really were the only active persons in either company, but in the name of all the persons who signed the memorandum of association of the Hotel Co., and it may be assumed that, if in the name of the Prospecting Co. these persons did in fact agree to the alleged contract thus adopted by the Hotel Co., that contract, whatever its results may be, bound the Prospecting Co. But I am unable to see any evidence of any such agreement. It was boldly argued that the identity of the two gentlemen in question was sufficient to establish the contractual assent of the Prospecting Co. It may be (indeed, it certainly is so) that the companies were but nominees—puppets—only intended to move as their manufacturers intended they should move, and had they passed resolutions under such circumstances as to bind the company for which they were then professing to act, I do not deny that the abstraction would be bound by formal acts, however unreal might be the separate identity of each company. But persons who engage in such transactions must at least make their puppets move in a legal manner. The knowledge and intention of the individual persons is nothing to the purpose. It is the abstraction, the ideal legal personage, which is sought to be bound. Its whole nature is artificial, and it can only be bound by such acts as it, in its abstract form, consents to be bound by. I cannot affirm that the Prospecting Co. ever accepted the terms of the contract which the Hotel Co. adopted and were willing to agree to. Neither resolution nor minute purporting to be that of the Prospecting Co. can be found which, as against the Prospecting Co., could be relied on as agreeing to the proffered terms.

Now, what was intended to be done by what I have described as the puppets, was to get rid of the payment of the shares allotted to the Prospecting Co. by registering a contract in writing within the 25th section. Either from a blunder or for some reason which at present I am not able to follow, the contract which might or might not have effected that object was not registered, and the result was that 2,500 shares in the Hotel Co. were alloted to the Prospecting Co. without the protection from payment for the shares which the parties probably intended. That the Prospecting Co., therefore, are shareholders, that they are not protected by any agreement within the 25th section, are facts about which there can be no dispute and the only mode by which the Prospecting Co. can effectually relieve themselves from the obligation for the payment on these 2,500 shares is by showing that they have paid for the shares of which they are the registered holders. This is an issue which lies on the Prospecting Co. to prove, and although James, L.J., and Mellish, L.J., have both held in Spargo's case (an authority by which sitting in this court I am bound, whatever I might be elsewhere), that what would be proof of payment as distinguished from set-off, or accord and satisfaction, would satisfy the language of the statute, I am unable to see, upon the facts I have pointed out, that there would be any evidence to go to a jury of payment, as distinguished from accord and satisfaction, in this case. I venture to doubt whether what is described by those eminent judges as the absurdity of handing money backwards and forwards when two people have cross demands is so great as the absurdity of construing the words "in cash" as payment without cash. However, as I have said, I am bound by the decision in this court. But I am of opinion that it was for the appellant company to satisfy us that there were in the present case such cross demands of each company upon the other, and at the date when each had an actual demand upon the other for present payment, as to bring it within the decision in Spargo's case. I am of opinion that they have wholly failed to establish that proposition, and I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

FRY, L.J.—The judgment I am about to read was written before I had the opportunity of reading that just delivered by the Lord Chancellor, and I read it now, not as differing in any way from what has been said by the Lord Chancellor, but only because it deals more in detail with certain parts of the case.

In this case 2,500 shares in the Hotel Co. were allotted to the Prospecting Co., and it has not been denied by the appellants that they agreed to take these shares, if not as fully paid up, then as ordinary shares. The appellants contend that these shares have been fully paid up in cash within the meaning of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, as expounded by Spargo's case, and other cases by which the words "in cash" have in effect been struck out of the statute. The respondents deny that any such payment has been made.

In order that the appellant company should succeed they must show the existence, on the 8th of October, 1889, the day when the payment is alleged to have been made, of two contracts each creating a debt, and of an agreement between the two companies to extinguish one debt by the satisfaction of the other. The first contract which the appellants assert to have existed on that day is an agreement by the Hotel Co. to pay £3,750 to the Prospecting Co. in consideration of work and labour done by the Prospecting Co. in promoting the Hotel Co., and in consideration of an agreement by the Prospecting Co. to indemnify the Hotel Co. against all liability in respect of the promotion of the company up to the date of the allotment. On the 25th of September, 1889, a written contract to a like effect had been entered into between Tyler and Phelps (described as a trustee for the Hotel Co.) in which Tyler and Phelps contracted as individuals. This contract was made before the Hotel Co. was in existence; but after it came into existence—viz., on the 1st of October—a resolution was passed by the signatories of the memorandum of association adopting and confirming this agreement.

It was argued that this resolution amounted to the proposal by the Hotel Co. to enter into a new contract with the Prospecting Co. on terms similar to those of the contract between Tyler and Phelps. Assuming this to be correct, it remains to inquire whether this proposal was accepted by the Prospecting Co. before the 8th of October. There is nothing to show that this resolution was communicated to the Prospecting Co. or that they in any way accepted the obligation to indemnify the Hotel Co., which Phelps had entered into in his own name and, in terms, on his own behalf. Certain sums of money and bills were on and after the 1st of October paid by the Hotel Co. to Tyler, and these are proved to have found their way to the Prospecting Co., but whether before or after the 8th of October is not shown. The receipt of these payments cannot therefore be relied on as evidence of the Prospecting Co. having entered into the contract at the crucial date. The minute book of the Prospecting Co. contains no minute with reference to this contract, and I think that the true result of the evidence is that this contract was never even discussed or considered at any meeting of the Prospecting Co.

The second contract on which the appellant's rely as existing on the 8th of October is an agreement by the Prospecting Co. to take 2,500 shares in the Hotel Co. No resolution of the Prospecting Co. agreeing to apply for or to take these shares exists; no application for them was made in the name of the company, and though what took place after the 8th of October seems sufficiently to justify the proposition (which was not disputed by the appellants' counsel) that the Prospecting Co. agreed to take, or ratified the taking of, these shares, yet there is nothing, in my judgment, to show the existence of the agreement on the 8th of October.

Unless the contract by the Hotel Co. to pay £3,750 to the Prospecting Co., and the contract by the Prospecting Co. to take 2,500 shares in the Hotel Co., were both subsisting contracts and binding on the two companies on the 8th of October, there were not debts on each side which could be extinguished by cross-payments. It was for the appellants to establish these contracts beyond reasonable doubt; that they have failed to do, and the appeal must, therefore, fail.

But, even if the two contracts were established in point of fact, there appears a conclusive reason why no payment in the manner contended for could have been made. A contract to take shares not paid up creates a liability to pay money, and, under some circumstances, a debt. A contract to take fully paid-up shares creates a liability to take the shares, but no liability to pay money and no debt under any circumstances. From which it follows that there never can be any cross debts between the company and its allottee under a contract to take fully paid-up shares, and consequently no payment can be effected by accepting the extinction of one debt as the satisfaction of the other.

I agree that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

PULLMAN v. HILL & CO. (a.)

Libel—Action against company—Publication Privileged occasion—Letter dictated by manager of company to clerk—Type-writer—Press copy—Letter sent to plaintiff's place of business.

The manager of a company, in the course of business, dictated to a type-writer employed in the office of the company a letter to be sent from the company to the plaintiffs. The letter having been written in type, a press copy was made by an office boy. It was then directed to the office of the plaintiffs' firm, where it was opened and seen by three clerks.

Held, in an action of libel against the company, that, assuming the letter to be libellous, there was a publication both at the defendants' office and at the plaintiffs' office, and that neither publication took place on a privileged occasion.

Application for a new trial.

The plaintiffs, John and Henry Pullman, sued the defendants for libel under the following circumstances. The defendants, who were a limited company carrying on business as advertising agents, by agreement with the plaintiffs hired of them at a certain rent a hoarding which was erected on a piece of land in the Borough-road in the possession of the plaintiffs. A dispute arose subsequently between the plaintiffs and a third party, who was building on the land, as to who was entitled to the rent. The defendants having paid rent to the plaintiffs, payment of the same rent was demanded of them by the third party. A correspondence took place, in the course of which the following letter was written on behalf of the defendant company:—

"Messrs. Pullman & Co., 17, Greek-street, Soho.

"Re Boro'-road.

"Dear Sirs,—We must call your serious attention to this matter. The builders state distinctly that you had no right to this money whatever, consequently it has been obtained from us under false pretences. We await your reply by return of post.

"Yours faithfully,

"Walter Hill & Co. (Limited)."

The signature was in the handwriting of the managing director of the company. The rest of the letter was written in type by means of a type-writing machine, having been dictated by the managing director to a confidential type-writer. A press copy having been made by an office boy, the letter was addressed to Messrs. Pullman & Co., 17, Greek-street, Soho. The members of that firm were the two plaintiffs and three other persons. The letter was opened by a clerk of the firm and was seen by two other clerks.

Day, J., before whom and a jury the case was tried, nonsuited the plaintiffs, being of opinion that, if there was any publication, the occasion was privileged, and that there was no evidence of malice.

The plaintiffs applied for a new trial.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Oswald, for the plaintiffs.—The learned judge was wrong in withdrawing the case from the jury. There was a publication to the typewriter, and to the office boy who took the press copy, and to the clerks of the plaintiffs. And none of these publications took place on a privileged occasion.

Murphy, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the defendants.—The defendants, being a company, cannot act otherwise than through their agents. The dictating of this letter by the manager to a confidential typewriter and the making of a press copy were ordinary incidents in the conduct of the defendants' business, and did not amount to a publication at all. And the sending of the letter, which was properly addressed to the plaintiffs' firm, and intended for the plaintiffs themselves, did not constitute a publication. Secondly, if there was any publication, it was on a privileged occasion. The case comes within the definition given in Toogood v. Spyring, 1 C. M. & R. 181, where it was laid down that an injurious statement is privileged if it is "fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs, in matters where his interest is concerned." It was there held that where the statement is made to the plaintiff himself, the mere fact of a third person being present does not make the communication unauthorized. Jones v. Thomas, 34 W. R. 104, is also an authority to show that where a communication is otherwise privileged, the mere presence of strangers does not take away the privilege. A fortiori, the privilege is not taken away where the third person, in whose presence or hearing the communication is made, is a clerk of the defendant, such as he must of necessity employ in the conduct of his business.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Two points have been taken on the part of the defendants. It is said, firstly, there was no publication; and, secondly, if there was, the occasion was privileged. First, then, assuming this letter to be a defamatory writing, was there a publication? Publication of a defamatory writing is the making it known, after it is written, to some person other than the person of whom it is written. If such a writing is sent direct to the person of whom it is written, and not shown to anybody else, there is no publication. Neither is there a publication if the writer puts it into his drawer and it is afterwards stolen. Now is showing it to a clerk of the writer a publication? Why should it not be a publicarion? for the clerk is thereby enabled to repeat it to whomsoever he pleases. It is making it known to a person other than the person of whom it is written, and, therefore, comes within our definition.

Secondly, as to the occasion being privileged, that question only arises when publication has been proved. A privileged occasion is an occasion where the person who publishes the defamatory matter by making it known to a third person is privileged to make such publication; and that is the case where he has a moral duty to make it known to that third person, and that third person has an interest in knowing it. In the case of the character of a servant, the former master has a duty to tell what he believes to be the truth about the servant, and the new master has an interest in hearing it. Now, these two elements being necessary to constitute a privileged occasion, did the making known the defamatory matter in this case to the type-writer come within our definition? It is clear that it did not, as it is impossible to say that the typewriter had any interest in hearing it.

We have also to consider the question of publication at the place where the letter was addressed. It was directed to the address of a firm, where it was opened in the ordinary way of business and seen by three clerks. No doubt the writer did not intend that it should be seen by any one but the plaintiffs, but he had put it out of his own possession, and had put it into such a position that it might be opened. I think there was a publication to these clerks. I agree on this point with the judgment of Fitzgerald, B., in the Irish case of Fox v. Broderick, 14 Ir. C. L. Rep. 453. Therefore there were two publications of this letter, and neither of them was privileged.

I think that the learned judge was misled by statements as to the necessity imposed on men of business in the present day of employing typewriters. No such necessities of business can be allowed to alter the law of England. If a man wants to write a letter which may be libellous, he ought to write it himself, and if he wants to have a copy, he ought to make the copy himself. And although a company cannot act except by its agents, yet a manager of a company, who has authority to write business letters for the company, ought in this respect to act as if he were the principal. A manager who had to write such a letter as this ought to have written it himself, and taken care that no clerk saw it.

Therefore I think the learned judge was wrong in withdrawing the case from the jury, and there must be a new trial.

LOPES and KAY, L.JJ., concurred.

Order for new trial.

SCOTT v. HANBURY. (a.)

Infant—Settlement—Absolute appointment—Failure of limitations of settlement—Resulting trust—Death of appointor under twenty-one—Infants' Settlement Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 43), ss. 1, 2.

A testatrix gave property to trustees upon trust to pay the income to her illegitimate daughter for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after the daughter's decease upon trust for such persons as the daughter should appoint, and, on default of appointment, in trust for the daughter's children.

After the death of the testatrix, the daughter, while still an infant, upon her marriage, made, with the sanction of the court under the Infants' Settlement Act, a settlement, by which, in exercise of the power of appointment given her by the testatrix, she appointed the property to trustees, who were not the same persons as the trustees of the testatrix's will, upon trust to pay the income to herself during the joint lives of her husband and herself, and to the survivor of them for his or her life, and after the death of the survivor upon trust for the children of the marriage, as the husband and wife should jointly appoint, and, in default, as the survivor should appoint, and, in default of children, for such persons as the wife should appoint, and, in default of such appointment, if the wife should survive the husband, in trust for the wife absolutely, and if she should not survive him, in trust for such persons as, under the Statutes of Distribution, would have become entitled thereto upon the death of the wife, had she died possessed thereof intestate and without having been married.

The wife died while still an infant and intestate, without having exercised the general power of appointment reserved to her by the settlement, and the husband took out letters of administration to her estate. There were no children of the marriage.

Held, that the power conferred on an infant by section 1 of the Infants' Marriage Settlement Act enables an infant to make an appointment which, on failure of the limitations of the settlement, will take effect in favour of the infant, and that section 2 of the Act, which invalidates a settlement by an infant on the subsequent death of the infant before attaining twenty-one, only applies to an infant tenant in tail, and, therefore, that the appointment made by the illegitimate daughter by her marriage settlement, being absolute in terms, operated, on failure of the limitations of the settlement because of the fact that the daughter, being illegitimate, could have no next of kin, to make the property her own absolutely; and that, consequently, her husband was entitled to it as her administrator, and not the next of kin of her mother.

Originating summons.

By her will, dated the 15th of May, 1880, Eliza Maurice gave her residuary, real, and personal estate to her two executors upon trust for sale and conversion and investment as therein mentioned, and upon trust after setting apart a fund to pay certain annuities bequeathed by her will, to stand possessed of the residue, and also of the fund set apart subject to the annuities in trust during the life of her illegitimate daughter, Edwina Lizzie, to pay the income to the daughter for her separate use without power of anticipation, and from and after her decease in trust for such person or persons, and in such manner, as the daughter should from time to time (whether covert or sole) by deed or will appoint, and in default of any such appointment in trust for the children of the daughter as therein mentioned.

The testatrix died on the 23rd of July, 1888, leaving her daughter, Edwina Lizzie, who was then eighteen years of age, her surviving.

By a settlement dated the 7th of November, 1888, made with the sanction of the court under the provisions of the Infants' Settlement Act in consideration of the marriage then intended, and shortly afterwards solemnized on the 1st of December, 1888, between Edwina Lizzie and J. R. Scott, the former, in exercise of the power given her by the will of the testatrix, appointed that the testatrix's residuary estate should, after the solemnization of the marriage, become vested in trustees (other than the trustees of the testatrix's will), upon trust to pay the income to the wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after the death of either of them to pay the income to the survivor for his or her life, and after the death of the survivor to hold the trust funds in trust for the children of the marriage as the husband and wife should by deed jointly appoint, and, in default of such appointment, as the survivor should appoint, and, in default of such appointment, in trust for the children of the marriage in equal shares as therein mentioned. And, in default of children to take under the aforesaid trusts, to hold the trust funds in trust for such person or persons as the wife should, during coverture, by will, or, when discovert, by deed or will, appoint, and, in default of such appointment, if the wife should survive the husband, in trust for her absolutely; but if she should not survive him, in trust for such person or persons as, under the statutes for the distribution of intestates' estates, would have become entitled thereto upon the death of the wife had she died possessed thereof intestate and without having been married, such persons, if more than one, to take as tenants in common.

On the 25th of April, 1889, Mrs. Scott died, an infant and intestate, without having exercised the power of appointment given her by the settlement. There were no children of the marriage.

On the 19th of June, 1889, J. R. Scott took out letters of administration to the estate of his deceased wife.

This was an originating summons taken out by J. R. Scott asking for a declaration that he, in his own right, and as the legal personal representative of his wife, was entitled to the property comprised in the marriage settlement; the other claimants to the property being the next of kin of the testatrix, Eliza Maurice, the mother of Mrs. Scott. The defendants to the summons were the executors of the will of Eliza Maurice, the next of kin of Eliza Maurice, and the trustees of the marriage settlement.

Vernon R. Smith, for the summons.—By exercising in her marriage settlement the power of appointment given to her by her mother's will Mrs. Scott made her mother's residuary estate her own absolute property, and that estate ceased to be subject to the will of her mother. As Mrs. Scott was illegitimate she has no next of kin, and therefore the ultimate trusts in their favour contained in the settlement cannot take effect, and her husband is entitled to the settled property as her administrator: In re Van Hagan, 29 W. R. 84, 16 Ch. D. 18; In re D'Angibau, Andrew v. Andrew, 28 W. R. 311, 930, 15 Ch. D. 228. Section 2 of the Infants' Settlement Act, which makes an appointment or disentailing assurance executed by an infant tenant in tail under the Act void in the event of the death of the infant under age, refers only to an infant tenant in tail, and does not affect the settlement by Mrs. Scott.

P. B. Lambert, for the executors of Eliza Maurice, and for two of her next of kin, who, in consequence of an arrangement with J. R. Scott, desired that he should succeed in obtaining the fund.—The settlement must be regarded as if there had been first an appointment of the fund to Mrs. Scott and then a settlement of the fund by her. It is a case of a resulting trust of the fund in favour of Mrs. Scott: Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., p. 467.

Upjohn, for the next of kin of Eliza Maurice.—Section 2 of the Infants' Settlement Act applies to the marriage settlement made by Mrs. Scott under that Act, and renders it void by reason of the death of Mrs. Scott under twenty-one. The wording of that section is obscure, but it could not be intended to make a settlement by an infant under the Act void by reason of the death of the infant under twenty-one only in the case of an infant tenant in tail, but not of any other infant. There is no ground for such a distinction. The section should be read either as if it was worded "executed by any infant or infant tenant in tail," or as if the words "tenant in tail" had been omitted. [NORTH, J.—I cannot either strike the words "tenant in tail" out of the Act or neutralize those words by putting other words in.] The appointment by the infant was only an appointment for the purpose of making the settlement, and the Act gives effect to the appointment only to the extent of the limitations of the settlement. Subject to those limitations the property is still bound by the provisions of the will of Eliza Maurice. The cases cited differ from the present case, where the whole beneficial interest has not been disposed of by the appointment, since, in consequence of the illegitimacy of Mrs. Scott, the provisions in favour of her next of kin cannot take effect. The question is one of intention: In re Van Hagan; In re De Lusi's Trusts, 3 L. R. Ir. 232; In re Thurston, Thurston v. Evans, 34 W. R. 528, 32 Ch. D. 508. The court will not imply an intention on the part of the infant to exercise her power to a greater extent than she has actually exercised it by the provisions of the settlement made by her. At any rate, the onus of proof is on those who assert an intention absolutely to free the property from the trusts of the will; and they have not proved such an intention. This is especially the case where the power exercised by the infant is one given her by statute.

NORTH, J.—In my opinion the case is clear. The first point relied on by Mr. Upjohn is section 2 of the Infants' Settlement Act, which provides that "in case any appointment under a power of appointment or any disentailing assurance shall have been executed by any infant tenant in tail under the provisions of this Act, and such infant shall afterwards die under age, such appointment or disentailing assurance shall thereupon become absolutely void." It is said in the present case that, by reason of the wife dying before twenty-one, section 2 invalidates the settlement which she made under the power conferred by section 1. I do not think that section 2 has that effect. It may be that it would invalidate a settlement by an infant tenant in tail if he died under twenty-one. But Mrs. Scott was not an infant tenant in tail, and what I am asked to do is to alter the language of section 2, either by striking out the words "tenant in tail," or by adding the words "infant or" before the words "infant tenant in tail," so that every infant may be included in the section. I do not feel at liberty to do so. I think the Act means what it says, and that section 2 does not apply to every infant, but only to an infant who is tenant in tail.

Then, as to the second point raised by Mr. Upjohn. The lady had, under the will of her mother, an absolute power of appointment, subject to her own life interest, which she exercised by appointing the fund to the trustees of her marriage settlement. The appointment is an out and out appointment to the trustees of the settlement, who are not the same persons as the trustees of the will which created the power. [His lordship then read the provisions of the settlement, and continued:—] A more complete and exhaustive disposition on the face of the settlement one could not well expect to find. But the lady, being, in point of fact, illegitimate, had no next of kin to take under the ultimate limitation in case of her death before her husband and without issue. Probably neither the lady herself, nor her legal advisers, nor the court, knew anything about her illegitimacy; but if they did it makes no difference, because it is settled by authority that if an appointment is made in favour of a person absolutely which fails on account of the death of the appointee before the date on which the appointment would take effect, the court still sees an intention on the part of the appointor to dispose of the fund absolutely and make it his own, notwithstanding the failure of the appointment. I can find in section 1 of the Infants' Settlement Act no limitation, of the power given to the infant, to make a settlement for the benefit of the husband, or wife, or issue of the marriage. The power given by section 1 is an absolute power, and enables the infant to make an appointment which, on failure of the limitations of the settlement, will take effect in favour of the infant himself.

But it is said that the question is one of intention. As to that, what the Master of the Rolls said in In re Van Hagan is: "Then the only question remaining is, what is to become of the property in case the intention, that the beneficial legatee or devisee shall take, cannot have effect? That is a mere question of resulting trust. Resulting trust for whom? As already pointed out by James, L.J., when Vice-Chancellor, it must either be for the original settlor or for the appointor, and, considering that a general power is for almost all purposes equivalent to property, and is so dealt with by the Legislature in the Wills Act as regards testamentary appointments, the fair and proper result, in my opinion, is to treat the trust as resulting to the appointor, so as to carry the property to the person or persons who would take his real or personal estate, as the case may be, or, to put it in the words of Wickens, V.C., in the case of In re Davies' Trusts, 20 W. R. 165, L. R. 13 Eq. 163: 'It seems settled by the cases of Chamberlain v. Hutchin son, 22 Beav. 444, and Wilkinson v. Schneider, L. R. 9 Eq. 423, 18 W. R. Dig. 94, 96, authorities which are binding on me, that a testamentary appointment under a general power to A. in trust for B., which lapses as to the beneficial interest by B.'s death before the appointor, operates as a good appointment in favour of A., who holds on the same trusts as if it had been the appointor's own property.' There is this also to be said, that the gift to trustees is rational, if the testator knew that it would make the property part of his assets and liable to the payment of his debts. But there does not seem to be any sufficient motive for interposing a trustee when the beneficiary takes absolutely in the case of real estate." The judgments of James and Cotton, L.JJ., were to the same effect.

There is this further indication in the present case. I do not say it is very strong, but it has some weight. The property is taken entirely away from the trustees of the original will, who would have been the proper persons to administer the fund if the appointment had not been intended to be an absolute one. The appointment to the trustees of the settlement is clearly absolute as regards the trustees. As the appointment to the trustees is absolute, and as the beneficial limitations are complete and absolute on the face of the settlement, I hold, following the reasons of the Court of Appeal in In re Van Hagan, that the appointment was also absolute in the one event for which the settlement did not in fact provide—the possible contingency of all the limitations of the settlement failing to take effect.

BELCHER v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Costs — Partition action — Mortgagees of shares—Discretionary power of court — Share — Partition Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 40), s. 10.

The rule in administration actions, that only one set of costs will be allowed in respect of each share, does not apply in the case of partition actions, in which the court, by virtue of section 10 of the Partition Act, 1868, has an absolute discretion as to costs, and will, as a general rule, order the costs of all parties, including the mortgagees of any share, to be borne by the whole estate, a share being "the share of a person found to be entitled to a share by the chief clerk's certificate."

The defendants in a partition action were found to be entitled to an unincumbered moiety of the estate, and the plaintiffs were found to be entitled to the other moiety, upon which there were several mortgages. The estate was sold and the proceeds paid into court.

Held, that the costs of all parties, including the mortgagees of the plaintiffs' moiety, were payable out of the whole fund.

Further consideration.

Elizabeth Roche died on the 14th of December, 1857, having made a will by which she gave all her real and personal estate to her three children, Elizabeth, Isabella, and Alexander in equal shares, and directed that, if a sale should be necessary for the purpose of division, her real and leasehold estates should be sold by her trustees, and that the net proceeds should be invested in their names, and also that they should hold the shares of her daughters in trust for their separate use. And the testatrix empowered her two daughters to appoint their respective shares to any person or persons, and in any manner they respectively might think fit, by any writings, whether testamentary or otherwise.

After the death of the testatrix her daughter Elizabeth married H. Froom, and by a deed poll dated the 12th of June, 1867, appointed her share to her husband absolutely. The daughter Isabella married A. H. Williams.

In July, 1877, the testatrix's son Alexander died, having made a will by which he gave all his property to Elizabeth Froom and Isabella Williams in equal shares.

The action was brought in 1886, for partition or sale of the testatrix's estate, and the usual judgment was given in 1887.

By the chief clerk's certificate, made in 1889, it was found that the following persons were entitled to the property, in the following shares: Isabella Williams, who was a defendant in the action, was absolutely entitled to two-sixths, her husband, A. H. Williams, who was the other defendant in the action, was entitled to one-sixth in her right, and the plaintiffs in the action were entitled to one-sixth absolutely, and also to the remaining two-sixths subject (1) to a charge in favour of themselves, and (2) to a charge of £2,000, of which sum one-half was due to Henry Wilkinson, as the legal personal representative of Alfred Froom, deceased, and the other half was sub-mortgaged to M. Simpson, and subject thereto belonged to Frederick Froom.

Under these circumstances Henry Wilkinson, M. Simpson, and Frederick Froom were necessary parties to the action, and had been served with notice of the judgment.

This was the further consideration of the action, the only question remaining for decision being whether each party to the action, including those served with notice of the judgment, was entitled to costs out of the fund in court, or whether only one set of costs should be allowed in respect of each share, to be shared, in the case of an incumbered share, between the owner and the mortgagees thereof, according to the rule as to costs in administration actions in the case of an incumbered share.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Oswald, for the plaintiffs.—The costs of all parties should come out of the fund in court, as the practice in a partition action differs from that followed with respect to the costs of administration actions.

Stewart Smith, for Mr. and Mrs. Williams, the defendants in the action.—One set of costs should be allowed in respect of each share, and the shares of the plaintiffs should bear the costs of the incumbrancers on such shares.

He referred to Jennings v. Foster, W. N., 1884, p. 200.

Yate Lee, for Henry Wilkinson, M. Simpson, and Frederick Froom.

Pochin, for the trustee of the testator's will.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—No case has been cited in which the rule as to costs in administration actions has been applied to partition actions. It is for the benefit of the defendants that the title to the property should be made out.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 2.—NORTH, J., stated the facts and proceeded:—The rule as to costs in partition suits in the Court of Chancery was well settled. No costs were given up to the hearing; then the costs of effecting the partition (i.e., the costs of the commission, according to the practice at that time) were borne by the parties in proportion to their respective interests, which is the same as saying that if the estate were sold the costs were to be paid out of the proceeds of sale in the first place. No costs were given of any proceedings subsequent to the commission. By the Partition Act of 1868 the practice was changed. Section 10 of that Act provides that "in a suit for partition the court may make such order as it thinks just as to costs up to the time of the hearing"; and there are many cases showing that, under that Act, the court has now a general discretion as to the costs, as it probably has also under the general orders.

With respect to the way in which that discretion has been exercised, the usual practice seems, beyond all dispute, to have been to give the costs of all parties out of the estate. This was done shortly after the Act was passed by Malins, V.C., in Osborn v. Osborn, L. R. 6 Eq. 338, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 95; by Lord Romilly, M.R., in Miller v. Marriott, 17 W. R. 41, L. R. 7 Eq. 1; by Malins, V.C., in Leach v. Westall, 17 W. R. 313; by Lord Romilly, M.R., in Cannon v. Johnson, 19 W. R. 175, L. R. 11 Eq. 90; by Lord Selborne, C., in Simpson v. Ritchie, 21 W. R. 666, L. R. 16 Eq. 103; and by Sir George Jessel, M.R., in Ball v. Kemp-Welch, 14 Ch. D. 512, 28 W. R. Dig. 66. I have not attempted to trace the practice any further, and I am not sure that I could have done so. The practice appears to have become settled, and probably the point was not brought before the court afterwards. In Simpson v. Ritchie Lord Selborne, C., who was then sitting for the Master of the Rolls, said:—"Having regard to the 10th section of the Partition Act, 1868, it cannot be said that the court is bound by the old rule as to the costs of partition suits. It is impossible to lay down a general rule on the subject, and there may be cases in which the court, in the exercise of its discretion, will follow the old practice; but in this case I think the costs ought to be paid out of the estate." That is, I think, the general rule, though there are certain exceptions to it. In Landell v. Baker, L. R. 6 Eq. 268, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 114, Lord Romilly, M.R., required each of the parties to pay his own costs up to the hearing, thus following the old practice. That was soon after the Act was passed, but in the later case of Miller v. Marriott he preferred to follow the decision of Malins, V.C., in Osborn v. Osborn. In two other cases, Wilkinson v. Joberns, 21 W. R. 644, L. R. 16 Eq. 14, before Lord Selborne, C., and Porter v. Lopes, 7 Ch. D. 358, 26 W. R. Dig. 157, before Sir George Jessel, M.R., no costs were given up to the trial; but both those cases depended upon special circumstances, and in each the general rule was recognized to be that which I have stated.

To this rule there is, I think, one clearly established exception. Whenever, with respect to any share, there are costs of adverse litigation between the parties interested in that share—adverse claimants to the share, for instance—those costs are, at any rate to some extent, to be borne by that share, and not by the estate generally; and I think this is only fair. In Jennings v. Foster, before Pearson, J., there was a dispute as to the title to one share. The question was raised by a summons; and the note (W. N., 1884, p. 200) says that Pearson, J., directed the costs of that application to be paid out of the moiety of the purchase-money which represented that share. I am not quite satisfied whether the report is to be fully relied on. That the learned judge directed some costs to be borne by the particular share I have not the least doubt; but I doubt whether he directed all the costs of both parties to be borne by that share. In all probability what he really did was, to direct that the costs, so far as they had been increased by the adverse litigation, should come out of that particular share. And that is exactly what Sir George Jessel, M.R., did in Mildmay v. Quicke, 25 W. R. 788, 46 L. J. Ch. 667. In that case one share had belonged to a married lady, Mrs. Quicke, and there was a contest as to who was entitled to her share. She and her husband had appeared separately. She died pending the action, leaving two infant daughters. The question was, whether the proceeds of the share were personalty which went to the husband, or realty which went to the co-heiresses, and the Master of the Rolls said:—"The costs occasioned by the order for revivor, and by bringing the infant defendants before the court, and of their appearance, will be part of the defendants' costs in the cause; but, as against the plaintiff, the costs occasioned by the severance in the defence of Mr. and Mrs. Quicke must, of course, be borne by her share." I think that was strictly right, meaning by "the costs occasioned by the severance," not the costs of both parties so far as related to that question, but the extra costs occasioned by the severance of two defendants who, otherwise, would have been acting together, but who had to appear separately because the dispute was raised. These are two illustrations of the above-mentioned exception to the general rule.

Again, I do not doubt that, if trustees severed, the court would not allow them two sets of costs. But, subject to these exceptions, it appears to me that the costs of each party, by which I mean the costs of each share, ought to be borne by the estate as a general rule.

The question then arises, what is a "share"? Suppose a testator died fifty years ago, leaving his property to A. and B. in equal moieties, and that during that time one of the moieties had remained in the hands of one person, while the other had become subdivided into a great many shares—a very common case in a partition action. In such a case I think the shares ought to be taken to be as they are ascertained when the chief clerk's certificate is made, finding who are the persons interested in the property. I can see no reason why, simply because fifty years ago the property happened to go in moieties, all the costs in connection with the shares afterwards coming into existence should be measured by the original devolution. I think, therefore, that a "share" means the share of a person found to be entitled to a share by the certificate. I have looked into the cases, and I have asked two of the registrars whether they could throw any light upon the matter from their books, but I have been unable to find any case, and have not heard of any case, inconsistent with this view. And there seems to be a strong reason in its favour, which is this—in a partition suit, the Act gives to the owners of a moiety of the estate the right to say whether it shall be changed from land into money by a sale. For that purpose it is settled that all the persons interested must be before the court. The court cannot get on without them. Before the passing of the Partition Act of 1876 several partition actions had been tied up, because there was no power to proceed without all the parties interested being served, and some parties were missing who could not be served. Under the Act of 1876 the court has power to dispense in particular cases with service of notice of the judgment on any person or class of persons interested. But it seems to me a reason for giving each person interested costs, that you cannot get on without him; and it does not appear fair that persons who are brought before the court for the purpose of giving other parties interested their legal rights, should have to bear the costs so occasioned. And I find in Mildmay v. Quicke not exactly a decision to that effect, but an observation strongly tending that way. In that case Messrs. Torr & Co., Mrs. Quicke's solicitors, had obtained a charging order for their costs upon the fund, and a stop order; and they asked to have their costs out of the fund. Sir G. Jessel, M.R., said: "As to the appearance of Messrs. Torr & Co., their having a charging order does not make them parties to the cause or entitle them to appear, except at their own expense. They must bear their own costs of obtaining the stop order, and of appearance by counsel." By virtue of their charging order they were incumbrancers on the fund, but the reason assigned for not giving them costs is, that they were not parties to the cause or entitled to appear, and I gather from that, that if they had been either the one or the other, the Master of the Rolls would have held that they were entitled to their costs.

The question still remains, with regard to incumbrancers, whether there is any difference between a sub-division of a share among persons who take absolutely, and the sub-division of a share, so to say, within itself, by an incumbrance or incumbrances being created upon it, subject to which the original owner is entitled to the equity of redemption. Does the latter case stand in a different position as to costs? I think not. Of course, there may be in that case, as in the other, disputes relating only to the share itself. If, for instance, there was a dispute as to the amount due on a mortgage, or as to the priorities of mortgagees, it might well be said that the costs of such a dispute ought to come out of the particular share. But those cases would be exceptional, and not governed by the ordinary rule; and, in the absence of such special circumstances, I can see no reason why the incumbrancer should not have his costs out of the estate, as well as the person whose share is incumbered. I can see no reason why, because a man has mortgaged his share, he should fare worse as to costs than if he had not done so when partition is sought by the owner of another share. This also should be borne in mind. Suppose the owner of a share wishes to raise money by means of it. If he does so by dividing it into two, and selling half of it, the assignee of the moiety sold must, of course, be served, for he is entitled to a share, and he would get his costs; and I cannot see any reason in principle why the costs should be treated differently if the owner of a share chooses to split it by means of a mortgage into what I may call a preferred part and a deferred part, rather than to split it into two parts, one of which he retains and the other he sells. Moreover, I have been unable to find any case, and the registrars whom I have consulted cannot find any note of a case—in which, where shares have been incumbered, one set of costs only of proceedings for partition has been allowed in respect of an incumbered share. Nor can I find any case in which a mortgagee has been ordered to add his costs to his security (which would not be exactly the same thing, but somewhat like it), except Wilkinson v. Joberns.

That is the only case in which I can find that that course was adopted. There there was a good reason for it. By reason of the special circumstances of the case Lord Selborne, C., thought it right to direct that the costs of the parties up to the hearing should not be borne by the estate, but that each party should bear his own costs; and, that being so, it followed, as between a mortgagor and the mortgagee of his share, that the mortgagee would add his costs to his security. The only difficulty is the existence of the recognized rule in administration actions, often spoken of as the rule in Greedy v. Lavender, 11 Beav. 417, that only one set of costs shall be given in respect of each share. But, in answer to that, I say that I can find no trace of that course having been adopted in partition suits, and there are very many cases in which it has not—that is, cases in which the parties have had their costs allowed, without any direction being given that they were to be limited to one set in respect of any particular share. In my opinion, also, such a limitation would work injustice.

I think, therefore, that in the present case the incumbrancers must be treated as if they were owners of a share, and must have their costs out of the fund. I am not, however, attempting to lay down any absolutely fixed general rule. It is clear that the court has a discretion as to costs, which it will exercise differently under different circumstances. In the present case I think the incumbrancers must be treated as owners of shares, and have their costs accordingly. Such a rule might, no doubt, work rather hardly in some cases, but the court is strong enough to exercise its discretion so as that the costs shall be borne in the fairest way possible, having regard to the circumstances of each particular case.

Practice—Discovery—Interrogatories—Security for costs of—Action against several defendants—Separate defences—Separate deposits of £5—Ord. 31, r. 26.

Where a plaintiff delivers interrogatories to, and seeks discovery from, several defendants who have severed in their defence, separate sums of £5 must be paid into court in each case.

Eder v. Attenborough, 37 W. R. 507, 23 Q. B. D. 130, distinguished.

This was a summons taken out in an action by a company against five defendants, claiming that certain payments and cheques which the four first defendants had, in their capacities as directors of the company, made and given in favour of the fifth defendant, and certain other payments made to the first named defendant as special remuneration, should be declared improper and void, and other relief. The defendants were all represented by separate solicitors, and had put in separate defences.

The plaintiff company took out a summons dated the 6th of November, 1890, for affidavits of documents and discovery, and for liberty to deliver interrogatories to each defendant.

Before the chief clerk the plaintiff company claimed to be entitled to this order upon payment of one sum of £5 only on the application for discovery, and one of £5 on delivery of the interrogatories. This order the chief clerk refused to make.

Ord. 31, r. 26: "Any party seeking discovery by interrogatories shall, before deliverery of interrogatories, pay into court to a separate account in the action . . . the sum of £5, and if the number of folios exceeds five, the further sum of 10s. for every additional folio. Any party seeking discovery otherwise than by interrogatories shall, before making application for discovery, pay into court, to a like account, to abide further order, the sum of £5, and may be ordered further to pay into court as aforesaid such additional sum as the court or a judge shall direct . . . ."

Chadwyck Healey, for the plaintiff company.—Only one payment is required in respect of the discovery, and one in respect of the interrogatories, before the order is made. This precise case has never occurred in all the reports' cases, only one piece of paper has really been delivered. The fact of the defendants being represented by different solicitors makes no difference. This case is within Eder v. Attenborough, 37 W. R. 507, 23 Q. B. D. 130. Why should the defendants, by severing their defences, throw upon the plaintiff the burden of these additional payments? It is really one case against all, and they would be able to answer together. Chadwyck Healey, in reply.

STIRLING, J.—In this case I am asked to put a construction upon ord. 31, r. 26. This rule was first made in 1883, and came up before Field, J., at chambers on the 22nd of November of that year. In that case, Smith v. Reed, there were seven defendants, who all appeared by different solicitors, and it was held that the prescribed deposit must be made in respect of each set of interrogatories delivered to each defendant. I have made inquiries, and am informed on good authority that this rule has been uniformly observed in the chambers of the Queen's Bench Division and of the Chancery judges, except in one case, to which I will presently refer. Now Smith v. Reed is precisely similar to the present case. The present case is one against several defendants, directors of a company, for various acts of misconduct, and it is probable in such a case that each director may have a defence which may not apply to the other defendants. The defendants have properly severed in their defences, and it is now sought to interrogate them. Unless Eder v. Attenborough, to which reference has been made, has overruled this practice, I shall follow that general practice, which has, I believe, prevailed for seven years, and so observe the principle that it is better to establish and follow one general practice than for one judge to attempt to set up a separate practice of his own. Eder v. Attenborough was an action against several defendants, based upon several distinct causes of action, and the defendants delivered a joint defence. In that case it was sought to administer one set of interrogatories only, and it was held that Smith v. Reed did not apply, and that one sum of £5 only must be paid before delivering interrogatories. Did the learned judges intend to overrule Smith v. Reed? I think not, but that they distinguished that case. Pollock, B., in giving judgment, said:—"This is not a case of different defendants defending by separate solicitors, and each having independent rights. The right of action was common, and to a great extent common against all." And Field, J., said:—"The defendants rely on my decision on the case in which I held that payment of £5 was not enough. But in that case the party had delivered separate and distinct sets of interrogatories, one set to A., and one to B., and so on, and I thought, and still think, that I was right in holding that a deposit in respect of each set was necessary." It is plain, therefore, to my mind, that the judges did not intend to overrule Smith v. Reed, and, notwithstanding Eder v. Attenborough, Smith v. Reed has been followed down to the present time. The present case falls within it, and I ought to follow it. In Eder v. Attenborough the ground of the order for payment of the one sum of £5 was because it was considered a guarantee of bona fides on the part of the plaintiff; that may not be the case here, for it is obvious that the plaintiff may have a good case against one defendant, which may not be good against the others. I decide this case on the ground that it is desirable to follow the practice as observed in two divisions of the High Court, and if that is to be overruled as erroneous it must be done by a higher court. As to the documents [his lordship read the latter part of the rule], it has been urged that the rule leaves an additional sum to be paid at the discretion of the court, but my view is that, instead of prescribing an additional sum where £5 might be insufficient, with reference to a further sum as to length, that it would be impossible for the judge to specify it in the same way as in the case of interrogatories. The language of the rule is identical in other respects. I think if Smith v. Reed construes the former part of the rule rightly, the second part is to be read in like manner, and the same principle applies. I hold that a separate sum of £5 must be paid into court in each case before delivery of interrogatories to, and before application for discovery as against, each defendant. Costs of this application will be costs in the action.

The respondent, a butcher, had purchased and had in his possession meat for the purpose of preparation for sale, and intended for the food of man. The meat was unsound and unfit for the food of man, and the respondent was so told at the time of the purchase. The respondent had not exposed the meat for sale.

Held (distinguishing the case of Vinter v. Hind, 31 W. R. 198, 10 Q. B. D. 63), that the respondent, in having the unsound meat in his possession for the purpose of preparation for sale for the food of man, was guilty of an offence under the 117*th section of the Public Health Act*, 1875, although he had not exposed the unsound meat for sale.

Case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

An information under sections 116 and 117 of the Public Health Act, 1875, was preferred by Thomas Mallinson, of Selby, in the county of York, inspector of nuisances, against George Carr, of the same place, butcher, for having had, on the 7th of May, 1890, in his possession certain meat, to wit, four pieces of beef, for the purpose of preparation for sale, and intended for the food of man, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided.

The justices dismissed the information, but stated this case, from which the following facts appeared:—

The defendant having appeared on summons before the said justices, it was proved that, on the 6th of May, 1890, the defendant, along with other persons, purchased from one Thomas Kettlewell a cow for thirty shillings, which a veterinary surgeon had ordered Kettlewell to get killed and dressed, and at the time of sale it was stipulated by Kettlewell that it was not to be offered for human food. The beast was slaughtered and cut up into four quarters the same day, and removed in a cart by the defendant from Kettlewell's premises. On the following day, from information that had come to Kettlewell's knowledge, he went to Selby and saw the defendant and demanded the carcase back again, stating that he had heard it was going to be offered for human food. The defendant then asked Kettlewell if he had given the beast any physic, and on Kettlewell stating that he had not, Carr replied, "Then it is good beef," and that he was going "to pickle it and cut it up," and refused to give back the carcase.

The prosecutor was then informed of the matter, and he went and saw the defendant and told him he wanted to look at a carcase of beef he had. The defendant Carr then unlocked the door of an outhouse, and the prosecutor there saw in a cart four quarters of beef. He asked the defendant what he was going to do with it, and the defendant said, "Put it in pickle and cut it up."

The prosecutor, thinking the meat was not good for human food, took possession of it, and then called in the medical officer of health, and it was taken before a justice of the peace and condemned as unsound and unfit for the food of man. The medical officer was called and proved that he had examined the four pieces of beef, and that it was unsound and unfit for the food of man.

It was stated and admitted on behalf of the prosecutor that there was no exposure of the meat for sale; whereupon, on the close of the prosecutor's case, the defendant's solicitor contended that, as there was no exposure of the meat for sale, the defendant could not be convicted of the offence charged, and quoted in support of such contention the case of Vinter v. Hind, 31 W. R. 198, 10 Q. B. D. 63, whereupon the justices adjudged that, there being no evidence of exposure of the meat for sale, the case was governed by the ruling in Vinter v. Hind, and they dismissed the information.

Section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1875, enacts: "Any medical officer of health or inspector of nuisances may at all reasonable times inspect and examine any animal carcase, meat, poultry, game, flesh, fish, fruit, vegetables, corn, bread, flour, or milk, exposed for sale or deposited in any place for the purpose of sale, or of preparation for sale, and intended for the food of man, the proof that the same was not exposed or deposited for any such purpose, or was not intended for the food of man, resting with the party charged; and if any such animal carcase, &c., appears to such medical officer or inspector to be diseased, or unsound, or unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man, he may seize and carry away the same himself, or by an assistant, in order to have the same dealt with by a justice."

Section 117: "If it appears to the justice that any animal carcase, meat, &c., so seized is diseased, or unsound, or unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man, he shall condemn the same, and order it to be destroyed or so disposed of as to prevent it from being exposed for sale, or used for the food of man; and the person to whom the same belongs or did belong at the time of exposure for sale, or in whose possession or on whose premises the same was found, shall be liable to a penalty," &c.

Scott Fox, for the respondent.

HAWKINS, J.—In this case I am of opinion that the justices, upon the facts before them, did not come to a right conclusion, and the case must be remitted to them with our intimation to that effect. The information was laid under sections 116 and 117 of the Public Health Act, 1875, against the respondent, for that he, on the 7th of May, 1890, had in his possession certain meat, to wit, four pieces of beef, for the purpose of preparation for sale and intended for the food of man. [The learned judge then stated the facts as they appeared from the case, and read sections 116 and 117, and continued:—] Clearer language could not, in my opinion, have been used to give the justices power to deal with persons in whose possession diseased meat is found. The words in the latter part of section 117 are clearly applicable to a person who has diseased meat in his possession in the course of preparation for the food of man. The section does not say that a man in whose possession diseased meat is found, and who is preparing the same for food, shall not be guilty of an offence unless he actually exposes the same for sale, and it could never have been intended that the section should be so construed. In my opinion exposure for sale is not necessary to constitute the offence under the section, and I think, therefore, that this case must be remitted to the justices.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The justices seem to have quite misunderstood the judgment in Vinter v. Hind, a case which was essentially different from the present, and which turned on a different part of the section. In that case the charge was for exposing for sale unsound meat, and I think the court were right in saying that it was essential to complete the offence that there should be an exposure for sale. The charge in the present case is being in possession of meat that is diseased, or unsound, or unfit for the food of man, and which is intended for the food of man. That offence the respondent has committed, and it is not necessary to have the exposure for sale in order to complete the offence.

Appeal allowed; case remitted.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave, J.) Jan. 13.

Bankruptcy—Discharge—Application under Act of 1883 —Effect of Bankruptcy Act, 1890—Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), s. 38—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28 — Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 8—Practice.

In all cases in which adjudication has been made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the bankrupt has a right to have his application for an order of discharge dealt with under section 28 of that Act, and not under section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890.

Case referred by the registrar to the bankruptcy judge on application by the bankrupt for discharge.

The case raised the very important question whether, where adjudication had taken place under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, an application for discharge ought to be dealt with under section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, or under section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890.

On August 23, 1890, a receiving order was made against the debtor, Thomas Raison, on which he was adjudicated bankrupt on October 13, 1890.

On December 1, 1890, the public examination was closed, and the bankrupt thereupon filed his application for discharge, the day for the hearing of the application being fixed for January 12, 1891.

On January 1, 1891, the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, came into operation, by which section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is repealed, and section 8 of the new Act enacted in its place, which contains certain important additions.

At the hearing of the application for discharge, the official receiver reported to the court, under section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, to which objection was taken, and the matter being one of general importance, the question was referred by the registrar to Cave, J., for decision.

Herbert Reed, for the bankrupt.—The application of the bankrupt should be governed by the Act of 1883, and is not affected by the Act of 1890. In this latter Act additional matters wholly or partly new are inserted, which may oblige the registrar to refuse a discharge. Much of the discretion vested in the registrar by the Act of 1883 is taken away. By section 29 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, "The enactments mentioned in the schedule to this Act are hereby repealed to the extent mentioned in the third column of that schedule." In that column section 28 of the Act of 1883 is placed, and there is no clause saving existing rights. By section 169 of the Act of

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1883, the Act of 1869 was repealed, but there was a saving clause preserving rights acquired under the repealed enactment. By section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, it is provided that "where this Act or any Act passed after the commencement of this Act repeals any other enactment, then, unless the contrary intention appears, the repeal shall not—(c) affect any right, privilege, obligation, or liability acquired, accrued, or incurred under any enactment so repealed." This statute says that existing rights are not to be affected, and the question is, What are the rights of a person adjudicated bankrupt under the Act of 1883, and who has commenced proceedings under that Act for his discharge? The bankrupt acquired under that Act a right to have his discharge on certain conditions, and this right is preserved to him by the Interpretation Act of 1889. The general rule is that where an Act affects rights, it is not retrospective in the absence of express words. Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, does affect rights, and one of the most important is the taking away the discretion of the court.

He referred to Hough v. Windas, 32 W. R. 452, 12 Q. B. D. 224; Ex parte Salaman, In re Salaman, 14 Q. B. D. 936, 33 W. R. Dig. 16; Ex parte Todd, In re Ashcroft, 35 W. R. 676, 19 Q. B. D. 186.

E. C. Willis, Q.C., for the trustee.—Section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was repealed on January 1, 1891, and, therefore, unless there is something to preserve it, there is no power under the Act of 1883 to grant a discharge at all. By section 169 of the Act of 1883, which repealed the Act of 1869, existing rights were preserved. No such saving clause has been inserted in the Act of 1890, and it must be taken that this was intentionally omitted by the Legislature. All that remains is section 38 of the Interpretion Act, 1889, and it cannot be said that section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, created a right or liability within the meaning of that section.

He referred to Ex parte Pratt, In re Pratt, 32 W. R. 420, 12 Q. B. D. 334.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.

Herbert Reed replied.

CAVE, J.—This is a case of very considerable importance at the present moment, though only of passing importance; and, having regard to the fact that several of these applications are waiting, I think it best to give judgment at once, as I have formed a definite opinion on the subject. The question is, what construction is to be put on section 29 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, read along with section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889. When read together it is clear that section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is repealed, but the repeal of that section shall not "affect any right, privilege, obligation, or liability acquired, accrued, or incurred" under that section. It seems to me I do find that a right is given to a bankrupt adjudicated under section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to make an application for his discharge, subject to certain limitations; and certain powers, in some cases discretionary, are to be exercised by the judge who has to consider the application.

No one can doubt that the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, was intended to affect prejudicially the position of a bankrupt. It was thought that under the Act of 1883 a bankrupt obtained his discharge without sufficient punishment being awarded, and without sufficient care being taken to preserve that standard of commercial morality which it was one of the objects of the Act of 1883 to maintain; and it was intended by the Act of 1890 to make the position of a bankrupt, so far as his application for his discharge was concerned, less easy and less comfortable than formerly. His right to apply for an order of discharge is not affected in the sense that he is still able to apply for an order of discharge, but he will not get it on nearly so favourable terms as under the Act of 1883. It seems to me, therefore, that looking at the words which are used—e.g., right, privilege, obligation, or liability—there was a right coupled with liabilities of a certain description, which right has been decidedly affected, because it is now a right to some extent of a similar kind, except that it is subject to liabilities of a far more onerous description than it was before the passing of the Act of 1890. Looking at the language of the Interpretation Act, 1889, it would seem that this was the very kind of thing which that section was intended to meet. There is an old and well-known saying with regard to the new laws, that you are not by a new law to affect, for the worse, the position in which a man already finds himself at the time when the law is actually passed. Under the Act of 1883 a man adjudicated bankrupt under that Act is subject to have taken into consideration, when he applies for an order of discharge, matters which he may have committed in the course of his trading before the Act of 1883 came into force; but it is going very much farther to say that after he has become a bankrupt, after his position has become fixed, so that he cannot by subsequent good conduct atone for any errors he may have made in the past, he is to have taken into consideration a state of the law which did not exist at the time when he was actually adjudicated a bankrupt. It does appear to me that if I were to hold that a man who was adjudicated bankrupt under the Act of 1883 was, nevertheless, subject to the more stringent liabilities imposed by section 8 of the Act of 1890, I should be going quite contrary to this statute, and the plain meaning of this interpretation clause of the Act of 1889.

Now it was urged that the Legislature might have effected what they had done here in another way than by repealing section 28, and, undoubtedly, that might have been so. They might have enacted that in any future application, or in any application under section 28, that certain things, such as those mentioned in section 8 of the Act of 1890, should be taken into account. The only answer is that that is not the language which we have to deal with at present. Of course, if the Legislature had chosen to effect the alteration in that way, it would have been necessary to have stated, and in all probability it would have stated or shown by clear intentment to what applications the new rule was to apply. No doubt the Legislature might have said that it should apply to any application that was heard after the coming into operation of the Act; or that the new rules should apply to any application, of which notice has been given, after the coming into operation of the new Act; or it might have said that the new rules should apply only to an application in the case of a bankrupt adjudicated bankrupt under the new Act. Therefore it is quite clear that if a different form of language was adopted, it would not at all have prevented the Legislature adopting either one or other of these methods of applying new rules. The Legislature has chosen to adopt one which involves the interpretation of the Interpretation Act of 1889, and I say, reading that Act, it does seem to me that this case is one which is preserved by that Act.

Now it was argued by Mr. Cooper Willis that there is something to show a contrary intention on the part of the Legislature such as is referred to in the Interpretation Act of 1889, because it is said there is nothing which is similar to clause (3) of section 169 of the Act of 1883; that the section does contain a saving of any right or privilege acquired, or duty imposed, or liability, or disqualification incurred just as the Interpretation Act of 1889 does; but that although that language is to be found in the Act of 1883, clause (3) of section 169 goes further, and provides expressly with reference to the Bankruptcy Act of 1869 and proceedings which were commenced under that Act; and Mr. Willis says there is nothing in the Interpretation Act of 1889 which is at all similar to clause (3) section 169 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. Now, undoubtedly, there is some little force in that argument, but I think that the fair answer is that if that is so those two clauses do overlap one another, not a solitary instance of legislation of that kind being found in the Act of 1883.

There is another argument also which could be drawn from clause (3) of section 169 of the Act of 1883, and that is, that the Legislature there clearly shows an intention that where there was an order of discharge to be applied for under a bankruptcy in which adjudication had taken place under the old Act, that that old Act was to be preserved for the purpose of hearing the application for the order of discharge, notwithstanding that that application was not made until after the new Act came into operation; and it would therefore be departing from the policy of the Legislature as shown by section 169 of the Act of 1883, if I were to come to the conclusion that in the Act of 1890 they intended to do what they had carefully abstained from doing in the Act of 1883, and had intended to make the position of a bankrupt worse, not only in the case of a future adjudication under the new Act, but also in the case of an adjudication which had actually taken place, and so fixed as it were the position and liability of the bankrupt before the new Act had at all come into force. For these reasons I think that in all cases in which there has been an adjudication under the old Act the bankrupt has a right to have his application for an order of discharge dealt with under section 28 of the Act of 1883, and that this application must be heard under the provisions of section 28 of the Act of 1883 and not under section 8 of the Act of 1890.

The power of the court, under ord. 31, r. 26, to make an order for payment into court of a sum of money, in addition to the £5 originally deposited, as security for the costs of discovery, is not limited to the time when the order for discovery was made, but may be exercised subsequently, if the court considers that the circumstances of the case require it.

In order to properly comply with an order for discovery by affidavit of documents, the documents ought not only to be set out in bundles, but each document must be ear-marked by marking it specially, so that the party seeking discovery may be in a position to specify any particular document he may want to see.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

By a creditor's deed executed in 1876, the members of a firm, carrying on business in partnership as ironmasters, assigned the business and property of the firm to trustees for the benefit of creditors.

The present action was commenced on the 13th of December, 1889, by one of the members of the partnership firm and the representative of a deceased member of the firm, as plaintiffs, the defendants being the trustees of the creditor's deed of 1876, and the Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co. The statement of claim alleged that at the date of the creditor's deed the defendant Smith (one of the trustees) was also managing director of the Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co. (one of the creditors of the partnership firm), and that as manager of that company he supplied, on behalf of that company, steel rails and other materials requisite for the carrying on, by the trustees, of the business of the partnership firm, and habitually made charges therefor largely in excess of the market prices; that the trustees, while carrying on the business of the partnership firm, at various times expended large sums in erecting new and improved machinery (contrary to the terms of the trust deed); that they sold the property and business of the partnership firm to the Barrow Hæmatite Co. at a gross undervalue, and obtained the assent of the other creditors to such sale by misrepresenting to them the value of the assets and the position of the business of the partnership firm. The plaintiffs claimed an account by the trustees of all moneys received by them, and of the sums expended by them in improvements of the works of the partnership firm, and of all materials supplied on account of such works by the Barrow Hæmatite Co.; and that the sale to the Barrow Hæmatite Co., which was effected in 1885, might be set aside as fraudulent.

The defendants' statement of defence was delivered on the 12th of August, 1890.

On the 19th of August, 1890, the plaintiffs, having previously paid into court the sum of £5 as required by ord. 31, r. 26, obtained an order in the common form directing the defendants within six weeks to make discovery of documents.

The defendants finding, as they alleged, that as many as 50,000 documents would have to be examined in order to comply with the order for discovery, took out a summons on the 1st of October, 1890, that the plaintiffs might be further ordered to increase their deposit of £5 paid into court to the amount of £200.

Kekewich, J., on the hearing of this summons, held that the power of the court under ord. 31, r. 26, to order a further sum to be paid into court in excess of the £5, was not a power limited in its exercise to the time when the order for discovery was made; and he considered that the circumstances of the present case rendered it proper that the plaintiffs should be required to increase the amount of the deposit, but he thought that the sum of £200 asked for by the defendants was too much. He accordingly made an order that the plaintiffs should pay into court the further sum of £100, with liberty for the plaintiffs to apply at any time to have that amount reduced.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and T. E. Mansfield, for the appellants.—The judge below had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed from. An order, under rule 26 of this case, had not been sold—they might have been seized under the ordinary process of execution by fi. fa., or if he had owned land it might have been taken under an elegit. Notwithstanding his lunacy he had been put, as was competent by the law of this country, in the position of a judgment debtor, and the legal consequences of that would follow as a matter of course, subject always to such control over the exercise, as might be possessed by the court in lunacy.

The main object and purpose of the statute I have referred to was to enable a judgment creditor to obtain a charge upon certain property of his debtor which he could not reach by the ordinary means of a fi. fa. or an elegit.

There is no reason that I can imagine why this remedy should not exist in the case of every person against whom a judgment could be obtained, and, indeed, an express exemption of a lunatic judgment debtor would, it seems to me, be a great hardship upon the creditor, who might have enforced his judgment, as I have pointed out, against either chattels or land of the lunatic if he had possessed any.

This construction does not make the words in the statute, which I have been considering, ineffective. The judgment of Erle, J., in Watts v. Porter, is now accepted as an accurate explanation of the meaning of those clauses. This object is to confine the charge to such as the debtor could honestly have made, that is, to make it subject to every previous equitable charge upon the fund, and to put the creditor who obtained a charging order precisely in the position of an ordinary execution creditor as defined in Whitworth v. Gaugain, 1 Ph. 728; but the majority of the judges seem to have agreed that, as Lord Campbell expresses it (3 E. & B. 750), "the words that are to be understood as implied by the Legislature we think are 'validly and effectually.'" The erroneous view taken by the majority of the court was that a prior equitable incumbrancer, not having given notice to the trustees, had not completed his title against the judgment creditor, a decision which has since been overruled: Beavan v. Lord Oxford, 4 W. R. 112, 6 De G. M. & G. 492; Kinderley v. Jervis, 4 W. R. 579, 22 Beav. 1; Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Co., 16 W. R. 458, L. R. 3 C. P. 235; Scott v. Lord Hastings.

Turning to the recent authorities there is one decision of two experienced judges in point. In Horne v. Pountain a similar charging order was made on funds of a lunatic standing in the name of the Paymaster-General, but limited to so much of the fund as the Lords Justices sitting in Lunacy might deem applicable.

The case came before Field and Cave, JJ., on an application by the judgment creditor to have the order made unconditional. It was argued that by reason of the words of the statute, which I have read, no order could be made. Neither of the learned judges deals expressly with this argument, but Field, J., says: "Our duty is to give effect to the Act. I find in it no exception nor anything pointing to any distinction between a sane person and a lunatic," and the order was made absolute in form, the condition being struck out. The judgment and charging order were both obtained after the debtor had been found lunatic. This is a direct decision in favour of the claim of the judgment creditors in the present case.

In In re Onslow's Trusts a judgment was obtained by default against a man who was of full age for money lent to him while an infant, and a charging order was made upon the judgment. The fund charged was in court, and three incumbrancers upon it, whose charges were undisputed, applied for payment, alleging that the charging order was invalid by the effect of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, which made his contract for money lent absolutely void. Hall, V.C., decided against the charging order, on the ground that a charging order cannot be obtained upon a judgment for a debt which was not due. The Vice-Chancellor did not accept the judgment as conclusive evidence of the debt, because it was a judgment which had been obtained against the defendant upon a claim for money lent to him during his infancy, which, by reason of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, could not be recovered. It was argued that the court should follow the decision in Ex parte Kibble, 23 W. R. 433, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 373, where, on an attempt to make the same person a bankrupt, the court examined the judgment and treated it as invalid.

For the reason I have given, I am of opinion that the charging orders in this case are valid and effective. The consequence is that, to the extent of such charging orders, the fund does not belong to the estate of the lunatic; if it did, we should simply order the transfer of the fund to the legal personal representative, leaving him to administer it; but as it does not, we must direct the amount due on the several charging orders, which must be verified in each case by affidavit, with the costs of this proceeding, to be paid to the judgment creditors, and the rest of the fund to be transferred to the legal personal representative.

REG. v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF ST. MARY ABBOTT'S, KENSINGTON. (a.)

Poor rate—Appeal—Assessment committee—Valuation list—Right of objector to appear by agent—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), ss. 19, 32.

There is nothing in the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, to limit the right of a ratepayer or body of ratepayers, who object to the valuation list, to appear before the assessment committee by any authorized agent, and the assessment committee have no power to restrict the right of audience to the ratepayer himself, or a member of his family or household, or a member of the legal profession on his behalf.

Rule nisi calling upon the Assessment Commmittee of St. Mary Abbott's to show cause why they should not hear and determine an objection to an assessment.

The prosecutor had objected to any alteration in the assessment of his premises upon the quinquennial metropolitan valuation. He was a member of a ratepayers' association, and employed the agent of the association, a surveyor, to represent him before the assessment committee. The notice of his objections had been sent by the agent, and had been acknowledged by the clerk to the committee under the impression that the agent was a solicitor. Upon the hearing, the committee declined to allow the agent to argue for the prosecutor, on the ground "that he was not a member of the ratepayer's family or household, nor counsel or solicitor," but they offered to let the agent be sworn as a witness. The prosecutor obtained a rule for a mandamus calling upon the committee to hear and determine on his objections.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and J. V. Austin, for the committee, showed cause against the rule.—The committee are a judicial tribunal having discretion to regulate their proceedings. They have analogous powers to a Philbrick, Q.C., and A. Glen, for the prosecutor, supported the rule.—A person is entitled to perform any act before a tribunal by an agent, unless expressly prohibited by statute or common law. There was no discretion in the committee to refuse to hear an objection by whomsoever made, if it were properly made: Jackson & Co. v. Napper, 35 W. R. 228, 35 Ch. D. 162. The committee are not a court exercising judicial functions. Their proceedings are regulated by sections 18 and 19 of the Metropolis Valuation Act, 1869. The words "any body of persons . . . may appeal to the assessment committee" in section 32 imply a right to appear through an agent. This tribunal is analogous to that of Income Tax Commissioners sitting to hear claims or objections under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 57, sub-section 9.

POLLOCK, B.—The question raised before us is somewhat novel. We have to deal with an application for a mandamus against a rating authority by a person deeming himself aggrieved by a certain rate. The purpose of the application is to command this assessment committee to proceed to hear and determine an objection made to a rate by and on behalf of the applicant. The substance of the complaint is that the applicant, who desired to object to the assessment of his premises, obtained a person to act as his agent and representative before the assessment committee. This person first offered himself as a witness and then applied to be heard on the applicant's behalf as his agent. The committee decided that as this person was not a counsel or solicitor, nor a member of the applicant's family or household, they could not hear him argue on behalf of the applicant, though he could offer himself as a witness on the applicant's behalf. Considering the peculiar position of an assessment committee, it is not of much advantage to treat them as analogous to a judicial tribunal, or to consider cases dealing with the duties of such a tribunal. They have indeed a duty to hear and determine a certain class of applications, but they have no power to compel attendance, or to administer oaths, or to exercise other such inherent rights of judicial tribunals; so that it would not be fair to compare or to draw distinctions between this case and other cases of an analogous kind before other tribunals. The Act under which they are constituted is their sole authority. The language of this Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67) is general, and is open to the criticism that by section 19 the committee are "to hear and determine objections" simply, and not specifically the persons making the objections. I think that would be to put too strict a construction on the words. Nor do I think that the analogy, suggested by Mr. Philbrick, of the duty of committees under the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 51), to hear and determine matters, can apply. What right has a man to appoint an agent to represent him? Obviously in some cases it may be necessary where a man is too old, or too ill, to attend; or, again, where he can have no practical knowledge of the subject of the inquiry. The agent, on the other hand, may be a relative or friend having special knowledge or experience of the subject-matter and willing to act; or (as is suggested here) there may be a common objection to an assessment by the occupiers of a whole row or terrace of similar houses, and they may choose to be represented by one of their body or by a house agent authorized to make a common objection for all those assessed in a particular locality. Is the committee entitled to say to such a person, "We will not hear you." It clearly cannot be so. It is a rule of law that a man may appoint an agent to do for him what he is not bound personally to do himself. If so, the agent in this case ought to have been heard.

The committee laid down a fair rule for the proper conduct of their business as to how such a person should be heard. They said that, if he appeared in the double capacity of witness and agent for the one party, they were entitled to say that he could only be heard in one or the other capacity, and not in both. Probably that was the way in which this question arose originally in this case. But I do not consider that the committee were entitled to lay down any rule limiting agency to membership of the applicant's family or household. On these grounds I think the mandamus should go.

CHARLES, J.—I agree. The right of ratepayers to appeal against an assessment is a purely statutory right. Nothing in the statute in question makes it essential that the ratepayer should exercise his right himself. I agree with Stirling, J., in Jackson & Co. v. Napper, where he says that, "subject to certain well-known exceptions, every person who is sui juris has a right to appoint an agent for any purpose whatever, and that he can do so when he is exercising a statutory right no less than when he is exercising any other right."

There is nothing to limit in this case the common law right of a person to do by another what he may do sui juris. The common law principle is the governing rule unless limited by statute. It is said the assessment committee were equivalent to a court, and so had an inherent right to regulate their proceedings, and as a judicial tribunal to limit the class of persons to whom they would allow a hearing. Though this committee is in a sense a tribunal, I do not think their authority goes to that length. Their duty is to hear and determine objections to any assessment. The mode of conducting such hearing is undoubtedly one for the committee to determine. How they will allow persons a hearing is one thing, but that does not authorize them to exclude any class of objectors, or any properly authorized representative of an objector. That would be to seek to control the class of persons who had a statutory right to have their objections heard and determined.

The assessment committee appealed.

Philbrick, Q.C., and Alexander Glen, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case a number of select vestrymen, to whom power is given by statute to hear objections to the valuation list, have taken upon themselves to say that they will not hear the properly accredited agent of the person objecting. It is contended that they have the right to do so because they are a sort of court with judicial, or quasi-judicial, functions to discharge, and that, therefore, they have power to make such rules to regulate their procedure. Whatever the assessment committee are, I am clear that they are not a court, nor have they any judicial functions to discharge. The question is whether, being such as they are, they have the power to refuse to hear a person objecting to the valuation list because he appears by some authorized agent. I think there is nothing which gives them any such power. The person objecting may, I think, appoint any agent he thinks fit to support his objection to the list. It is said that it is inconvenient for the committee to listen to a surveyor who is both an advocate and a witness. I cannot see the inconvenience. It is unnecessary now to determine the question, but I am inclined to think that the committee have no greater power to limit the class of witnesses than they have to limit the class of advocates or agents appearing before them. No doubt they have some discretion as to the number of either whom they will hear, but it is, to my mind, plain that they have no such autocratic power to refuse to hear the agent of an objector, as they have assumed. The mandamus must therefore go, and this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., concurred.

MADELL v. THOMAS, SONS, & CO. (a.)

Bill of sale—Absolute assignment by deed—Hiring agreement—Fictitious transaction—Loan upon security—Grantor not estopped from showing true nature of transaction—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31) and 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43).

A transaction purported to be an absolute assignment by deed of certain chattels by the plaintiff to the defendants, followed by an agreement in writing whereby the plaintiff hired the chattels from the defendants upon the terms that, upon a certain sum being paid by the plaintiff to the defendants by weekly instalments, the chattels were to belong to the plaintiff, and, upon default in payment of any instalment, the defendants were to be entitled to resume possession.

Held, that, notwithstanding the deed, the plaintiff was not estopped from showing that the true nature of the transaction was a loan upon the security of the chattels, and not an absolute assignment; and that the documents were void under the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, for want of registration.

Motion on behalf of the defendants for judgment in an action of trespass to goods tried before A. L. Smith, J., and a jury.

The plaintiff, in consideration of a sum of £200 owing by him to the defendants, by deed dated the 21st of December, 1888, assigned certain furniture in his possession to the defendants absolutely. On the same date the plaintiff signed an agreement, under which he hired from the defendants the furniture (which was described therein as belonging to the defendants) upon the terms that on £200 being paid to the defendants by the plaintiff in forty weekly instalments of £5 each the furniture was to belong to the plaintiff; and in case of default in payment of any instalment, the instalments already paid were to become forfeited to the defendants, who should be entitled to resume possession, it being agreed that until the payment of £200 the furniture should remain the absolute property of the defendants. Default having been made in payment of the instalments, the defendants took possession, and the plaintiff thereupon brought an action of trespass, contending that the true nature of the transaction was one of loan and security, and not of sale and re-hiring, and that the documents constituted a bill of sale, and were void for want of registration. The learned judge in summing up asked the jury whether, upon the evidence, the real transaction was an out and out sale coupled with a re-hiring, or whether the real transaction was that there should be a mere security for a loan, and whether the transaction as carried out was a disguise and cloak for a loan. If the former, they were to find for the defendants; if the latter, for the plaintiff. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

Channell, Q.C., and C. C. Scott, for the defendants—The assignment being by deed, the plaintiff, who is a party to the deed, is estopped from showing that the deed is a sham. He cannot be allowed to contradict the deed by showing that the assignment was not an absolute one, but only by way of security for money. The plaintiff is estopped from showing the true nature of the transaction: Doe v. Roberts, 2 B. & Ald. 367; Bessey v. Windham, 6 Q. B. 166; Bowes v. Foster, 6 W. R. 257, 2 H. & N. 779. The case of In re Mary Watson, 38 W. R. 567, 25 Q. B. D. 27, was not between the parties to the transaction, but between the trustee in bankruptcy of one of the parties and the other party. Nor was there a deed of assignment in that case. The trustee in bankruptcy stands in a better position under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, than the grantor. Though this deed and hiring agreement may be an absolute bill of sale, and, therefore, within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, they are not within the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, as they are not given as security for money: Swift v. Pannell, 31 W. R. 543, 24 Ch. D. 210. They are not therefore void as between the parties to it for want of registration. The action, therefore, will not lie.

J. A. Boyle, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that this case comes directly within the decision in In re Watson. In that case we had to consider whether, upon the true construction of the Bills of Sale Acts, we were not bound, with regard to written documents of all kinds, to do what but for those Acts it would have been impossible in all cases to do. Both the Bills of Sale Acts of 1878 and 1882 were intended to govern transactions between borrowers and lenders. They were intended for the protection both of borrowers and of creditors. The Act of 1882 was especially intended for the protection of borrowers. Both Acts deal with and include documents which, apart from the Acts, could not be disputed by the parties to them, but by necessary implication from the Acts, though the documents upon their face are not bills of sale within the Acts, upon proof of certain facts not appearing upon their face, they are, nevertheless, in truth bills of sale within the Acts. It was, therefore, intended that the courts should have greater power under the Acts in the case of such documents than in other cases. The Bills of Sale Acts intended that the court should look into the facts and see what was the real intention of the parties. The judgment in In re Watson states clearly the point that was intended to be decided. I there said that "the only question of law which we are called upon to decide is this—viz., whether, assuming the findings of the county court judge on the questions of fact to be correct—for we have no power to review those findings—it is a true proposition to say that, where the parties have given the transaction, for the purpose of disguising its real nature, a form which is not that of a bill of sale within the Bills of Sale Acts, the court is precluded from deciding the case according to the real truth and substance of the matter by reason of the form so put forward by way of disguise and for the purpose of preventing the court from getting at the true facts." I then went on to state that the county court judge found in effect that the bankrupt did not desire to sell the furniture, but wanted to borrow money on the security of it; and that, as a matter of fact, Love lent the money and was to have some right by way of security over the furniture, so that the bankrupt never intended to sell the furniture, and Love never intended to buy it. Can anything be more apt as regards the present case? Cotton, L.J., also said:—"The county court judge finds, in effect, that the sale and hiring was a sham and a mere pretence, and that the real transaction was that Love advanced money by way of loan, and was to be secured by this agreement. That being so, the hiring agreement was a mere pretence." The Lord Justice further on cited the judgment of Lindley, L.J., in the Yorkshire Railway Wagon Co. v. Maclure, that "when documents are mere shams or cloaks to hide the real nature of the transaction, the court will not allow them to prevent it from going into the real transaction." The other members of the court delivered judgment to the same effect. These judgments are not confined to documents which, apart from the Act, could be contradicted. They include documents which, apart from the Act, could not be contradicted. It was held that upon the true construction of the Act the court could go through the documents to arrive at the truth, and if the documents were in reality bills of sale they came within the Act. The construction of the Act is the same if the question arises between the parties to the documents. In that case the question arose between one of the parties and the trustee in bankruptcy of the other party. The trustee in bankruptcy, however, simply claims through the party. But even on the assumption that he has a higher right than the party, the court was there construing the Act; and it said that the court might go through the documents to arrive at the truth. The court must hear the evidence and inquire into the truth, though in doing so it must not exclude the form of the documents as part of the evidence. That was the course pursued in the present case, and the case was left to the jury upon that footing, and the jury having found that the transaction was in reality a loan upon the security of the goods, the judgment for the plaintiff must stand. The case is covered by the decision in In re Watson, and the motion must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I also am of opinion that the case of In re Watson governs this case. The effect of the decision in that case is that the court, having regard to the Bills of Sale Acts, must look through the form of the documents, and ascertain the true nature of the transaction between the parties. In that case Lord Esher, M.R., said: "The document itself must be looked at as part of the evidence; but it is only part, and the court must look at the other facts, and ascertain the actual truth of the case. Here it is found as a fact that there was no real transaction of sale; that there was nothing but a loan accompanied by a security given upon goods, the terms of which are contained in the document in question. That being so, the form of the document does not prevent our looking at the real truth of the case, which is that the document is not really a hiring agreement, but in substance contains the terms of a loan and the security given for it upon personal chattels." Every word of that applies to the present case. Independently of the decision in In re Watson there is plenty of authority before that case for our decision here.

Mr. Channell admitted that if the plaintiff had been the trustee in bankruptcy or execution creditor, Watson's case would be applicable; but he urged that that case was distinguishable from the present on the ground that in the present case there is a deed, and that the question arises between the immediate parties to the deed, and that, therefore, the plaintiff is estopped from setting up the true nature of the transaction, which would contradict the deed. I cannot see the distinction. I cannot see that the doctrine of estoppel applies here any more than it would if the trustee in bankruptcy or the execution creditor were plaintiff. The trustee in bankruptcy and the execution creditor must claim through the party, and the doctrine of estoppel would equally apply to them. But, further, the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, was passed for the protection of borrowers against lenders. If the real nature of the transaction could not be inquired into, and the form governed the case, the Act would be evaded every day with the utmost facility. The lender would shape the transaction in the form of a deed of absolute assignment, whereas, in reality, the transaction would be a loan. That consideration forms a strong ground for our looking at the real nature of the transaction, and not the mere form of the documents only. In my opinion, therefore, the verdict and judgment must stand.

KAY, L.J.—I agree. The two documents are the deed which purported to assign the chattels absolutely, and the hiring agreement. The argument put forward was that, the question having arisen between the two immediate parties to the deed, even if the intention was only to give a security for money, the parties are estopped from showing the true nature of the transaction. These documents are not registered, and they would be avoided under the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, even as between grantor and grantee, if they constitute a bill of sale given as security for money. Now the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, adopts the definition of a bill of sale given in the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. How can it be ascertained whether documents of that kind, which, on their face, are not securities for money, are or are not securities for money, except by evidence. Therefore, it seems to me that, when the inquiry is whether documents of that kind are or are not securities for money, evidence must be given. I cannot see how that offends against the law of evidence. It does not contradict the document, it supplements it by showing the whole transaction, which is not apparent upon the face of the document. I quite agree that when there has been an absolute conveyance of an estate, equity would only admit evidence to show that it was a mortgage, for the purpose of having the deed rectified, and upon a proper application to that effect. That, however, does not help us much in the present case. Here, under the Bills of Sale Acts, the evidence can be admitted. This view is in accordance with the decision in In re Watson. It was said, however, that In re Watson was not the case of a deed, and that the question did not arise between the parties to the transaction. But if there is an estoppel between the parties to the deed, it seems clear to me that the trustee in bankruptcy is also bound by that estoppel.

He takes without any assignment for value, and it is settled law that a trustee in bankruptcy can only take what was vested in the debtor at the time of the bankruptcy, and that he takes subject to any equities against the debtor. Mr. Channell admitted that that would be so in an ordinary case, but he said that the Bills of Sale Act gave exceptional rights to the trustee, and placed him in a different and better position. The Act, however, did not intend to give the trustee any benefit freeing him from the doctrine of estoppel. If either the grantor or the grantee are estopped, there is nothing in the Act to prevent this estoppel from extending to the trustee in bankruptcy or the execution creditor. It seems to me that this case is covered by the decision in In re Watson. It would be impossible to carry out the provisions of the Act unless the court could inquire into the nature of the transaction, whether carried out by deed or in any other way, and unless this could be done the Act would be a dead letter.

FILLINGHAM v. WOOD. (a.)

Metropolis Management Acts—Building—"Adjoining owner"—Tenement—Notice by building owner—Injunction—Separate tenements—Metropolitan Building Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict c. 122), ss. 3, 82, 85, sub-section 1.

A tenant in possession of part of a house under an agreement for a greater interest than an interest from year to year, is an "adjoining owner" within section 82 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, and is, therefore, entitled, under section 85, sub-section (1), to three months' notice from the building owner of any intended alteration to a party structure.

Cowen v. Phillips, 11 W. R. 706, 33 Beav. 18, followed.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiff to restrain the defendants, their workmen and agents, until trial of the action from pulling down or otherwise interfering with a party wall. The question turned upon the meaning of the words "adjoining owner" in the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, which enacts as follows:—

Section 3.—"Owner shall apply to every person in possession or receipt either of the whole or of any part of the rents or profits of any land or tenement, or in the occupation of such land or tenement other than as tenant from year to year or for any less term."

Section 82.—"In the construction of the following provisions relating to party structures such one of the owners of the premises, separated by or adjoining to any party structure, as is desirous of executing any work in respect to such party structure shall be called the building owner and the owner of the adjoining premises shall be called the adjoining owner."

Section 85.—(1) "No building owner shall, except with the consent of the adjoining owner . . . exercise any right hereby given in respect of any party structure unless he has given at least three months' previous notice to the adjoining owner."

The plaintiff, Fillingham, was a tailor carrying on business and residing at 41, Margaret-street, where he occupied a shop and parlour with workshop adjoining, and also the basement and a back bedroom on the third floor, under an agreement for a term of three years from the 1st of February, 1890, renewable at the expiration of such term for another three years. The plaintiff's landlord, who was lessee of the whole house for a long term of years, occupied the front bedroom of the third floor. The rest of the house was let to another tenant, but the plaintiff's landlord was in receipt of the whole of the rents of the house.

In May, 1890, the defendant Wood, who was lessee and occupier of No. 40, Margaret-street, being about to pull down and rebuild, caused the usual party-wall notice to be posted in a registered letter to the plaintiff's landlord. This notice, which was in the printed form sanctioned by the Metropolitan Board of Works and London County Council and the one generally used, was headed and addressed "to J. Smith" (i.e., the landlord) "of 41, Margaret-street and whomsoever it may concern."

After the expiration of this notice, and without having given the plaintiff any other notice, the defendant proceeded to pull down and build, and there was evidence of his having caused damage thereby to the portion of No. 41 occupied by the plaintiff.

Byrne, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the motion, argued that the plaintiff was within the definition of "owner" in section 3.—There might be more than one owner to be served with notice under section 85, sub-section 1 (see section 97, sub-section 2).

They referred to Wheeler v. Gray, 6 W. R. 676, 4 C. B. N. S. 584.

Romer, Q.C., and E. S. Ford, for the defendants.—The landlord is the only "owner" to be served.

They cited Hunt v. Harris, 13 W. R. 742, 19 C. B. N. S. 23; Reg. v. Lee, 4 Q. B. D. 75; Caudwell v. Hanson, 20 W. R. 202, L. R. 7 Q. B. 55; and Woolrych's Metropolis Local Management Acts, 2nd ed., p. 296.

Byrne, Q.C., in reply, referred to Cowen v. Phillips, 11 W. R. 706, 33 Beav. 18, as directly in point.

E. S. Ford, in reply on fresh case cited, said that Cowen v. Phillips was distinguishable on the ground that there were separate doors and in fact separate tenements.

CHITTY, J., after stating the facts, continued:—The only question for decision is, whether the plaintiff was entitled to have notice from the defendant before he commenced operations, and that question depends mainly upon the 3rd, 82nd, and 85th sections of the Act of 1855. It appears from section 3 that the term "owner" applies to every person who possesses either of the two qualifications which are mentioned; it applies to every person in possession of the land or tenement, or in receipt either of the whole or any part of the rents or profits of any lands or tenements, but it applies equally to any person who is in occupation of the land or tenement for a greater interest than the excepted interest. Now the plaintiff is in possession and occupation of the rooms I have mentioned for a greater interest than the excepted interest. It is observable that in the definition of "owner" that the words "whole or any part of the rents and profits" are made use of, but that the clause does not go on to speak of the person being in occupation of any part of the land or tenement, and, indeed, it would have been difficult to put in such words with reference to land or tenement. I think, however, that the true mode of interpreting the last portion of that definition is to see whether the tenement is held under a title separately. On reading sections 82 and 85 it is also plain that the building owner must give notice to every person who, according to the definition, is "owner," adding, of course, the epithet "adjoining." It is quite clear that the Act of Parliament contemplates the case of certain persons who would be affected and put to inconvenience by the building owner, who are not persons entitled to receive a notice as adjoining owners. Take the case of a person in occupation of an entire house, but who only holds it for six months. I suppose in the general public interest with regard to building within the metropolitan area, it was considered that he must put up with inconvenience at least to this extent, that he is not entitled to have notice given him by the building owner.

Now I have to find out from these sections whether the plaintiff is entitled to a notice or not. I have said that in respect of his interest he is clearly an "adjoining owner." The only question is whether he ought to be held not to be an adjoining owner because he does not hold the entirety of the house. I think, however, on the true construction of this Act (which I admit is very difficult to construe), he does hold a tenement within the meaning of the interpretation clause. There are many other parts of the Act which may be referred to with a view of ascertaining the true interpretation of this somewhat complicated Act of Parliament, and which may throw some light upon the subject. I have referred to them, but I do not think it necessary to mention them in detail. It is obvious, of course, to any lawyer, that one of the difficulties in interpreting an Act of this kind arises from the fact that Parliament has seized hold of the term "owner" (which is unknown to the common law lawyers of this country) as a convenient term to use, and then applied it by means of a definition, and the difficulty arises from this definition not being so clear as to be free from all ambiguity. There are, however, two decisions on this expression "adjoining owner," by both of which I consider myself bound. One is relied upon by the plaintiff and the other is relied upon by the defendants. The first is the case of Cowen v. Phillips, and no doubt the observations which the defendants' counsel made upon that case are correct. There the point argued was whether a person having a greater equitable interest than merely as tenant from year to year was within the intention of the Act. Cowen, the plaintiff, was in possession of the shop and parlour on the ground floor and two kitchens in the basement which were part of the house, being, as is stated in the report, part of No. 3, Bruton-street, Bond-street, and he received no notice, and the defendant commenced to knock holes in the party-wall exposing part of the shop. Sir John Romilly held that an equitable interest was sufficient, and that the plaintiff was entitled to notice. Therefore, thus far, I have a case in which a judicial interpretation has been put upon this statute some twenty-seven years ago, applicable, so far as I have stated the facts, to the case which is before me now. But no doubt there does appear in the judgment a statement that the house was divided into two, with two doors, and it is said that that is sufficient to distinguish that case from the one which is now before me. In my opinion that distinction is insufficient. I agree that there was, so far as the report goes, no critical examination of the statute itself, and that the main point which was dealt with was this question of the equitable interest.

Now the other case is Hunt v. Harris. In that case Cowen v. Phillips was cited, and I think, without reading the judgment, I may say was approved by the judges. Erle, C.J., Byles, J., and Montague Smith, J., all mentioned it. They do not mention it, I agree, as a decision on any other question than the main question as to the equitable interest of the plaintiff Cowen, but they had the case before them. They spoke of it with approval, and certainly without disapproval. Now Hunt v. Harris itself was a case which turned mainly upon the 97th section, and the point for determination was whether Harris was liable to be sued for contributions by Hunt, the building owner. Harris had let all the rooms in the house separately to different tenants, some of the rooms being let at least for longer terms than year to year, but Harris was in receipt of the whole of the rents and profits of the tenements, and the judgment went against him upon the ground that he at least was liable to contribution, and that he could, either under the statute or under contract, recover over his fair proportion of the expenses which he would have to pay from his tenants. Without reading the judgment through, which is quite unnecessary, I think the sum of the Chief Justice's judgment is to be found towards the end of the judgment at page 37 (19 C. B. N. S.):—"According to the best interpretation I can put upon the statute, the building owner has a right to call upon the person who holds the entire premises for a long term, and is substantially in possession of all the rents and profits. I do not mean to say that the owner in fee simple may not also be liable. But I can see my way clearly to the conclusion that the owner of a long term who is in receipt of the rents and profits is liable." There are other parts of the judgment which I will not stay now to quote, but the substance of that judgment and of the other judgments is that Harris at least was liable. Then Byles, J., raised a question of this sort, whether the undertenants had any interest in the wall, and there may have been something in the facts of that case which justified the conclusion which he apparently came to, or which, at any rate, he was supposed to have arrived at—namely, that the party-wall had not been demised, so that the undertenant had no interest in it. I cannot assume that Byles, J., intended to decide that where a part, say the upper part, of a house is let to a tenant he has no interest in the party-walls, that the landlord can take down the party-walls and leave the rooms bare and open to the sky; but he did say, "I do not find that he"—that is, Harris—"has demised any portion of the party-wall"; and upon the facts of that case that statement may have been justifiable. Unquestionably, at first sight, there seems to be some slight inconsistency in holding that, under the construction of this statute, the adjoining owner who is bound to contribute to the building owner the expense is not the same person as the adjoining owner entitled to notice before the work is commenced. But I think there is no inconsistency.

The point of law is, that the Court of Common Pleas said that Harris at least is liable, and could have got his contribution over, because he is one of the persons at any rate who, under the definition clause, is owner, and they held, in effect, that it was not necessary for the plaintiff Hunt to sue every owner; but such an interpretation, however, cannot, it seems to me, be put on the 85th section. The 85th section requires that notice should be given to "owner," which includes every person according to the language of the interpretation section. To go back to what I consider the substantial point which the defendants' counsel has attempted to raise by reference to the decision of Cowen v. Phillips, I put this case. Supposing that there are two owners in fee simple of a house, one being the owner of the lower part of the house, and the other the owner of the upper part of the house, and the owner of the upper part of the house has the right of access of the staircase through the doorway and along the staircase to get to his upper part. In such a case as that, I should take it to be clear that notice must be given to both of those owners. The Act imposes on the building owner the duty of finding out who is the adjoining owner. I am not dealing with a case of dangerous structure, but I am dealing with a case of an alteration in a party-wall for the convenience and for the benefit of the building owner. The 98th section, which I have already referred to, relieves the building owner from a difficulty which conceivably he might be in of not being able to find out who the adjoining owner is by providing in substitution, in cases where he clearly cannot find him out, that he may put up a notice on a conspicuous part of the building. To revert once more to the facts of this case. The plaintiff is the person who will suffer loss and inconvenience by the operation of the building owner, and I think it would be wrong and a narrow interpretation of the sections of the Act which I have had to deal with, if I were to hold that he is not entitled to notice. I think that substantially the case is concluded by the case of Cowen v. Phillips, which was before Sir John Romilly twenty-seven years ago. I grant the plaintiff an interim injunction.

Will—Charitable legacy—Extinction of charity after testator's death and before payment of legacy—Unendowed charity—Lapse—Cy-près.

Where a testator bequeaths a legacy to a charity, which is unendowed and is carried on at the cost of the proprietor, and which is in existence at the death of the testator, but comes to an end before the legacy is paid, the legacy will lapse, and will not be applicable cy-près.

Clark v. Taylor, 1 W. R. 476, 1 Drew. 642, followed.

Adjourned summons.

John Slevin, of Morpeth, in the county of Northumberland, a Roman Catholic, made his will on the 14th of February, 1883, and thereby appointed the plaintiff, Michael Slevin, and the defendants, A. Hepburn and R. Fogan, executors and trustees thereof, and bequeathed, inter alia, the following legacies:—"I bequeath the following charitable legacies—namely, to the sisterhood or body of persons commonly called the Little Sisters of the Poor of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, £500; to the Catholic Industrial School at Tudhoe, in the county of Durham, £500; to the Chadwick Memorial Industrial Schools, Town Moor, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, £500, to be called the Slevin Bequest; to the Brothers of Saint Vincent de Paul, Jarrow-on-Tyne, £200; to the Brothers of Saint Vincent de Paul, South Shields, £200; to the Brothers of Saint Vincent de Paul, North Shields, £200; to the Catholic Church at Jarrow-on-Tyne, £200; to the Catholic Church at South Shields, £200; to the Orphanage at Saint Dominics, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, £200; to the Secular Clergy Fund of the Diocese of Hexham and Newcastle, £20"; and the testator directed that the said charitable legacies should be paid exclusively out of such parts of his personal estate as might be "lawfully applied to charitable purposes, and preferably to every other payment thereout." And the testator bequeathed the residue of his estate upon trust to pay debts and legacies, and subject thereto upon trust for Michael Slevin, Margaret Slevin, Isabella Jefferson, and his daughter, M. M. Slevin, in manner therein mentioned.

The testator died on the 24th of February, 1883, and his will was duly proved by all three executors therein named.

The orphanage at Saint Dominics, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, had been an orphanage founded and managed, since 1874, by Mrs. E. J. Priestman. This orphanage was alleged to have been closed before the death of the testator, and on the 14th of February, 1890, the beneficiaries under the will took out an originating summons asking for a declaration that the legacy of £200 to this orphanage had lapsed and formed part formed part of the residuary estate.

Evidence was put in on behalf of Mrs. Priestman, who was a defendant, to the effect that she undertook the charge of four or five orphan girls about 1874, and rented a small house for them and a matron, in Newcastle. At that time Mrs. Priestman was residing at Benwell, near Newcastle. In 1878 she bought a house in Newcastle for the purposes of the orphanage, the inmates of which numbered nearly thirty. This house was in a Roman Catholic district known as St. Dominic's, and the orphanage was called St. Dominic's Orphanage. The orphanage was carried on as theretofore by Mrs. Priestman, by her and her agents, at her cost, until the month of May, 1882, when Mrs. Priestman went to reside at Clifton, Bristol, to which place she removed most of the children and placed them in various orphanages in the neighbourhood of Clifton, wishing, as she deposed, to keep her orphanage together, leaving six or seven girls at the house in Newcastle under the charge of a matron. They, or some of them, remained there till about the end of March, 1883, when the house became empty, being at the end of 1883 sold by Mrs. Priestman to a Dominican Sisterhood of Newcastle for an infirmary. Mrs. Priestman did not again reside at Newcastle.

No claim was made by or on behalf of Mrs. Priestman or her orphanage until some date after the 18th of May, 1889, when a claim was put in in reply to an advertisement by the executors. Mrs. Priestman was not represented on the hearing of the summons in court and made no claim personally to the legacy. Evidence was also adduced to show that the testator had inspected the orphanage a considerable time prior to his death, and had announced his intention of bequeathing money for the benefit of the institution. It appeared that Mrs. Priestman had left Clifton, and was residing at various health resorts in England.

G. Welby King, for the summons.—The legacy lapses. There is also a question whether the orphanage ceased to exist before the testator's death, but the evidence shows that it virtually did so cease: Clark v. Taylor, 1 W. R. 476, 1 Drew. 642. There is nothing in the will to show that the testator appropriated any specific part of his estate to charitable purposes as a whole.

He also referred to In re Ovey, Broadbent v. Barrow, 33 W. R. 821, 29 Ch. D. 560, and Fisk v. Attorney-General, 15 W. R. 1200, L. R. 4 Eq. 521.

[NOTE.—Upon examination of the record Clark v. Taylor, since the hearing of this case, it has been found that the date of the testator's death was the 9th of October, 1846. The year in which such death took place is correctly stated at 1 W. R. 476.]

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 13.—STIRLING, J. (after stating the facts and coming to the conclusion that the orphanage, although about to be discontinued, had not ceased to exist at the date of the testator's death, continued :—) —The question which I have to decide is whether the legacy of £200 bequeathed to the orphanage ought now to be applied cy-près or whether it falls into the residue.

On behalf of the Attorney-General the case of Hayter v. Trego was relied upon. There Thomas Hodson, by his will dated in June, 1819, gave a legacy of £500 to a voluntary society called the "Plymouth and Devonshire Asylum for the reception of Female Penitents." The testator died in June, 1821, at which time the asylum was still in existence; but on the 29th of May, 1822, long before the assets could be administered, the society was dissolved, the charitable establishment was completely broken up, and the furniture and other property belonging to it were sold. The question in the case was whether the sum of £500 was to be applied to charitable purposes by the Crown under the sign manual, or was to be administered by the court cy-près. The Master of the Rolls says, "The testator here having marked out the particular nature of the charity to which he wished the legacy to be applied, the court will execute his intention cy-près, and the master must settle a scheme having regard to the testator's will." It seems there to have been assumed, rather than judicially determined, that the legacy was to be applied cy-près.

The residuary legatees, on the other hand, contend that the case was governed by the doctrine laid down in Clark v. Taylor. There the will of James Baylis, the testator, contained the following gift:—"And I give to the treasurer for the time being of the Female Orphan School in Greenwich aforesaid, patronized by Mrs. Enderly, the sum of £50 for the benefit of that charity." It appeared by the evidence that Mrs. Enderly, named in the will, was a lady of fortune who had been in the habit for many years, previous to and after the year 1839, of spending her own money in the education and maintenance of several female children, sometimes in one house, sometimes in another, in Greenwich, which she rented at her own expense, sometimes at her own house. Mrs. Enderly for a portion of the period had a board put in front of the house, with the words "Orphan Girls' School," or "Female Orphan School," or some such words painted on it. There never was any trust or deed of endowment, or any treasurer, the school being simply a school voluntarily kept up by Mrs. Enderly at her own expense. Mrs. Enderly discontinued the school in November, 1846, the children then being educated being sent away, and no such school afterwards continued.

The testator's will was dated March, 1839; he died in October, 1840. (See, however, note above at end of argument.) The question was whether the bequest to this school failed and fell into the residue, or whether it was dedicated to charity and was to be disposed of cy-près. [His lordship then read the judgment of Kindersley, V.C., in that case, and continued :—] Clark v. Taylor was followed by Lord Hatherley, when Vice-Chancellor, in Fisk v. Attorney-General, where, however, the legacy was given to an institution which was dissolved in the lifetime of the testator. The Vice-Chancellor says :—"Then there is the other point, which was argued by Mr. Wickens, as to the gift to the charity which no longer exists. I am far from saying that that argument may not some day or other require further consideration, but there are two decisions, one by Kindersley V.C., of Clark v. Taylor, the other by Stuart, V.C., which expressly decide that when a gift is made by will to a charity which has expired, it is as much a lapse as a gift to an individual who has expired." In In re Ovey, Broadbent v. Barrow, Pearson, J., on the authority of Clark v. Taylor and Fisk v. Attorney-General, held that a legacy (being one of several described as "money legacies for charitable purposes") in favour of a particular institution lapsed because the institution had ceased to exist at the time when the testator made his will, and consequently at the time of his death.

The doctrine of these cases appear to have been recognized by the Court of Appeal in Biscoe v. Jackson, 35 W. R. 554, 35 Ch. D. 460. The cases of Clark v. Taylor, Fisk v. Attorney-General, and In re Ovey, Broadbent v. Barrow, were cited in argument, and in giving judgment Cotton, L.J., says :—"It is clear that where there is a legacy given to a particular legatee, and that legatee fails before the death of the testator, there being only the gift to the particular legatee, even though that legatee is an institution, the legacy fails."

It thus appears that there is a very considerable weight of authority, too great, in my judgment, to be disregarded by a court of first instance, for the proposition that a legacy given to a particular charitable institution fails if the institution ceases to exist. It is said, however, that there is a difference where (as here) the institution is in existence at the testator's death; that in this respect the cases of Hayter v. Trego and Clark v. Taylor are at variance, and that the former decision ought to be preferred.

It seems clear that Lord Hatherley, Pearson, J., and Cotton, L.J., treated the cases, with which they respectively dealt, as similar to the ordinary case of lapse by the death of an individual legatee in the lifetime of the testator. If the legatee survives the testator by one hour, there is no lapse, and it would seem strange if, in this particular case, the law (which, in many instances, upholds gifts to charity which, if made in favour of individuals, would have failed: see Moggridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves. p. 69; Mills v. Farmer, 1 Mer. 55, and cases there cited) were less favourable to a charitable institution. Further, it does not seem right that the destination of the legacy should be affected by the accidental circumstance that a longer or a shorter time is required for the administration of the testator's estate. If, then, the charitable institution intended to be benefited, be expressly organized and endowed with funds devoted to charitable purposes, and be dissolved subsequently to the testator's death, and before the payment of the legacy, it would seem to me that the legacy ought to be devoted to the same purposes as any surplus funds of the institution remaining unapplied at the time of the dissolution, for those funds would presumably have been augmented by the payment of the legacy. That such funds are applicable cy-près is shown by many cases, of which Spiller v. Maude, 32 Ch. D. 158n, is one. I apprehend the decision in Hayter v. Trego rests on some such view of the law, and I should be prepared to follow it under similar circumstances.

In the present case, however, the institution was not organized or endowed; everything was done at the expense of Mrs. Priestman. If the legacy had been paid over to her at the death of the testator, the result would have been that she would have had so much the less to expend out of her own moneys. It is clear, however, that the testator did intend to benefit. not herself personally, but the institution, and she in fact does not now claim the legacy.

Under circumstances almost identical with these, Kindersley, V.C., held in Clark v. Taylor that the legacy failed. The ratio decidendi appears to be given in the last paragraph of the judgment in that case. It is doubtless unsatisfactory that the case should have been decided without the attention of the Vice-Chancellor being called to Hayter v. Trego, and it may be thought that the distinction between the two cases savours of refinement. Still, I am unable to say that they are absolutely at variance; further, Clark v. Taylor was decided in 1853, and, so far from having been overruled, has formed the basis of subsequent decisions. I think that I ought not to depart from it in a case which so closely resembles it.

It was suggested, however, that the words with which the gift commences, "I bequeath the following charitable legacies," amounted to a dedication to charitable purposes of the amounts of the legacies so bequeathed, and that effect ought to be given to the general charitable intention thus indicated. I think, upon consideration of the whole will, and particularly of the words which introduce the immediately preceding gifts, "I bequeath the pecuniary legacies following," that the words relied on are made use of merely as a convenient mode of grouping together the various particular institutions which the testator meant to benefit, and that it would strain them too much to hold that a general charitable intention is thence to be inferred.

In my opinion, therefore, the legacy fails, but the costs of all parties, including the Attorney-General, must be paid out of the fund.

ENGLAND v. PROVINCIAL ASSETS CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Bankruptcy — Scheme of arrangement — Approval of scheme by court—After-acquired property of debtor—Order of discharge—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 18, 28, 44.

In a liquidation by scheme of arrangement or composition under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, it is matter of contract between the creditors and the debtor what property shall vest in the trustee for the creditors, and at what date the debtor shall be discharged.

Accordingly, in the absence of any stipulation in the scheme approved by the court to the contrary, the scheme only operates to convey to the trustee property to which the debtor is entitled at the date of the approval of the scheme by the court, and the approval by the court operates as a discharge of the debtor.

Adjourned summons.

On the 4th of May, 1888, H. L. Croom, a trader, filed a petition in bankruptcy in the Poole County Court, and on the same day a receiving order was made against him. Subsequently his creditors passed a resolution for a scheme of arrangement, and on the 16th of July, 1888, the scheme was duly approved by the court. Under the scheme the whole of Croom's estate was vested in Ernest Foreman as trustee, for the purpose of paying the debts in full, with interest, by certain instalments; in case of failure to pay any instalment, the trustee was, within fourteen days, to proceed to realize the estate for the purpose of paying the creditors; also, the trustee was to be employed to carry on Croom's business under the supervision of a committee of inspection. Croom having made default in payment of the instalments, the trustee took steps to realize the estate, and on the 22nd of February, 1889, he, with Croom's consent, entered into an agreement in writing with the Provincial Assets Co. (Limited) for the sale to them of all Foreman's estate and interest as trustee under the bankruptcy proceedings.

On the 10th of September, 1889, Charles Croom, the uncle of H. L. Croom, died, having by his will, dated the 27th of January, 1888, devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale, and to divide the proceeds equally between H. L. Croom and seven other persons. The share of H. L. Croom, after deducting a sum of £71 claimed to be retained by one of the trustees in discharge of a debt due to him from H. L. Croom, amounted to £306.

By an indenture dated the 31st of December, 1889, and made between Foreman, the bankruptcy trustee, of the one part, and the Provincial Assets Co. of the other part, after reciting the agreement of the 22nd of February, 1889, Foreman, in consideration of the purchase-money therein mentioned, granted and assigned to the company "all that the estate and interest of him, the said E. Foreman, of, in, and to the real and personal property vested in or belonging to the said E. Foreman as trustee under the said bankruptcy proceedings, to hold the same unto and to the use of the company for all the estate and interest of the said E. Foreman therein."

On the same day one Atkinson obtained judgment against H. L. Croom for £116 and costs in a Queen's Bench action commenced on the 17th of December, 1889.

By an agreement under seal, dated the 27th of January, 1890, and made between H. L. Croom of the first part, the Provincial Assets Co. of the second part, and Edward Bicker and Henry Charles Bicker of the third part, after reciting the bankruptcy proceedings, and that H. L. Croom would, except for the scheme of arrangement, be entitled under the will of his uncle to an interest in his estate, "which said interest is, by virtue of the said scheme of arrangement, now vested in the company, as the said H. L. Croom hereby admits," it was agreed that such interest should be received by the company, who, after realizing the same, should pay the net proceeds to the Messrs. Bicker for distribution among such of the creditors of the said H. L. Croom, to whom he had incurred debts since the scheme, as the company should direct.

The trustees of Charles Croom's will having received notice of the respective claims of the judgment creditor and of the company, under their assignment, took out a summons to have it determined what person or persons were entitled to the £306 in their hands, and in what proportions. No order for H. L. Croom's discharge had yet been pronounced in the bankruptcy proceedings.

pany.—H. L. Croom has not obtained an order of discharge, and the bankruptcy proceedings are still continuing; the legacy, therefore, vested in the trustee for the creditors, and passed to the company by the assignment of the 31st of December, 1889: Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 18. Secondly, the debtor and his judgment creditor, who claims under him, are bound by the subsequent agreement of the 27th of January, 1890.

George Elliott, for the judgment creditor.—The approval by the court on the 16th of July, 1888, of the scheme of arrangement is equivalent to an order of discharge; the legacy was acquired after that date, and did not vest in the trustee, and did not pass by the conveyance by him to the company of "all his estate and interest as trustee": Ex parte Clark, In re Clark, 32 W. R. 775, 13 Q. B. D. 426, at p. 434. The agreement of the 27th of January, 1890, was executed under the erroneous impression that the legacy had become vested in the trustee, and should not be enforced.

Marten, Q.C., in reply.—The dictum of Baggallay, L.J., which is relied on, was not necessary to the decision in Ex parte Clark, and was not concurred in by the other judges.

KEKEWICH, J.—There is an essential distinction between a liquidation by arrangement, composition, or scheme, and a bankruptcy. In bankruptcy there is what is called a cessio bonorum by force of the statute. The contract between the bankrupt and his creditors has the seal of the statute; it derives its force from the statute; and one expects to find, and does find, that more operative power is given to that contract than would be given to it if it were a contract between parties under ordinary circumstances. The debtor is bound to hand over—that is to say, the statute takes out of him and hands over—not only the property vested in him at the moment, but that to which he becomes entitled so long as the bankruptcy continues; and that is all appropriated for payment of his creditors; and there are many other provisions in the statute which obtain their force simply from the statute, and which one would not expect to find in an ordinary contract. On the other hand, a liquidation by a scheme of arrangement is sanctioned by the statute, and, according to the statute and the rules made thereunder, is only a contract between the parties; and one approaches a contract between parties from a different point of view from that from which one regards a mere statutory provision. One would not expect to find, in the case of parties contracting, that any definite act on a given day should operate to vest in any of the parties, or a trustee for them, property not then in existence, but to be acquired at some future date. The parties might make any contract they pleased that it should be so, but it is obvious that without the statute no words used in any agreement, whether under seal or not, will vest in any person, as trustee, property not yet belonging to one of the parties, but which may belong to him at a future time. That must be borne in mind. Then, turning to the statute, section 18 provides for a composition or scheme of arrangement; and it provides what may be done in that way, how it is to be arrived at by the creditors with the debtor, and, having been arrived at between them as a matter of contract, how it is to be approved by the court. It does not specify in so many words what property is to belong to the trustee for the creditors, for the very reason that it may be that there is no property at all which is to belong to him; and still less could the Legislature foresee what particular property the creditors would insist on taking from the debtor, or, as not infrequently happens, those of his friends who are assisting him in his difficulties. That is a matter of contract between the parties; and provided that it is within the language of the statute, or that which the statute says may be done, the scheme is approved and takes effect under the statute. Again, the statute does not say when the debtor shall be discharged from his debts; there is nothing which I can find equivalent to a provision for discharge—that is, not in express terms. That seems to have been left to the discretion of the creditors. They are to say, not only what property shall pass to the trustee to be administered for their benefit, but when they will be so satisfied with the provision made for payment of their debts that they will turn him out as a free man, again to trade and contract other debts, discharged from his liability to them.

Some parts of section 18 have reference to other parts of the Act, but there is nothing in sub-sections 12 or 13 referring to the order of discharge; and I think that, reading section 44 into those sub-sections, what is meant by the commencement of the composition or scheme of arrangement must be the time when the composition or scheme is sanctioned by the creditors. It is at that time it commences, and I cannot adopt the view that it means the time of the order approving the composition or scheme, because the order is, by sub-section 12 of section 18, expressly made equivalent to an order of adjudication. Then, what is to be done when the scheme has been sanctioned by the creditors? It is then to be submitted to the court, and the court is to see whether the terms are reasonable. The court is directed to withhold its sanction if any facts are proved which show that the debtor, being a bankrupt, would not be entitled to his order of discharge; and to ascertain the way in which that is to be done reference must be made to section 28, which states what will justify the court in refusing the order of discharge. But beyond that there is no provision that the approval of the scheme shall be equivalent to the order of discharge. At the same time it is almost implied in the provision that the court is, on the occasion when it is asked for its approval of the scheme, to determine whether the debtor has or has not been guilty of any of those acts which, if he were a bankrupt, would, if proved, disentitle him to his order of discharge. It is necessary to refer to section 44, sub-section 2 (i.), which says that the property of the bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall consist of "all such property as may belong to, or be vested in, the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, or may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge." Now, unless I find something directly equivalent to "before his discharge," I think that I am thrown back on the contract between the parties, construed, of course, with reference to the statute and the bankruptcy law in general. The contract is that the whole of the debtor's estate shall be assigned to Mr. Foreman as trustee, and that the claims shall be paid in full by certain instalments, and that, in the event of failure to pay the instalments, the trustee shall within fourteen days proceed to realize; and, of course, it is to be borne in mind that there is a large power behind in the event of the debtor not doing his duty—a power of revoking the scheme so that bankruptcy may supervene. That points to a contract between the parties; the debtor having made a statement of what he had which was available for payment of his debts, the creditors met and considered what the debts were, and a composition was thereupon agreed to—a composition which in the present case is, no doubt, to result eventually in the payment of 20s. in the pound; but still it is none the less a composition because they were not to be paid a sum down in full of their claims, but time was to be given, which is an important part of a compromise. The creditors were to be paid in that way because, on a review of the whole matter, they saw and were satisfied that the debtor's property was enough to pay them in that way.

That seems to me to exclude the consideration of property coming to the debtor at a future time. The estimate was made of what he had then, and that might include, and probably would include, a reversionary interest, whether vested or contingent, but could not, in my opinion, include a mere expectancy. The estimate was framed on the estate then available for payment of debts. All that seems to show that when this was sanctioned and became binding, the court having by force of the statute considered whether the debtor would be entitled to his order of discharge or not, he was discharged and was a free man. That seems to be the necessary result of the consideration of the Act, though I do not find any express provision in the Act that any particular event shall operate as an order of discharge. There is, moreover, distinct authority upon the point in Ex parte Clark. I do not forget that what was there said by Baggallay, L.J., was not necessary to the decision; but neither of the other two Lords Justices dissented from his view; on the contrary they appear to have supported it. I think that, unless there is a stipulation between the creditors and the debtor, approved by the court, that after-acquired property shall be brought in, such property is not brought in. I hold, therefore, that the proper construction is that the scheme only operates to convey to the trustee what the debtor was entitled to at the date of the approval of the scheme by the court, when it became completely operative. That being so, this legacy, which was not known to exist, and did not exist until the death of this testator in the following September, did not vest in the trustee, and did not pass under the deed of December 31, 1889, to the Provincial Assets Co.; and accordingly their claim, so far as it rests on the statute, fails. With respect, however, to the agreement of January 27, 1890, the debtor is bound by the admission there made under seal, that this legacy was at that date vested in the company, and the judgment creditor who claims under the debtor is also bound. I do not see how I can get over that admission, but I will give the judgment creditor an opportunity of taking such proceedings as he may be advised to set the agreement right. The order will be for payment of the fund in the hands of the trustees of the will (after deducting their costs) to the company at the expiration of fourteen days after service by the trustees of the order upon H. CONYBEARE v. LONDON SCHOOL BOARD. (a.)

School board—Member of—Imprisonment for "crime"—Conviction by court of summary jurisdiction—Elementary Education Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), Schedule II., Part I., r. 14—Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 20).

The plaintiff, who was a member of a school board, was punished by imprisonment under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887, for "taking part in a criminal conspiracy to interfere with the administration of the law."

Held, that the offence for which he had been punished was a "crime" within the meaning of rule 14 of Schedule II., Part I., of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, and that, in consequence, he ceased to be a member of the school board, and his office had become vacant.

Special case stated by consent of the parties.

The plaintiff, who was a member of the London School Board, was convicted and imprisoned for three months by a court of summary jurisdiction under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887, on a charge of taking part in a criminal conspiracy to interfere with the administration of the law. The conviction and sentence were confirmed on appeal.

The action was brought against the defendants for assault and for refusing the plaintiff's vote as a member of the board; and also for a mandamus to record the plaintiff's vote as a member at certain proceedings of the board from which he had been excluded on the ground of his imprisonment.

Asquith, Q.C., and Allen, for the plaintiff.—The Elementary Education Act, 1870, is only applicable to England. A "crime" meansan indictable offence, and not an offence for which the plaintiff could be punished on summary conviction: Attorney-General v. Radloff, 10 Exch. 84, at p. 96.

Jeune, Q.C., and A. J. Ram, for the defendants.—The object of the rule is to create a high standard with respect to members of a school board. The offence committed is one which is indictable at common law both in England and Ireland. The fact, therefore, that the conviction took place in Ireland makes no difference: In re Woodhall, 36 W. R. 655, 20 Q. B. D. 832.

Asquith, Q.C., replied.

DAY, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff has been imprisoned for a crime, and that his office on the school board is therefore vacant. Conspiracy is a crime in Ireland as in England. It is an offence against the Crown for which an indictment lies at common law. The circumstance that the Crown did not proceed against the plaintiff for conspiracy by indictment, but preferred the charge upon which he was convicted before a court of summary jurisdiction in Ireland, cannot alter the nature of the charge. The defendants, therefore, are entitled to judgment.

MILLS v. DUNHAM. (a.)

Restraint of trade—Covenant—Construction—Validity.

Agreements in restraint of trade are to be construed according to the principles of construction applicable to all other agreements, and are not to be approached with any primâ facie presumption against their validity.

Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont, 18 W. R. 572, L. R. 9 Eq. 345, discussed.

The test in each case of the validity or invalidity of an agreement in restraint of trade is whether, on the true construction of the agreement, the restraint is not or is, having regard to the nature of the business and the character of the employment, greater than is reasonably required for the protection of the employer.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

By an agreement dated the 14th of March, 1887, between G. S. Mills and A. Mitchell, manufacturers, trading under the style of "The Food Antiseptic Co.," of the one part, and J. Dunham of the other part, it was witnessed that Mills & Mitchell thereby engaged Dunham as a traveller and assistant, as from March 14, 1887, at a salary (therein specified) to be paid weekly as thereinafter mentioned, and 6s. per week, to cover all expenses while travelling in London and suburbs, and 10s. per day while travelling in the country; and it was thereby mutually agreed as follows:—"(1) That Dunham agrees to become the traveller and assistant of the said Mills & Mitchell as from March 14, 1887, at the aforesaid salary; (2) That Dunham shall devote his whole time, &c., . . . to promote and further the said business of Mills & Mitchell; (3) That it shall be amongst other things the duty of Dunham to travel the country and districts required by Mills & Mitchell, and to call upon and solicit orders for all articles and commodities in the way of the said Mills & Mitchell's trade in the business of antiseptic manufacturers, and to receive moneys for or on account of the said Mills & Mitchell, &c. . . . ; (4) That Dunham shall make a daily report to Mills & Mitchell of all calls made by or upon him, and shall also keep proper accounts, and books, &c., . . . ; (5) That one week's notice on either side, and given at any time, or a breach by Dunham of the stipulations of this agreement, shall terminate this agreement, and in the event of the termination of this agreement by such one week's notice given on either side, or breach of the stipulations, or otherwise, it is agreed that Dunham shall not, for or on account of any employer, or on his own account, at any time, either by himself or in partnership with any other person or persons or firm, call upon, or directly or indirectly solicit orders from, or in any way deal or transact business with, any person or firm who, during the continuance of this agreement, shall be customers of the said Mills & Mitchell, or any future successors of the Food Antiseptic Co., or any of the successors in business of such customers."

Dunham entered into the service of Messrs. Mills & Mitchell under this agreement, and continued therein until September, 1890, when the latter terminated the agreement by giving Dunham one week's notice. After leaving their service, Dunham entered into the employment, as traveller, of a rival company called "The Freeze-all Food Preservative Co.," and solicited on their behalf orders from persons who were customers of Messrs. Mills & Mitchell during the continuance of Dunham's agreement with them.

Messrs. Mills & Mitchell brought an action to restrain Dunham from committing a breach of the covenant contained in the agreement.

Chitty, J., held that the covenant was intended only to restrain Dunham from entering into a business similar to that carried on by the plaintiff firm, that the covenant was not void as being too extensive, and granted an interim injunction to restrain Dunham "from calling upon, or directly or indirectly soliciting orders from, or in any way dealing or transacting business with, any person or firm who, during the continuance of the above agreement, were customers of the plaintiff firm, in breach of clause (5) of such agreement, and from so acting for or on account of any employer, or on his own account, and either in partnership with any person or firm."

The defendant appealed.

Levett, Q.C., for the appellant.—In clauses (2) and (3) the word "business" is expressly specified as the business carried on by the plaintiff firm, but in clause (5) there is no such limitation, and the variation of language is obviously intentional, and expressly prohibits Dunham having any business dealings whatever with any present or future customers of the plaintiff firm. The covenant is therefore unreasonable, because it goes beyond what is reasonably required for the protection of the plaintiff firm in their business; it is unlimited either in time or space, and would prevent Dunham carrying on a similar business, even in Australia. The covenant is therefore void: Davies v. Davies, 36 W. R. 86, 36 Ch. D. 359; Baines v. Geary, 35 Ch. D. 154, 35 W. R. Dig. 64; Baker v. Hedgecock, 36 W. R. 840, 39 Ch. D. 520; Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Co., 16 W. R. 458, L. R. 3 C. P. 235, at p. 250; Mallan v. May, 11 M. & W. 653.

Byrne, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the respondents.—The question is, really, what is the true construction of clause (5)? To determine that, the whole agreement must be looked at, and in that view the word "business" as used in clause (5) ought to be read as meaning the business specified in the previous clauses—i.e., the business of the plaintiff firm; this is also apparent from the words in clause (5), "customers of the said Mills & Mitchell"; the additional words as to the "successors" of the said firm, and the "successors in business" of such customers, are intended to apply to the case of the plaintiff firm taking in a new partner, or any of their customer firms doing likewise. [They cited Rannie v. Irvine, 7 Man. & Gr. 969; Nicholls v. Stretton, 10 Q. B. 346; Price v. Green, 16 M. & W. 346; Hayne v. Burchell, 35 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 88; Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 735; Roussillon v. Roussillon, 28 W. R. 623, 14 Ch. D. 351.] Agreements of this nature are to be construed according to the canons of construction applicable to all other agreements, and are not to be approached with a leaning against their validity: Mumford v. Gething, 8 W. R. 187, 29 L. J. C. P. 105.

Levett, Q.C., in reply.—Covenants in restraint of trade are primâ facie bad: Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont, 18 W. R. 572, L. R. 9 Eq. 345, per James, V.C., at p. 354. The onus, therefore, lies on the plaintiffs to prove that this covenant is valid.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question we have to consider in this case is whether the covenant has been properly construed by the judge in the court below, for, if it has, then his judgment is right, but, if not, then his judgment is wrong. [The Lord Justice then read the agreement above set out, and, observing that clause (5) was the clause which the court had to construe, proceeded:—] Now that clause is certainly expressed in very wide terms.

It was urged on behalf of the appellant that the clause means literally what it says, and that it, therefore, would preclude Dunham from having any communication with any of the customers of his former employers upon any business matter whatever—for instance, that it would preclude Dunham, even if he became the traveller of a watchmaker or an umbrella-maker, calling upon any customer of the plaintiff firm. On the other side, it was argued that in order to ascertain the true construction of clause (5) the whole agreement must be looked at; that, looking at the whole agreement, it was impossible to put such a wide and extravagant construction on clause (5), and that that clause, when properly construed, applied only to such business dealings as related to the business of the plaintiff firm, or which could be treated as such. It was argued that the real object of the clause was to prevent Dunham drawing away his former employers' customers, and that to adopt the wider construction contended for by the opposite side would be doing violence to the spirit and object, if not to the language, of the covenant.

Now what is the principle of construction to be applied to cases of this kind? The first thing is to ascertain the object and meaning of the language used, having regard to the whole subject-matter. Mr. Levett cited a passage in the judgment of James, V.C., in Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont, in which the Vice-Chancellor said:—"All the cases seem to establish this principle, that all restraints upon trade are bad as being in violation of public policy unless they are natural and not unreasonable for the protection of the parties in dealing legally with some subject-matter of contract"; and contended that it laid down as a principle of construction that a covenant in restraint of trade is primâ facie bad, and that in every case it lay on the employer to justify it. In my opinion, such a principle of construction would be utterly unsound. [The Lord Justice then read the passage in the judgment of James, V.C., in Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont, beginning with the words "The principle is this," and ending, "having regard to the subject-matter of the contract," and continued:—] I do not think that James, V.C., when the whole passage is looked at, meant to say that the court ought to approach the construction of covenants of this kind with a leaning against their validity. The test in every case is whether the covenant was reasonably necessary for the protection of the employer in his business. Looking at this covenant in that view, I think that the construction put on it by Chitty, J., is the fair construction.

The object and intention of both parties to the agreement was not to prevent Dunham from engaging in any business whatever with the customers of the plaintiff firm, but to prevent him from entering into any business which would be to the detriment of his former employers. It is unnecessary, therefore, to decide the further point as to whether this covenant is severable or not.

As to the limit of time in covenants of this kind, I will merely refer to the case of Davies v. Davies.

This is not a case of an employer stretching the words of the covenant so as to make them cover the acts of a former servant, but it is a case in which the servant himself seeks to put a strained and wide interpretation on the words of the covenant in order to make the covenant void. Although the construction of the covenant does not depend on the conduct of the parties, yet it is satisfactory, in the circumstances of the case, to think that Dunham is held to his contract. The appeal must be dimissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree. What is the principle applicable to cases of this kind? The true question in each case of this kind is whether the restraint, having regard to the nature of the business and the character of the employment, is greater than is reasonably required for the protection of the employer.

The difficulty in the present case arises on clause (5). Mr. Levett says that that clause is so wide and general in its terms as, on its true construction, to prevent Dunham having dealings of any sort or kind in respect of any business whatever with the customers of the plaintiff firm; so that Dunham could not, for instance, buy his meat from any person who was a customer of the plaintiff firm, and, further, that he could not be employed, in any trade you may like to name, by any person who was a customer of the plaintiff firm. In my opinion such a construction of the clause is not a reasonable construction. I think that the prohibitory words in clause (5) must be confined to the business then carried on by the plaintiff firm. I think that agreements in restraint of trade ought to be construed in the same way as all other agreements, and ought not to be approached with any preconceived presumption either in favour of, or against, their validity. The duty of the court is to ascertain the true meaning of the parties from the whole agreement. Looking at clause (5) alone, no doubt it would be difficult to resist Mr. Levett's contention as to its meaning; but the whole agreement must be looked at. [The Lord Justice read clauses (2) and (3) of the agreement, and observed that "the business" therein referred to was the business carried on by Mills & Mitchell as antiseptic manufacturers, and continued:—] In my opinion the business contemplated in clause (5) was, not any business of any kind or sort, but the business above described as being carried on by the plaintiff firm. In my opinion, therefore, there is nothing in that stipulation which violates the principle which I have enunciated at the commencement of my judgment.

KAY, L.J.—I do not dissent from the conclusion at which the other members of the court have arrived—confirming as they do the view taken by Chitty, J. Nor is there any difference among any of us as to the principles of law applicable to cases of this kind. I adopt the remarks of Erle, C.J., in Mumford v. Gething, and I "entirely disagree with the notion that these agreements are to be discouraged or held void, as being in restraint of trade, in order to protect the interests of those who, like the defendant, agree to such partial restrictions." Such agreements must be construed without any predisposition in favour of, or against, them.

The difficulty which I have felt, and which has not even yet been removed, is as to what is the real meaning of the particular words used in clause (5). I am inclined to think that Mr. Levett's view is, of the two which have been taken, the sounder. Clause (2) describes the business as "the said business of Mills & Mitchell"; and in clause (3) it is further described as "the trade or business of antiseptic manufacturers," which must mean manufacturers of antiseptic compounds. But in clause (5), as Mr. Levett forcibly observed, the phrase in changed, and there is no reference whatever to the "said business" or "the business of antiseptic manufacturers." [The Lord Justice read clause (5), and continued:—] Mr. Levett contends that what the employers said in that clause, and what they also meant, was that Dunham was to have no business relations whatever with their customers, and that their object was to avoid any danger whatever to their trade. I agree with Mr. Levett's argument, looking at clause (5) alone, that that is the grammatical meaning of the words used; I can see no difference between the words "shall not . . . in any way deal or transact business," and "shall not deal or transact any business whatever." I can find nothing in clause (5) itself to restrict the word "business" as used there, to "rival or competing business." I do not think that the use of the word "customers" in clause (5) can so restrict the meaning of the word "business," because the word customers there, is only a mode of describing the persons with whom Dunham is not to carry on business. I agree, however, with the Lords Justices in thinking that the whole agreement must be looked at; and when clause (5) is looked at in connection with the other parts of the agreement, it seems to me—and this is the only reason why I bring myself to agree with the decision of the other Lords Justices—that there is an ambiguity as to the meaning of the word "business" in clause (5).

When once an ambiguity is found, then two rules of construction become applicable. The first is, when a clause in favour of the employer is introduced into an agreement and it is capable of bearing either a wide or a narrow construction, the benefit of the doubt ought to be given to the person employed. But it is not giving the benefit to the employed within the meaning of that rule to adopt the wider construction in favour of the employer so as to destroy the contract.

The second rule of construction applicable is that illustrated in Gray v. Pearson, 5 W. R. 454, 6 H. L. Cas. 61, and referred to in Abbott v. Middleton, 7 ibid., at p. 83, 7 W. R. H. L. Dig. 6—viz., that where an instrument is capable of two constructions, one of which would render it valid, and the other of which would destroy it, then the former construction is to be preferred.

For these reasons I agree with the other members of the court.

OVERSEERS OF PUTNEY v. LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Poor rate—Deficiency in assessments—Lands taken in consideration of owners withdrawing opposition in Parliament—Lands not used for the purposes of the works—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 133.

A railway company purchased certain houses outside the limits of deviation in pursuance of agreements entered into with the owners in consideration of their withdrawing their opposition to the passing of the special Act. These houses were not required or used for the purposes of the works. Some of the houses were unoccupied at the time of the passing of the special Act. A deficiency having, in consequence, arisen in the assessments of the houses to the poor rate,

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, ante, p. 144, [1891] 1 Q. B. 182), that the company could not be heard to say, as against the parish, that the houses had not been "taken or used for the purposes of the works" within the meaning of section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and that the company were liable to make good the deficiency.

Held, also, that, in estimating the amount of the deficiency, the assessments of the houses, both occupied and unoccupied, at the time of the passing of the special Act, must be compared with the assessments of the houses made subsequently from time to time until the completion of the works.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 144, 1891, 1 Q. B. 182) upon a special case stated to determine whether the defendants were liable to make good the deficiency in the assessments to the poor rate of certain houses in the parish of Putney, under section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845.

The Kingston and London Railway Act, 1881, authorized the construction of a line in, among other places, the parish of Putney. By an Act of 1886 the undertaking and the liabilities of the Kingston and London Railway Co. were vested in the defendants. Both these Acts incorporated the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. The works were completed in July, 1889. Certain land with houses erected thereon, outside the limits of deviation, had been purchased by the defendants or their predecessors in pursuance of agreements entered into between the owners and the promoters of the Kingston and London Railway in consideration of the owners withdrawing their opposition to the passing of the Kingston and London Railway Act, 1881. None of these houses had been pulled down or used for the purposes of the works. At the time of the passing of the Act many of these houses were unoccupied. By reason of the construction of the railway the assessments of the land and houses to the poor rate were reduced, and the plaintiffs claimed that the defendants were liable to make good the deficiency in the assessments up to the time of the completion of the works. The Divisional Court gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed.

By section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, "If the promoters of the undertaking become possessed by virtue of this or of the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, of any lands charged with the land tax or liable to be assessed to the poor rate, they shall from time to time, until the works shall be completed and assessed to such land tax or poor rate, be liable to make good the deficiency in the several assessments for land tax or poor rate by reason of such lands having been taken or used for the purposes of the works, and such deficiency shall be computed according to the rental at which such lands with any buildings thereon were valued or rated at the time of the passing of the special Act."

E. Page, for the defendants.—The railway company did not "become possessed of these lands" by virtue of the Lands Clauses Act or the special Act. The lands were not "taken or used for the purposes of the works." They were taken to buy out the opposition of the owners in Parliament. The company had no power to take these houses, and the purchase was ultrà vires. Therefore section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, does not apply, and the company cannot be called upon to make good the deficiency in the assessments. Secondly, if the company are bound to make good the deficiency, inasmuch as some of the houses were unoccupied at the time of the passing of the Act of 1881, no rates were payable in respect of them, and therefore there could be no deficiency in respect of the unoccupied houses. The word "assessments" in section 133 must mean amount received for the poor rate.

He referred to Reg. v. St. Pancras, 25 W. R. 827, 2 Q. B. D. 581; and Stratton v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 23 W. R. 447, L. R. 10 C. P. 76.

Jelf, Q.C., and Dryden, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The railway company in the present case have taken certain property. The company had no power to take, whether by agreement or otherwise, any property except under their Act for the purposes of their undertaking. Here the property was purchased by the company, not for the purposes of the undertaking, but for totally different reasons. The company have been assessed to the poor rate in respect of this property, and upon an application being made upon them to make good the deficiency under section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, they allege that, though they are in possession of the property, they acted without any legal right in buying it, and that therefore section 133 is not applicable. In my opinion the company cannot, as against the parish, be allowed to allege that. They must be held, as against the parish, to have taken the land for the purposes of the undertaking, and it must be held that the land has been legally taken.

The next question arises as to the true construction of section 133 with regard to the deficiency. The company "have become possessed of lands liable to be assessed to the poor rate," and until the works are completed they shall from time to time "be liable to make good the deficiency in the several assessments for poor rate by reason of such lands having been taken or used for the purposes of the works." The words "such lands" in the latter part of the section refer to the lands mentioned at the beginning of the section, of which the company have become possessed by virtue of this or the special Act. In my opinion, for the purpose of ascertaining the deficiency, the comparison must be made between the assessment of these lands at the time of the passing of the special Act and the several assessments of the same lands made from time to time after the passing of the special Act down to the completion of the works and their assessment to the poor rate. The lands would be assessed whether occupied or not, that is to say, the assessment would be entered in the rate book; but if they were unoccupied, nothing would be received in respect thereof. The difference between those two assessments would give the measure of the deficiency, which the company would have to make good by reason of the lands having been taken or used for the purposes of the works. The company would have to pay, not the difference in the assessments, but the deficiency in the poor rate arising from the difference in the assessments. The judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The company must be treated as standing in the shoes of the Kingston and London Railway Co. The company find themselves in this position. They are asked to pay a certain sum as having taken lands and become possessed of them for the purposes of their works. They come here and say that they have not taken the lands for the purposes of their works, but that they have become possessed of them under no statutory powers. The company is a statutory corporation, and as such, their powers are limited by their Act, and no consent of the shareholders can give the company power to take lands if their Act gives them no such power. That doctrine has been laid down in many cases, notably in Ashbury Carriage Co. v. Riche, 24 W. R. 794, L. R. 7 H. L. 653, and Wenlock v. River Dee Co., 10 App. Cas. 354, 33 W. R. Dig. 228, and the company could be restrained at the suit of the Attorney-General from taking such lands. That being the position of the company, they fall within the common law rule that they cannot come into court and allege an illegal act to escape from liability to taxation. This rule is not founded upon the doctrine of estoppel, but it is an old common law rule.

With regard to the second point, under section 133 the company must make good the deficiency in the assessment of the lands to the poor rate caused by the lands having been taken or used for the purposes of the works. The deficiency is to be computed according to the rental at which the lands were rated at the time of the passing of the special Act. The deficiency is in the assessments to the poor rate. To ascertain what this deficiency is, the assessment of the lands at the time of the passing of the Act must be compared with the assessment of the same lands made subsequently from time to time up to the time of the completion of the works. From the difference between those assessments the sum to be paid in respect of the deficiency in the poor rate can be ascertained. We are not driven to the absurdity of holding that, because some of these houses were unoccupied at the time of the passing of the special Act, there was, therefore, no deficiency in respect of them. This section is, in truth, a parochial indemnity section.

SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE TRAMWAYS CO. v. SICKNESS AND ACCIDENT ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION. (a.)

Insurance — Accident — Insurance against claims for personal injury from accidents caused by vehicles — Payment not to exceed £250 "in respect of any one accident" — Accident causing injury to several persons.

By a policy of insurance the defendants agreed, as regards claims for personal injury and damage to property made against the plaintiffs in respect of accidents caused by their vehicles for which the plaintiffs should be liable, to pay to them £250 "in respect of any one accident," but not exceeding in all the sum of £1,500 in any one year. During the currency of the policy one of the plaintiffs' vehicles was overturned and forty persons were injured, and the plaintiffs became liable to pay compensation to the amount of £833. Upon a special case to determine the amount of the defendants' liability under the policy, Day, J., held that there had been only one accident within the meaning of the policy, and that the plaintiffs were only entitled to recover £250; Lawrance, J., holding that the injury to each person was a separate accident.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that the injury to each person was a separate accident within the meaning of the policy, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover £833.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a special case stated in an action upon a policy of insurance against accidents.

The policy, after reciting that the plaintiffs, thereinafter called the assured, by a proposal had applied to the defendants for an indemnity against all such claims as thereinafter mentioned for compensation for personal injuries and damage to property caused by vehicles in their possession, stated that the defendants agreed "that so far as regards claims for personal injury and damage to property made against the assured in respect of accidents caused by vehicles, or the motive power thereof while attached thereto, belonging to the assured and specified in the subjoined schedule, and for which accidents the assured shall be liable," they would pay to the assured the sum of £250 "in respect of any one accident," but not exceeding in all the sum of £1,500 in any one year.

During the currency of the policy one of the plaintiffs' vehicles specified in the policy was overturned, and forty persons were injured, and the plaintiffs became liable to pay compensation and expenses to the amount of £833 in all. The defendants contended that the plaintiffs were only entitled to recover £250, on the ground that there had been only one accident.

The question for the court was whether the injury caused to each person was a separate accident within the meaning of the policy.

In the Divisional Court Day, J., was of opinion that there had been only one accident within the meaning of the policy, while Lawrance, J., was of opinion that the injury to each person was a separate accident.

Lawrance, J., having withdrawn his judgment, judgment was entered for the plaintiffs for £250.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion the true meaning of this policy, so far as regards personal injuries, is that it covers injuries to a person arising from accidents caused by vehicles of the plaintiffs. If that is so, the injury to each person is a separate accident within the meaning of the policy, and there were as many accidents as there were persons injured. I agree, therefore, with the judgment of Lawrance, J., and the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for £833.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The word "accident" may be used in many senses. For instance, if a bridge breaks down while a railway train is upon it, and the passengers are injured, it may be said that there is an accident to the bridge, or to the train, or to the passengers in the train. One must look at the document to see in what sense the word is used. The policy, after reciting the proposal, insures against claims for personal injury and damage to property made against the assured in respect of accidents caused by vehicles. If the policy had stopped there it would be perfectly clear that the word "accident" could only be construed as an accident to the person. The difficulty arises from the subsequent words limiting the payment to a particular sum "in respect of any one accident." If, however, the word "accident" has the meaning I have given to it in the earlier part, it must have the same meaning in the later part. There are no words in the later part to limit or alter that meaning.

FRY, L.J.—I agree. The words "personal injury and damage to property" mean injury to persons and damage to property, and the words "accidents caused by vehicles" mean accidentally caused by vehicles. Therefore the policy covers injury to persons and damage to property accidentally caused by vehicles. I should have come to that conclusion apart altogether from the recital, but when one looks at the recital the meaning is quite clear.

Then, as regards the subsequent words, "in respect of any one accident," it seems to me that the word "accidents" there refers to the same thing as the words "accidents caused by vehicles" above, and means injury to persons and damage to property accidentally caused by vehicles. I think, therefore, that the judgment of Lawrance, J., was right.

Appeal allowed.

From Q. B. Div. Dec. 4.

BOLTON v. BUCKENHAM. (a.)

Mortgage—Principal and surety—Covenant for repayment—Consolidation of mortgages—Covenant for repayment at a later date—Discharge of surety by giving time.

By a covenant in a mortgage deed of the 4th of September, 1857, the mortgagor and the defendant, as surety, covenanted to pay the mortgage debt of £450 on the 4th of March, 1858. By a deed of the 15th of December, 1884, to which the defendant was not a party, this mortgage and other mortgages on other properties were consolidated. Under this deed the several mortgagees were paid off, and they assigned their mortgages to the plaintiff, with the full benefit of the covenants in the respective mortgage deeds. The mortgagor by this deed covenanted with the plaintiff to repay the full amount of the mortgage debt on the 19th of January, 1885.

Held, that, by the covenant in the deed of 1884, the time for repayment of the mortgage debt of £450 contained in the deed of 1857 had been enlarged, and the liability of the defendant as surety had been discharged.

Appeal from the judgment of Day, J., at the trial without a jury of an action to recover £450 on a covenant in a mortgage deed dated the 4th of September, 1857. The defence was that the defendant covenanted as surety for one J. C. Buckenham, and that time had been given to the principal debtor, thereby discharging the defendant.

By a deed dated the 4th of September, 1857, the defendant and J. C. Buckenham assigned certain freehold property, in which they were jointly interested, to one Cooper as security for the repayment of £450 advanced by Cooper to J. C. Buckenham. The deed contained a joint and several covenant by the defendant and Buckenham to pay to Cooper £450, and interest thereon, on the 4th of March, 1858. The defendant executed this mortgage as surety for J. C. Buckenham.

In 1884 J. C. Buckenham, who had mortgaged other properties as security for sums advanced by other persons, was desirous of consolidating the mortgages, and a deed dated the 15th of December, 1884, was executed, by which, after reciting that an application had been made by J. C. Buckenham to the plaintiff for an advance of £3,200 to pay off the various mortgages, and that the plaintiff, upon having the repayment of the said sum of £3,200, with interest, further secured in manner thereinafter appearing, had agreed to advance the said sum, the various mortgagees assigned to the plaintiff the various mortgages, including the mortgage of the 4th of September, 1857, and the full benefit of the covenants and other powers and provisions contained in the respective mortgage deeds, and of all securities for the same. The defendant was not a party to this deed. This deed contained a covenant by J. C. Buckenham to repay to the plaintiff the said sum of £3,200, and interest, on the 19th of January, 1885.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Day, J., held that the deed of 1884, by reason of the covenant for repayment therein contained, gave time to the principal debtor, J. C. Buckenham, and that, consequently, the defendant, as surety under the deed of 1857, was discharged. The plaintiff appealed.

Haldane, Q.C., and G. E. Lyon, for the plaintiff.—The deed of 1884 expressly kept alive the covenant for repayment in the deed of 1857. There were in effect two securities given for the same debt. The two covenants are separate and independent covenants. There was no merger, as the securities were of equal degree. The deed of 1884 does not say that the debtor shall not be sued until the 19th of January, 1885. He therefore continued liable to be sued at any time on the covenant in the deed of 1857, and there was no giving of time so as to discharge the surety.
